I must say that, until I am compelled to say so by a higher tribunal, I shall never admit that such a thing as this is an accident. We were very strongly urged by the learned counsel who pleaded the case to allow a proof. I do not think we should do so, because a proof would come to nothing. He cannot ask that he should be better treated than by supposing he has proved every word which he has set forth; and if he had, it would amount to no more than what I have said. But in case the matter should go further, I think it necessary to say that I think an arbitrator in Scotland is entitled, in the conduct of the arbitration, to take the procedure to which we are accustomed in Scotland—I mean the procedure which requires consideration of the question of relevancy before proof is allowed. I think it necessary to say so, because that is not the procedure in England. As we all know, the practical use of demurrer has long ago ceased. Everything goes to what is called trial, and relevancy is taken up along with the inquiry into the facts. This is not our practice, and there is no reason why we should alter our practice.

Accordingly, I think that this arbitrator, if he was clearly of opinion that the case as stated was irrelevant, was not bound to order a proof, and that we should not order him now to allow it. Assuming that the appellant, as I have just said, had proved everything which is stated in the case, it seems to me that there would be no proof of accident.

It would be quite useless to go through the various cases. I would only say, with great respect, that I, for my part, entirely agree with the general review of the cases that was given by the Court of Appeal in England in the case of Eke v. Hart-Dyke.¹ And I notice that, in that case, Lord Justice Kennedy particularly scouts the idea of the case of a man catching cold being said to be an accident. Well, I cannot see the distinction between catching a cold which passes off and catching a cold which eventually develops into pleurisy. Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that we should answer the question in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I think this is a very plain case. I would only add to what your Lordship has said on the question of relevancy that there was no suggestion in the argument that the learned arbitrator had omitted to state any fact in the case which would assist the appellant in his claim.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

E. ROLLAND M'NAB, S.S.C.—ADAMSON, GULLAND, & STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ [1910] 2 K. B. 677.

WILLIAM DOUGALL, Pursuer (Appellant).—D. Anderson.
 CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Wark.

No. 48.

Dec. 7, 1912.

Process—Record—Amendment—Failure to pay opponent's expenses—Absolutor or dismissal.

Dougall v.
 Caledonian
 Railway Co.

IN an action of damages for personal injury brought in the Sheriff Court at Perth and remitted to the Court of Session for jury trial under section 30 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907,¹ the Second Division, on 15th November 1912, allowed the pursuer to amend his record, found the defenders entitled to the expenses connected with the amendment, and allowed the pursuer "to proceed in the cause only on payment" of the expenses found due. The pursuer having subsequently intimated that he did not intend to pay the expenses and proceed in the cause, the defenders moved for absolutor. The pursuer maintained that the appropriate decree was one of dismissal.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Perthshire.

ON 7th December 1912 the Court, without delivering opinions, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that the order as to expenses contained in the interlocutor of 15th November last has not been obtempered, assolvie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern."

J. MILLER THOMSON & Co., W.S.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

THOMAS COUBROUGH AND ANOTHER (Miss Elizabeth Muir's Executors), Pursuers (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—Paton.

No. 49.

ALEXANDER CRAIG AND ANOTHER (William Craig's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Morison, K.C.—MacRobert.

Dec. 10, 1912.

Agent and Principal—Liability to third parties—Knowledge of agent imputed to principal.

Muir's
 Executors v.
 Craig's
 Trustees.

Fraud—Forgery—Adoption—Agent and Client—Fraud of agent—Adoption by client—Personal bar.

The proprietrix of certain subjects handed the title-deeds thereof to her law-agent, a nephew, at whose death it was discovered that he had utilised the title-deeds to obtain money for himself by means of a forged bond over the property. Previously the proprietrix had received a demand for payment of income-tax on "interest" and, not knowing to what such a demand could refer, she asked another nephew, a brother of the law-agent, to make inquiries, in the course of which he learnt that his brother had obtained money for himself on the security of his aunt's title-deeds. He refrained from communicating this to his aunt till after his brother's death, when she heard of the bond for the first time and at once repudiated her signature. In an action by her against the bondholders for reduction of the bond as a forgery and for delivery of the title-deeds, the defenders maintained that she had adopted the forged deed as her own, or at least was barred by her actings from pleading that she had not adopted it.

Held that the knowledge of the nephew employed to make inquiries, which he had refrained from communicating, could not be imputed to

Dec. 10, 1912.

Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.

the pursuer so as to bar her from subsequently repudiating the forgery ; and decree granted as concluded for.

Dictum of Lord Halsbury in Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors, (1887) 12 App. Cas. 531, at p. 537, commented on and explained.

Question, per the Lord President, whether the doctrine of adoption by "bar" can ever be applied where the knowledge of the person alleged to be barred is merely constructive knowledge.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Dewar.

ON 24th July 1911 Miss Elizabeth Muir, Greenlaw Avenue, Paisley, brought an action against the testamentary trustees of the late William Craig, joiner, Paisley, for reduction of a bond and disposition in security, bearing to be granted by her, and for delivery of the title-deeds of the security subjects, on the ground that the signatures to the bond had been forged by her law-agent.

A proof was allowed and led. The facts established at the proof, which bore out the averments of the pursuer, were thus narrated by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion :—

"This action was raised on 24th July 1911 at the instance of the late Miss Muir, 11 Greenlaw Avenue, Paisley, who died on 30th September 1911, and the trustees accepting and acting under her will have sisted themselves as pursuers in the action. The question for decision is whether a bond and disposition in security—the signature to which is alleged to have been forged—now falls to be reduced, and the title-deeds delivered to the pursuers.

"Miss Muir was an old lady who owned some house property in Campbell Street, Paisley, valued at £750, and this was practically all her capital. In or about the year 1902 she transferred the title-deeds of this property to her nephew, the late William Bowie, who at that time was a solicitor of good repute in Paisley; but when he died on 2nd September 1910 his affairs were found to be hopelessly involved, and it was discovered that for a number of years prior to his death he had persistently misappropriated large sums of money belonging to his clients. Among other defalcations the pursuers allege that he forged Miss Muir's signature to the bond and disposition in security now under reduction. It is dated 11th and recorded 12th August 1904, and bears to have been granted by Miss Muir in favour of William Craig in consideration of the sum of £500 alleged to have been paid to her by William Craig's curator bonis. It is averred on record that Miss Muir did not sign this deed, or authorise or employ William Bowie to grant it; that she did not receive the £500 or any part thereof; that her signature and the signature of the instrumentary witness, James Charters, were forged; and that on learning of the existence of the bond Miss Muir at once repudiated it. The defenders deny that Miss Muir's signature was forged, and alternatively they plead that even assuming it was, Miss Muir and her representatives are barred by her actions from challenging it; and that in any event as the defenders obtained the title-deeds from the late William Bowie—while acting within the scope of his employment—as additional security, they are not bound to return them until the money advanced has been paid. I am of opinion that this defence has failed in all its branches.

"I have no doubt that Miss Muir's signature was forged. Miss Muir took much interest in her affairs, and largely managed them herself. She often referred to the fact—and was very proud of it—that there was no burden on her property; and she was naturally much surprised when she came to know that a bond and disposition in security had been granted over it. She stated that she had given no authority, and when she saw the deed she immediately repudiated the signature both verbally and in writing, and gave her solicitor instructions to raise this action; and the expert evidence is to the effect that the signature is a forgery. Moreover, Mr James Charters—the instrumentary witness—who had been a clerk in Mr Bowie's office, states in his evidence (which was taken on commission) that his signature is forged also. And it is significant that Mr Charters was the instrumentary witness to Miss Muir's will which Bowie prepared and which was in his possession at the time he executed the bond and disposition in security. It is obvious on the face of the documents that both signatures to the bond have been copied from the will. Then it is proved, if further proof were necessary, that Miss Muir was not in Paisley on the date when she is alleged to have signed the bond there; and although her bank-book and accounts were carefully kept, there is no evidence that the £500, or any part of it, ever reached her, and she certainly paid no interest on the bond. Then Bowie was involved in building speculations and was hard pressed for money. It is proved that he misappropriated—by forgery and otherwise—large sums from other clients, and he confessed to his brother Thomas that he had borrowed this £500 on the security of Miss Muir's property without her knowledge and consent. He did not say that he had granted a bond and disposition in security, and forged the signature; but it is quite clear on the evidence that this is what he actually did, because he paid the interest, and the tax on the interest and the premium on the additional policy of insurance he took out over the subjects, out of his own pocket, while he regularly rendered accounts to Miss Muir for all the other disbursements he made on her behalf. All this, and much more, the pursuers proved, and the defenders offered no rebutting evidence at all. It is really too clear for argument that the signature is a forgery, and that William Bowie was the forger.

"But it is said that Miss Muir by her actings adopted the deed and that the pursuers are barred by her negligence from now challenging it. The alleged negligence is as follows:—In June 1910 Miss Muir received an official notice from the Inland Revenue claiming £1, 1s. 10d. of tax in respect of 'interest.' No mention was made of any bond, and Miss Muir did not know what the notice referred to, but thought probably it was some of 'Mr Lloyd George's new taxes.' She consulted her nephew Thomas Bowie, and as he did not know what it meant, she asked him to call at the Inland Revenue Office. He did so, and discovered that there was a bond over the property. As he had often heard his aunt say that there was no burden on her property, he had an interview with his brother William and asked him to explain. William confessed that he had obtained the money from the defenders on the security of Miss Muir's property without her knowledge or consent. He did not say that he had forged her signature, and Thomas states that he thought that the money had been obtained without any bond and on the security of the titles alone. I have some difficulty in understanding how he could think so when he admits that he had been satisfied at the Inland Revenue Office that there actually was a bond. But whether he knew the whole truth or not, he agreed, at William's earnest request, not to disclose the facts to Miss Muir, and accordingly when, a few days

Dec. 10, 1912.
Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.

Dec. 10, 1912. later, she asked him what the assessor had said, he replied that he had not seen him. This was in June, and nothing further was said or done until after William's death, which occurred on 2nd September, when, as I have said, his affairs were found to be much involved and his estate bankrupt. On the 19th September Thomas Bowie told his sister, Miss M. Bowie, of William's confession, and asked her to inform Miss Muir, and she did so, and Miss Muir then learned for the first time what the Inland Revenue really meant. In these circumstances the defenders argued that although the notice did not make any reference to a bond on Miss Muir's property, yet it was sufficient, if she had been reasonably diligent, to enable her to discover that the bond in point of fact existed, and that her signature had been forged; and they maintained that the knowledge which she might by the exercise of reasonable diligence have acquired, must be imputed to her; and that, having allowed the matter to lie over until after William's death, when the circumstances were altered for the worse, she must be held to have adopted the deed, and that her representatives were accordingly barred from pleading forgery."

Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—3. In any event, the defenders should be assoilzied in respect (1) that the deceased Elizabeth Muir and her representatives are barred by her actings from challenging the bond in question; (2) that the said deceased acquiesced in and homologated said bond; and (3) of mora and taciturnity.

On 1st August 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Decerns in terms of the reductive conclusion of the summons, and decerns against the defenders in terms of the conclusion for delivery: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses: Allow, &c.*"

* "OPINION.—[After the narrative quoted supra—In support of this argument [viz., that the pursuer had adopted the bond] I was referred to a number of English cases; but, so far as I can see, they have no application to the facts of this case. I quite understand that if a man knows that another is relying upon his forged signature, he may incur liability unless he divulges the fact before the position alters for the worse, and wilful ignorance may amount to actual knowledge; thus, for example, a person must not deliberately abstain from inquiry where inquiry ought to be made. And if the defenders had proved that Miss Muir knew, or even in the absence of actual knowledge, that she had good reason to believe, that William Bowie had forged her signature, and that she had deliberately refrained from making inquiry in order to screen him, the case would have been different. But they have not proved anything of that kind, and, as I understand their argument, that is not the case they present. Their case is that the Inland Revenue notice was sufficient to put her on her inquiry; that she ought to have inquired; and if she had, the forgery would have been disclosed. Briefly put, the argument I think comes to this, the notice ought to have awakened Miss Muir's suspicion, and she must be held liable because it did not. But there is no legal obligation on a person to be suspicious, and even if there were, I see nothing in the notice to excite suspicion of forgery. I think it was much more natural for an old lady to suspect that it conveyed an intimation of a new tax, and I do not think that she displayed any negligence in taking that view. I have no doubt that a great many people pay their taxes without any inquiry at all, and I do not think that it would be reasonable to hold that in doing so they are guilty of such negligence in the management of their own affairs as may render them liable to their neighbours. And further, Miss Muir stood in no special relation to the defenders, and I am quite unable to see on what

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Dec. 10, 1912. Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Mackenzie, and Lord Cullen) on 5th December 1912.

Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) It was not proved that in point of fact the signatures in the bond had been forged. (2) Esto that they were forged, Miss Muir was put upon her guard by the receipt of the Inland Revenue schedule. Thereafter she employed an agent to make inquiries, and although he concealed from her the result of his inquiries he was an "agent to know," and his knowledge must be attributed to her.¹ Accordingly, she must be held to have adopted the forgery, and was barred from challenging it. In any event, the defenders had suffered prejudice through Miss Muir's neglect and through the fault of her agent, and therefore she should bear the loss rather than the entirely innocent parties.² Counsel stated that, in view of the decision in Bowie's Trustees v. Watson,³ the reclaimers could not resist delivery of the title-deeds.

Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

At advising on 10th December 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action which was raised by the deceased Miss Elizabeth Muir, and is now insisted in by her executors, to reduce a legal principle it can be maintained that she was bound to make special inquiry into her affairs in their interests. It is not said that the forgery was caused by her negligence, but only that she negligently failed to discover it. She did nothing to deceive or mislead the defenders, or to prevent them discovering it for themselves. She did not know of the existence of the bond until after William Bowie's death, and all she then knew was that her signature was forged. In these circumstances I do not think that it can, in any reasonable sense, be said that she adopted the deed; her knowledge is the only possible basis for adoption, and it is proved that she had no knowledge at all.

"Finally, the defenders argued that they were not in any event bound to deliver the title-deeds, because they had stipulated that the titles should be handed over to them as additional security, and in handing them over, William Bowie was acting within the scope of his authority. But I do not think he was. He had no more authority to pledge the titles than he had to forge Miss Muir's signature, and the title-deeds without the bond afforded no security at all. I think the forgery and the handing over of the titles was one dishonest transaction, to which Miss Muir was in no way a party, and which she was powerless to prevent. The source of all the trouble was, I think, simply this,—the defenders permitted themselves to be duped by William Bowie. They trusted him, and handed over their money to him, and discovered when too late that they had made a mistake. Instead of seeing Miss Muir sign the deed, or asking her to acknowledge the signature, they accepted Bowie's assurance that it was hers. This, as events have proved, was a fatal error; but it was an error which they themselves made, and they cannot, in my opinion, hold Miss Muir's estate liable for it.

"I am accordingly of opinion on the whole matter that the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses."

¹ Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors, (1887) 12 App. Cas. 531, per Lord Halsbury, L.C., at p. 537.

² Mackenzie v. British Linen Company, (1881) 8 R. (H. L.) 8; Ogilvie v. West Australian Mortgage and Agency Corporation, Limited, [1896] A. C. 257, per Lord Watson, at p. 270.

³ Supra, p. 326.

Dec. 10, 1912. bond for £500 over her property in Campbell Street, Paisley. The ground of reduction is the very simple one that no such bond in truth exists, the signatures to the so-called bond which has been registered being forgeries. The action is resisted by the bondholder.

Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

The facts out of which the matter arose stand thus: Miss Muir had a nephew called William Bowie, who was a law-agent. He has since died, and after his death it was found out that he had embezzled a great deal of clients' money, and in more ways than one brought himself within the reach of the criminal law, and it is said that he was the forger. It is quite certain that the £500 which was paid to Bowie never reached Miss Muir, and consequently, Bowie must have made away with it.

Now, the first ground of defence was a denial that the writing was forged. Miss Muir, owing to her death, was not examined; the action had not gone far enough before her death to allow of her examination. She had, as a matter of fact, repudiated her signature—we have secondary evidence of that. But upon the whole matter, having read the evidence in the case, I have not a shade of doubt that the Lord Ordinary, who is also perfectly confident in his opinion, has arrived at the right result, and that there is no doubt whatsoever that the signatures here are forgeries.

That being so, the next defence is that Miss Muir, by her actings, adopted the forgery, or at least is barred from saying that she did not adopt it. The facts upon which that plea is based are these: Miss Muir had another nephew, a brother of William Bowie, and Miss Muir received from the Inland Revenue a demand for payment of £1, 1s. 10d. for income-tax. She never had such a demand before, and she did not understand it, and as this nephew happened to be calling, she asked him to go and make inquiries as to why she was due this £1, 1s. 10d. The nephew went to the Inland Revenue, and was told by them that it was in respect of a bond over her property, whereupon the nephew said to the representative of the Inland Revenue that he did not think it could be that, because he knew that his aunt had no bond over the property, because she had said so. The representative of the Inland Revenue then communicated with Edinburgh, and produced to this nephew evidence which made him come to the conclusion that after all there must be a bond over the property. Then, understanding no more, he sent for his brother, William Bowie, who, upon being asked the question, at once broke down and confessed that he had used his aunt's title-deeds in order to raise money. William begged his brother not to say anything about it at present, as he would be able to replace the money, to which request the brother acceded, and consequently never communicated the result of his investigations to Miss Muir at all, but simply put her off with some excuse that he had not yet found out. Then William Bowie died. These are the circumstances which, it is said, constitute the adoption of the forgery by Miss Muir.

The law of adoption of forgery was long ago authoritatively stated in the case of Mackenzie v. British Linen Company,¹ in the House of Lords, and there is nothing more to be said about it. I need scarcely remind your Lordships that adoption is the basis of the doctrine, and that adoption prima facie means something positive. But it was recognised in Mackenzie Dec. 10, 1912. *v. British Linen Company*¹ that you might be in a position to be what is called "estopped" in England or "barred" in Scotland—you might be in such a position that you would not be heard to say that the signature was not yours. In particular the dictum of Baron Parke in the well-known case of Freeman v. Cook,² was adopted in the British Linen Company case,¹ and therefore I may take it that it is good Scots law as well as good English law. The point of the doctrine is that, when you know there is a forgery and when you know that the person relying upon that forgery is putting himself in a worse position or losing some remedy which he would otherwise have, you are not entitled to keep silence and then to tell him at the end of the day, after his position has been made worse by the delay, that the signature is forged. But while that is perfectly true where there is knowledge of the forgery, it seems to me that, in order to reach the result here the defenders have got to make some very extraordinary leaps from one position to another.

¹ 8 R. (H. L.) 8.

In the first place I very much doubt whether this doctrine of adoption by "bar" or "estoppel" could ever be applied, not to real knowledge, but to constructive knowledge, which is all, of course, that Miss Muir ever had here. Nobody says that she ever had any real knowledge; she could only have constructive knowledge through her nephew. That is the first chasm that the defenders here have to bridge, but it is not the last. The next one is even more formidable. It is, Did she have any constructive knowledge? Now, the whole argument there, as stated by Mr MacRobert, was based on a dictum of Lord Halsbury in the case of Blackburn, Low, & Company v. Vigora.³ I had, while I was at the bar, an opportunity of learning many a lesson in law from Lord Halsbury in the House of Lords, and if I remember once I remember twenty times that noble and learned Lord protesting with all the vigour of which he is a perfect master against his dicta being taken away from the subjecta materies and used as a definition, and I think Lord Halsbury would be the very last person to use the dictum which I am just going to read in a general sense. The particular dictum was this (p. 537): "When a person is the agent to know, his knowledge does bind the principal." Now that was a perfectly good proposition, and only just a little abbreviated in expression. The circumstances in *Blackburn*³ were thus set forth in the rubric: "The plaintiffs instructed a broker to re-insure an overdue ship. Whilst acting for the plaintiffs the broker received information material to the risk, but did not communicate it to them, and the plaintiffs effected a re-insurance for £800 through the broker's London agents. Afterwards the plaintiffs effected a re-insurance for £700, lost or not lost, through another broker. The ship had in fact been lost some days before the plaintiffs tried to re-insure, but neither the plaintiffs nor the last-named broker knew it, and both he and the plaintiffs acted throughout in good faith." The first re-insurance was bad for a non-disclosure. It was argued that the second was bad also. It was held that the knowledge of the first broker was not the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover upon the policy for £700. Now, his Lordship deals

Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.
Ld. President.

¹ 8 R. (H. L.) 8.² (1848) 2 Ex. 654.³ 12 App. Cas. 531.

Dec. 10, 1912. with the situation thus: "A broker is employed to effect a particular insurance. While so employed he receives material information, he does not effect the insurance and he does not communicate the information. How is it possible to suggest that the assured could rely upon the communication to the principal of every piece of information acquired by any agent through whom the assured has unsuccessfully endeavoured to procure an insurance? -I am unable to accept the criticism by the Master of the Rolls upon the proposition that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal. When a person is the agent to know, his knowledge does bind the principal." What does that mean when expanded? It means this—when your agent is the person whom you have commissioned to effect a contract, to wit, in this case, a contract of insurance, then for every purpose, as in a question with the underwriter, you put the agent in the same position as yourself, and if he, for the purpose of that insurance, gets knowledge which is material to the risk, he is bound to communicate it to the underwriter, just as you would be bound to communicate it to the underwriter; and you cannot, if the underwriter is put upon a risk unjustly by that not having been done, take to yourself the benefit of a contract which in point of fact has been vitiated by a non-disclosure on the part of your agent. All that is perfectly simple, but to build upon that foundation the idea that Lord Halsbury has discovered a sort of legal unicorn called the "agent to know" seems to me perfectly preposterous. I do not know what the "agent to know" is. It would come to this, that the most complete agent to know would be just the person whom you had sent to ask a question, as, for example, any servant whom you had sent to speak for you at the telephone. Any such messenger necessarily makes you constructively aware of all that he has learned, and does not tell. That is the proposition. I think that proposition is absurd. There is no such thing as an "agent to know." The relation of principal and agent generally involves a contract between them. At anyrate, the relation is generally based, to use Scots terms, upon a mandate; but a general position of an "agent to know" is unknown, I think, to the law.

The difficulty does not end there, because, after all, what Bowie, the brother, was sent to ask was not whether there was a bond upon the property; he was to ask, "What is the meaning of the Inland Revenue asking me for £1, 1s. 10d.?" Therefore the argument for the defenders really comes to this: An old lady sends her nephew to ask the Inland Revenue what they meant by asking her for £1, 1s. 10d.; that nephew, if he had properly made his investigations, would have found out that this was a demand in respect that there was a bond. Under Schedule A, she was entitled to an exemption, since her total income was under the exempted figure; nevertheless, she had to pay income-tax in respect of the interest which she deducted from the creditor in the bond. All these are things about which, I may say, most old ladies would not understand anything. Then, if he had pursued his investigations, he would have found out that there was a bond; if he had gone further, he must have come to the conclusion that that bond was a forgery. Then, although the nephew had not told the old lady anything about these things, she becomes the adopter of the forgery. I cannot help calling such an argument an absurdity. I do

Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

not think it necessary to say any more, and I think upon the whole matter Dec. 10, 1912. that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

There was one other ground of defence, but that was held to be ruled by ^{Muir's} Executors v. ^{Craig's} Trustees. a case¹ which was decided by us on the day when the argument in this case was heard.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur with your Lordship. It was argued to us that it had not been proved that this old lady's signature on the bond in question had been forged, but I think the onus is completely discharged, and I entirely concur in what the Lord Ordinary says. With regard to her not being examined, it appears that a commission was taken to examine her, and that it was only because the parties whose duty it would have been to execute the commission had every reason to think and hope that she would be well enough to be examined at the proof that the commission was not executed, and, therefore, there is no blame upon them for not having obtained her evidence and laid it before the Court.

It is quite evident that she had been in use to say that there was no bond upon her property, and that she was somewhat proud of the fact. When she learned that this bond had been discovered, she immediately repudiated her signature, and she instructed the action to be raised. Then the evidence of the instrumentary witness, Charters, obtained on commission, is to the effect that his signature was forged. And it is further proved satisfactorily that Miss Muir was not in Paisley on the date on which, on the face of the bond, she appears to have signed it there. Then, there is no doubt that the deceased William Bowie had been hard pressed for money, and that he made a confession to his brother Thomas which, although not in terms acknowledging that he had forged the bond, made it perfectly apparent that he had made use of his aunt's property for the purpose of raising money. It is equally clear that Miss Muir herself did not pay any interest on the bond, and that William Bowie did, and accordingly, as the Lord Ordinary says, it is too clear for argument that Miss Muir's name had been forged upon this bond by William Bowie.

But then it is said that if she did not adopt the forgery, at anyrate there are circumstances which show that she must be barred from saying that she did not adopt it. That she adopted it in the way of doing anything positive is certainly not the case. The case of *Blackburn*² was pressed upon our attention as sufficient to show that there is good ground for the plea of bar, because the knowledge of the nephew Thomas Bowie is to be deemed for the purposes of this case to be her knowledge. In one of the cases, I think Blackburn,² it was pointed out that the wrong use of the word "agent" had caused a good deal of confusion in these cases. I think that when the facts in regard to the so-called agency here are examined they amount to no more than your Lordship has already described, that Thomas Bowie was used for the purpose of taking a message to the Inland Revenue to ask why they were making the charge of £1, 1s. 10d. The subsequent structure is built up on that one fact. Now, when one compares that with the state of facts in Blackburn,² they are utterly different. Blackburn's case² had

¹ Bowie's Trustees v. Watson, supra, p. 326.

² 12 App. Cas. 531.

Dec. 10, 1912. relation to a contract of marine insurance, and, of course, in all such contracts of insurance it is a condition precedent that the insured shall make a full disclosure of all facts which materially affect the risk which are within his knowledge when the contract is made. In the particular case the agent, whose knowledge was sought to be fixed upon the principal, had dropped out of the case; but it is quite clearly pointed out that the reason why, if that broker had effected the insurance, his knowledge, unless he communicated it, would have been fatal to the policy, was because his agency was to effect an insurance. That is quite clearly pointed out in the judgment of Lord Halsbury, and therefore it seems to me necessary to read the expression "agent to know" along with the passage in which it is apparent that Lord Halsbury was referring to a person who was acting as agent in effecting an insurance. That is quite different, and has no application to the facts in this present case. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the arguments of the defenders cannot prevail, and that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Muir's
Executors v.
Craig's
Trustees.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The Lord President intimated that LORD CULLEN, who was absent at advising, concurred.

LORD KINNEAR was present when the case was advised.

THE COURT adhered.

J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—LISTER SHAND & LINDSAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 50.

Dec. 10, 1912.

Burns v.
William
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

JAMES BURNS, Appellant.—Maconochie.
WILLIAM BAIRD & COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—
Horne, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Second Schedule, 9 (d)—Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, sec. 12—Application to record memorandum—Agreement for redemption of weekly payment—Minute by workman objecting to adequacy of sum agreed on and to means by which agreement obtained—Reference by Sheriff-clerk to Sheriff—Competency of procedure

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, Second Schedule, 9 (d) enacts that where it appears to the Sheriff-clerk that an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment of compensation ought not to be registered by reason of the inadequacy of the redemption money or because the agreement has been improperly obtained, he may refuse to record the memorandum and refer the matter to the Sheriff.

By Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, it is provided that when the genuineness of a memorandum is disputed, or when the employer objects to the recording of it, or when the Sheriff-clerk refuses to record it under paragraph 9 (d) of the Second Schedule, "the person disputing the genuineness, or the employer, or the Sheriff-clerk, as the case may be, shall lodge a minute stating clearly all the grounds for his action."

Held that where, upon a minute lodged by a workman objecting to the recording of a memorandum on the grounds mentioned in paragraph 9 (d) of the Second Schedule, the matter was referred by the Sheriff-clerk to the Sheriff, it was the duty of the latter to determine the questions thus raised, notwithstanding that the minute was lodged by the workman and not by the Sheriff-clerk.

IN an application in the Sheriff Court at Stirling at the instance of Dec. 10, 1912.
 William Baird & Company, Limited, Glasgow, for warrant to record a memorandum of agreement between them and James Burns, brusher, Burns v.
 Kilsyth, the Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell) granted warrant, and at the William request of the workman stated a case for appeal. Baird & Co.,
 Limited.

The following narrative of the facts is taken from the opinion of 2D DIVISION.
 Lord Salvesen:— Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

"The material facts as found by the Sheriff-substitute and appearing from the correspondence annexed to the case are as follows:— On 11th December 1911 the appellant, while in the employment of the respondents, sustained personal injury consisting of a compound fracture of his right hand caused by accident while working in their No. 1 pit. On 26th March 1912 a solicitor on behalf of the appellant signed a document which, after referring to the accident, proceeded as follows:—'An agreement was made on 26th March 1912, and was as follows:—That a lump sum payment amounting to forty pounds—shillings and—pence sterling, in addition to the weekly compensation already paid, was accepted by the claimant in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims past and future in respect of said accident. It is requested that this memorandum be recorded in the Special Register of the Sheriff Court of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan at Stirling.' It bore to be addressed 'To the Sheriff-clerk, Court House, Stirling.' On the same day an application to record this memorandum was made by a law-agent of the company with which the respondents were insured, and on 27th March the Sheriff-clerk served a copy of the memorandum on the appellant, with an intimation that it would be recorded unless the genuineness was disputed or recording was objected to before 4th April.

"On 3rd April an agent on behalf of the appellant—Mr M'Dougall—wrote to the Sheriff-clerk stating that his client disputed the genuineness of the memorandum and objected to its being recorded, and this was duly intimated to the respondents. On 12th April Mr M'Dougall explained in a further letter to the Sheriff-clerk the grounds of his client's objections. These were, briefly, that £40 was inadequate as compensation for his injuries; that the appellant had no independent legal or medical advice; that he was informed that £40 was all that he could get; and that he was illiterate. He also enclosed a report from a medical man in support of his statement as to inadequacy, and asked that the matter should be referred to the Sheriff. The Sheriff-clerk wrote in reply that he would submit the whole documents to the Sheriff. On 16th April the Sheriff-clerk wrote to Mr M'Dougall advising him to lodge a minute as provided for in section 12 of the Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907, and at the same time an initial writ claiming that the amount of compensation should be determined by arbitration. Two further letters passed between the parties, one in which the claimant's agent suggested that the Sheriff-clerk should lodge a minute stating the grounds on which he referred the matter to the Sheriff, and the other in which the Sheriff-clerk took up the position that the intention of the Act of Sederunt seemed to be that the Sheriff-clerk should only act when no objection had been lodged to the recording of the memorandum, and indicating his view that it fell to the appellant to lodge a minute. A minute (No. 1 of process) was accordingly lodged by the appellant. It was in these terms:—

"The said James Burns objects to the recording of the memo-

Dec. 10, 1912.

Burns v.
William
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

random of agreement on the ground that it is not genuine in respect that said payment of forty pounds sterling was not accepted by the claimant in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims past and future in respect of the accident described in said memorandum. It is explained and averred that the claimant is illiterate, and cannot even write his own name. On or about 26th March 1912 the respondents, through their agents, requested the claimant to come to Glasgow, and at the interview which took place on the date mentioned respondents offered the claimant forty pounds, stating that that sum was the most he could get under any circumstances, and that his hand would soon be better. In that belief the claimant reluctantly accepted the sum offered. As the claimant was unable to write, one of the respondents' representatives intimated to the claimant that he would send out for a "Sheriff," who would sign for him. The claimant gave the party who was brought in authority to sign for him, but expressed at the time his dissatisfaction with the sum he was being paid by the respondents. The said party, however, offered him no advice. The respondents did not suggest to the claimant, although they knew of his being illiterate, that he should obtain independent medical or legal advice. In accepting said sum of forty pounds the claimant relied on the respondents treating him fairly from their knowledge of his injuries, which were examined on several occasions by the respondents' medical officers. It is explained and averred that the said sum of forty pounds paid to the claimant is grossly inadequate. The claimant has, since receiving said payment, consulted his own medical adviser, and has ascertained that the working capacity of his right hand is completely and permanently destroyed. It is further explained and averred that, in terms of paragraph 12 of the Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907, these questions fall to be settled by arbitration.'

"The Sheriff-substitute, after hearing parties, held that the proposed procedure was not competent under the statute, the grounds stated in the minute not, in his view, raising a question of genuineness. He accordingly dismissed the same, and granted warrant to record the memorandum of agreement." *

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts :—

"Second Schedule. (9) Where the amount of compensation under this Act has been ascertained . . . by agreement, a memorandum thereof shall be sent . . . to the [Sheriff-clerk], who shall, . . . on being satisfied as to its genuineness, record such memorandum in a special register without fee, and thereupon the memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a [recorded decree-arbitral], provided that : . . .

"(d) Where it appears to the [Sheriff-clerk], on any information which he considers sufficient, that an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum . . . ought not to be registered by reason of the inadequacy of the sum . . . or by reason of the agreement having been obtained by fraud or undue influence, or other improper means, he may refuse to record the memorandum of the agreement sent to him for registration, and refer the matter to the [Sheriff], who shall, in accordance with [Act of Sederunt], make such order . . . as under the circumstances he may think just.

"(e) The [Sheriff] may, within six months after a memorandum of an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were :—“(1) Was I right in holding that the appellant's procedure, per minute No. 1 of process, was not competent under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) Was I entitled to dismiss said minute without proof of the grounds of opposition to the recording of the alleged memorandum of agreement set forth therein?”

Dec. 10, 1912.

Burns v.
William
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

The case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 27th November 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The application to record together with the minute opposing it fell to be dealt with as arbitration proceedings.¹ It was the policy of the Act that in such proceedings all questions relevant to the issue should be determined,² and, accordingly, under an application to record, the Court had considered the effect of an alleged discharge of his claim by the workman.³ If necessary, the appellant was prepared to maintain that the agreement was not “genuine,” in the sense that, having been executed by him under essential error as to his rights, it was not his deed. But it was enough for him to found on paragraph 9 (d) of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which provided that inadequacy and improper means were good grounds for objecting to registration. It was true that this section contemplated the case of objections taken by the Sheriff-clerk, but it would be an idle technicality to draw a distinction between the case where the Sheriff-clerk referred the matter to the Sheriff ex proprio motu and the case where he did so at the instigation of a party.

Argued for the respondents;—The objections stated in the minute were irrelevant as an answer to the application for warrant to record, since they did not impeach the genuineness of the agreement.⁴ The “genuineness,” or, in other words, the question whether the memorandum correctly set forth the agreement, was the only matter which sum . . . has been recorded in the register, order that the record be removed from the register on proof to his satisfaction that the agreement was obtained by fraud or undue influence or other improper means, and may make such order . . . as under the circumstances he may think just.”

The Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907, provides :—“XII. When the genuineness of a memorandum under paragraph 9 of the Second Schedule appended to the Act is disputed, or when an employer objects to the recording of such memorandum under subsection (b) of said paragraph, or the Sheriff-clerk refuses under subsection (d) of said paragraph to record such memorandum, the person disputing the genuineness, or the employer or the Sheriff-clerk, as the case may be, shall lodge a minute stating clearly all the grounds for his action, and the memorandum shall thereupon be dealt with as if it were an application to the Sheriff for settlement by arbitration of the questions raised by the minute.”

¹ Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, sec. 12; John Brown & Co., Limited, v. Orr, 1910 S. C. 526; Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co., Limited, v. Sinclair, 1909 S. C. 922, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 928.

² Ellis v. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co., Limited, 1909 S. C. 1278, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 1281.

³ Hanley v. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, 1910 S. C. 875; Macandrew v. Gilhooly, 1911 S. C. 448.

⁴ Macdonald v. Fairfield Shipbuilding and Engineering Co., Limited, (1905) 8 F. 8; Coakley v. Addie & Sons, Limited, 1909 S. C. 545; Binning v. Easton & Sons, (1906) 8 F. 407.

Dec. 10, 1912. could competently be considered in these proceedings,¹ since the only function of the Sheriff was to see that the memorandum corresponded to the agreement.² In the present case it was not disputed that an agreement had been made in the terms of the memorandum. The objections were as to the adequacy of the redemption money and the means by which the agreement was obtained. The conditions under which alone these objections could be entertained at this stage were dealt with in paragraph 9 (d) of the Second Schedule and section 12 of the Act of Sederunt, from which it appeared that the matter could only be referred to the Sheriff by a minute lodged by the Sheriff-clerk. The procedure in this case was incompetent and without warrant. Once the agreement was recorded, the workman would have his remedy under paragraph 9 (e) of the Second Schedule.

Burns v.
William
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

At advising on 10th December 1912,—

LORD SALVESSEN.—[After the narrative quoted supra].—If this question had arisen under the former Act, I think the Sheriff would have been right. In the case of *Macdonald*³ an objection to the recording of a memorandum of agreement that the agreement had been made under essential error, and that the sum agreed to be paid was more than half the workman's average weekly earnings, was held to be irrelevant. Lord Kyllachy said: "The genuineness of the agreement is admitted. It is admitted to be as much a genuine agreement as if it had been in writing and signed by both parties. The objection to it stated by the respondents is only this, that although in fact made between the parties, it was induced by essential error; in other words, that, although a genuine agreement, it was not a valid agreement. . . . That being so, it does not appear to me to be possible to doubt that the Sheriff-substitute was right in granting the special warrant which is in question." The reason of the decision, as afterwards explained, was that the Sheriff-substitute's function was merely ministerial, and that the moment it was conceded that the agreement was genuine he had no option but to grant warrant to have it recorded.

This decision has very little bearing on the provisions contained in the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and especially paragraph 9 (d) and (e). Under the former subsection, if it appears to the Sheriff-clerk, on any information which he considers sufficient, that an agreement as to the redemption of the weekly payments by a lump sum ought not to be registered by reason of the inadequacy of the sum, or by reason of the agreement having been obtained by fraud or undue influence, or other improper means, he may refuse to record the memorandum and refer the same to the Judge, who shall, in accordance with rules of Court, make such order as under the circumstances he may think just. By the latter subsection the Judge may, within six months after such an agreement has been recorded, order that the record be removed from the register on proof that the agreement was obtained by fraud or undue influence or other improper means. Had, therefore, the Sheriff-clerk lodged a minute containing the same statements as those in the minute lodged by the appellant's Dec. 10, 1912. agent, there can be no doubt that it would have been the duty of the Sheriff-substitute to inquire into the facts and to make such order thereafter as he thought just. The question of law accordingly appears to be whether, when the minute is lodged by the appellant and the matter is referred to the Sheriff, he is precluded from considering any objection except one that goes to the genuineness of the agreement.

¹ Traill & Sons v. Cochrane, (1901) 3 F. 1091, per Lord Adam, at p. 1093.

² M'Lean v. Allan Line Steamship Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 256.

³ 8 F. 8.

Burns v.
William
Baird & Co.,
Limited.
Lord Salvesen.

I am unable to agree with the Sheriff-substitute. What the Sheriff-clerk in effect did was to refer the whole matters as to the inadequacy of the compensation and as to the alleged improper means by which the agreement fixing this sum was obtained; and I think it must be assumed that he regarded the agent's statements as constituting information which he considered sufficient to justify him in so doing. If he had not thought so, it was his duty to have recorded the memorandum; but I think he acted quite properly when, after considering the correspondence and the minute lodged on behalf of the appellant, he laid the whole papers before the local Judge. It was not within his power to order inquiry into the statements made, nor was it within his competency to consider their relevancy, although I do not suggest that he might not have disregarded merely frivolous objections. The alternative view would lead to very strange results. Although the adequacy of the compensation is not objected to by the workman, the Sheriff-clerk may on his own initiative refer that matter to the Sheriff for his determination. Can he not do so when the workman takes the objection and brings it pointedly under his notice? Again, although the register may be corrected within six months after the memorandum has been recorded on the ground of fraud or undue influence or other improper means, yet, if the Sheriff is right, no such objection will be listened to at the instance of the workman when it is stated before the memorandum has been recorded. Nothing could be more opposed to the interests of the employer. It is far better that averments challenging the validity of an agreement should be inquired into at once than that they should be delayed in the option of the workman until six months have elapsed. It would also be most unjust that the workman should be deprived of having the Sheriff's decision as to the adequacy of the compensation paid to him because, forsooth, the objection was not taken by the Sheriff-clerk on his own initiative, but was brought under his notice by the workman himself. Mere inadequacy is not a ground for correcting the register if the memorandum has once been recorded; and it would utterly stultify this provision, which is made for the protection of the workman, if it were held that inquiry as to adequacy could only take place when the Sheriff-clerk had stated the objection in spite of the apparent satisfaction of the workman. There is no duty laid upon the Sheriff-clerk to make inquiry into the facts of every agreement that is presented to him for registration; and in practice I fancy he would not feel himself called upon to act unless there appeared on the face of the agreement a manifest disproportion between the agreed-on compensation and the injuries. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has erred in granting warrant to record this memorandum without inquiry as to the facts averred. The statute contemplates that the procedure in determining questions of this kind shall be simple,

Dec. 10, 1912. inexpensive, and summary; and it would defeat this very laudable purpose if we were to support the decision of the Sheriff-substitute here.

Burns v.
William
Beird & Co.,
Limited.

None of the cases cited to us appear to have any very direct bearing on the question here in dispute. In the case of Ellis,¹ it was held that the validity of a discharge was a question arising in the proceedings as to the liability to pay compensation, and that the arbitrator was acting within his jurisdiction in determining it; but there the inquiry was held in an application to award compensation. The case of *Brown*² is more in point, because it was there decided that an action at common law for reduction of a registered memorandum was incompetent as the recording was a judicial act in arbitration proceedings under the statute, and that the remedies for improper registration must be sought within the statute. In Hanley v. The Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company,³ it was held competent for the arbitrator to determine the question as to the validity of a discharge in an application to record the memorandum; and in Macandrew v. Gilhooley,⁴ the validity of a discharge pleaded by the employers as an objection to recording a memorandum of an agreement was held by this Division to have been properly inquired into and set aside by the arbitrator. All these cases, although decided on different sections of the Workmen's Compensation Act or its schedules, tend to support the conclusion that questions, whether of fact or law, arising with regard to disputed claims for compensation must be determined in the first instance by the arbitrator. I propose, therefore, that we should answer both the questions of law stated by the Sheriff-substitute in the negative; and remit to him to inquire into the facts alleged in the appellant's minute.

Lord Salvesen.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD DUNDAS concurred.

THE COURT answered both questions of law in the negative, and remitted the cause to the arbitrator to inquire into the circumstances.

NORMAN M. MACPHERSON, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 51.

JANET HELEN DOBBIE AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Appellants).—
J. R. Christie—J. Macdonald.

Dec. 10, 1912.

THE EGYPT AND LEVANT STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—J. H. Henderson.

Dobbie v.
Egypt and Levant
Steamship
Co., Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 13, and First Sched. (1) (a) (ii).—“Dependants”—Children deserted by father—Prospects of future support.

Dependency is always a question of fact; and, even where children have been deserted by their father for three years before his death and have received no support from him during that time, they may still be held to be partially dependent upon him if there was a reasonable probability that, had he lived, he would in the future have contributed to their support.

¹ 1909 S. C. 1278.

² 1910 S. C. 875.

³ 1910 S. C. 526.

⁴ 1911 S. C. 448.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Leith, Janet Helen Dobbie and another, the pupil children of John Dobbie, claimed compensation from the Egypt and Levant Steamship Company, Limited, owners of the steamship "Wingrove," in respect of the death of their father. The Sheriff-substitute (Guy) assolized the defenders, and at the request of the pursuers, stated a case for appeal.

Dec. 10, 1912.

Dobbie v.
Egypt and Levant
Steamship
Co., Limited.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

The case set forth :—

"The following facts were proved by the evidence led before me for the appellants. The appellants' mother died on 22nd December 1906, and thereafter their father, the said deceased John Dobbie, who was in the employment of a fish merchant in Glasgow, continued to live for some time in the same house as that in which he had lived with his wife, maintaining in family with him the appellants. His mother also resided with him. Thereafter he removed with his children and mother to the house of Mr and Mrs Yates, Mrs Yates being his sister. In February 1909 the deceased, who had lost his situation, and had been out of employment for several weeks, left his home to look for work, but did not return. He then deserted the appellants and left without informing any of his relations where he was going, and without making any provision for the appellants. The appellants were then taken to the house in Glasgow of Archibald Robson, whose wife was a sister of the appellants' deceased mother. This was done at Mrs Robson's request, in the expectation by her and her husband that the deceased would soon be heard of and that he would repay the sums expended on their maintenance. The said Archibald Robson thereafter maintained the appellants in the expectation that their father would recoup him when he returned. The only alternative was to send them to be inmates of the poorhouse, the Parish Council having refused outdoor relief. The said Archibald Robson from time to time made inquiries to discover the whereabouts of the appellants' father, but was unable to do so, and did not hear of him till after his death. The whereabouts of the appellants' father between the time when he deserted the appellants, as aforesaid, till 1st October 1909, has not been ascertained, but it is now known that on that date he went to live as a lodger in the house of John Smith, 2 Bothwell Street, Leith. He was then in a destitute condition, and for about six months thereafter he was able to obtain some employment, but did not earn sufficient to maintain himself, and he incurred considerable debt to the said John Smith for his board and lodging. He then got employment in a brewery as a fireman at a wage of £1 a week, and thereafter week by week repaid his indebtedness to the said John Smith for his board and lodging. In October 1910 he went to sea as a fireman on board the s.s. 'Drumlanrig,' at a wage of £4, 10s. a month. In the month of July 1911 he met with an accident on board said steamer, when his leg was broken, and he was laid up in hospital at Hamburg till the end of September 1911, when he returned to 2 Bothwell Street, Leith, and thereafter attended for treatment at the Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh. From the time of his return from Hamburg till he sailed on his last voyage, as after mentioned, he was in receipt of workmen's compensation in respect of said accident to his leg. During that period he for the first time informed his landlady, Mrs Smith, that he had two children, and he thereafter had frequent conversations with her regarding them, when he expressed his desire to have his children brought to 2 Bothwell

Dec. 10, 1912. Street, Leith, to live with him there, and his intention to maintain them. On one occasion during this time he stated his intention to go to Glasgow that day and bring his children to Mrs Smith's house, and would have then done so had he not been dissuaded from doing so by Mrs Smith, who advised him to delay doing so till he was able to do something towards repaying the sum due to Mr Robson for their maintenance. Shortly before he sailed from Leith on 1st December 1911, on board the s.s. 'Wingrove,' the deceased arranged with Mrs Smith that he would send her an allotment-note for £4 a month when the steamer arrived at Port Said, stating that the master of the steamer would not give an allotment-note before this time, and that Mrs Smith should then bring to her house his children (whose address he then gave to Mrs Smith), and should pay to Mr Robson £3 a month till the sum due to him was repaid, and apply the balance of £1 a month for the maintenance of the appellants in her house. Though the deceased John Dobbie knew of his obligation to support the appellants, and expressed an intention to support them, he as a matter of fact deserted them, and was on the date of his death, and had been for nearly three years, in desertion of them.

Dobbie v.
Egypt and Levant
Steamship
Co., Limited.

"In these circumstances, I found in fact and in law that the appellants were not dependent upon the earnings of the deceased John Dobbie, their father, at the time of his death, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and that the appellants were not entitled to compensation under the said Act in respect of his death. I therefore assolized the defenders, and found them entitled to expenses."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"On the facts above set forth—(1) Were the appellants dependent upon the earnings of their deceased father at the time of his death, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) Were the appellants wholly dependent upon the earnings of their deceased father at the time of his death, within the meaning of the said Act?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 23rd November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—In holding that the pursuers were not dependent upon their father the arbitrator had erred in law, because it could not be said there was no evidence of dependency, if at his death there was a probability of his discharging his legal obligation to support.¹ That the pursuers were not being supported by their father at the time of his death—on which fact alone the arbitrator had apparently proceeded—was not conclusive proof of the absence of dependency.² The case, accordingly, should be sent back to the arbitrator for consideration of the question whether it was probable that the children would have received support had the father lived.

Argued for the respondents;—The question of dependency was a pure question of fact for the arbitrator's decision, and in view of the facts which he had stated in the case, it was evident that he had all the probabilities and improbabilities of support clearly before him in deciding it. Therefore his decision was final, and the case should not be sent back to him for reconsideration. But even if the facts fell to be considered, they clearly justified the arbitrator's decision. The appellants having in fact received no support from their father, dependency upon him was excluded, because any prospect that they had of future support was too trifling to receive consideration.¹ The opinion of Lord Atkinson in the case of New Monckton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling,² was not really in point, because his Lordship referred, not to the probability of support being tendered, but to a different probability, viz., the probability of an obligation to support being enforced against a workman whose whereabouts was known.³

¹ New Monckton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling, [1911] A. C. 648, Lord Loreburn, L. C., at p. 649, Lord Atkinson, at p. 653; Coulthard v. Consett Iron Co., Limited, [1905] 2 K. B. 869; Lee v. Owner of the Ship "Bessie," [1912] 1 K. B. 83.

² Williams v. Ocean Coal Co., Limited, [1907] 2 K. B. 422; Stanland v. North-Eastern Steel Co., Limited, ibid., note, at p. 425. The Lord President referred to Bowhill Coal Co., Limited, v. Smith, 1909 S. C. 252.

Dec. 10, 1912.
Dobbie v.
Egypt and Levant
Steamship
Co., Limited.

At advising on 10th December 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After summarising the facts, and quoting the findings of the Sheriff-substitute and the questions of law]—Those questions are really wrongly stated. It is not for us to say whether the appellants were dependent either wholly or in part. It is now perfectly well settled that dependency is a question of fact and a question of fact alone, and it is for the Sheriff-substitute to say whether they were dependent or not. Now, if the Sheriff-substitute had simply found, as a matter of fact, on the facts I have stated, that the children were not dependent upon the father at all, I do not think we could have altered his decision, because, upon the facts as stated, it seems to me there was evidence upon which he could competently come to a conclusion that the children, as matter of fact, were not to any extent dependent upon the father. But the Sheriff has so worded his judgment that I am quite unable to say myself whether that is the result at which he has arrived. He has, as your Lordships see from what I have read, stated the simple fact of desertion, and then stated that in these circumstances he found in fact and in law that the children were not dependent. And therefore I cannot say whether he really went upon the fact—whether he valued, so to speak, the dependency as worth nothing—or whether he went upon the supposed legal proposition that if the father had, as a matter of fact, deserted the children for three years, that ended the whole matter. If the Sheriff-substitute did that, then I think he went upon a legal proposition which is clearly wrong.

I do not think there is any doubt as to the law upon this matter. I think it is absolutely settled by what the House of Lords said in the case of New Monckton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling.⁴ In that case the House of Lords upheld a view that had been previously taken in this Court,⁵ namely, that dependency was a question of actual fact, and that that actual fact was not settled by a consideration of the legal proposition

¹ Young v. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 644, Lord Justice-Clerk, at p. 650.

² [1911] A. C., at p. 653.

³ Lee v. The Owner of the Ship "Bessie," [1912] 1 K. B. 83, Farwell, L.J., at pp. 91-2; Briggs v. Mitchell, 1911 S. C. 705, Lord Dundas, at p. 708.

⁴ [1911] A. C. 648.

⁵ Baird & Co., Limited, v. Birsztan, (1906) 8 F. 438, followed in Briggs v. Mitchell, 1911 S. C. 705.

Dec. 10, 1912. of obligation of either the husband to the wife or the parent to the child. But, on the other hand, the existence of that legal obligation has of course a very strong bearing upon the fact. A man is, according to his circumstances, more or less likely to fulfil his legal obligations, and, if he is likely to fulfil this legal obligation to support, then that points to an actual fact of dependency. But the result of that is not only that the question is not a mere question of legal obligation, but also that you cannot entirely turn your eyes to the past and hold them quite shut to the future—the point of time with regard to which I speak of past and future being, of course, the date of the death of the parent or husband as the case may be. That is quite clearly put by Lord Atkinson in Keeling's case,¹ where he says: “the existence of the obligation, the probability that it will be discharged, either voluntarily or under compulsion, the probability that the wife will ever enforce her right if the obligation be not discharged voluntarily, are all matters proper to be considered by the arbitrator in determining the question of fact whether or not the wife at the time of her husband's injury, looked to his earnings for her maintenance and support in whole or in part. It is one of the many elements to be taken into account.” And when that case came to be applied by the Court of Appeal in *Lee v. Owner of Ship “Bessie,”*² the matter is exceedingly clearly put by Lord Moulton (as he is now) in two sentences. He first of all summarises Keeling's case³ in a single sentence. He says (at p. 88): “In my opinion the effect of this decision is that legal obligations to support must not be taken at their theoretic value but at their practical value.” And then he says again: “If on the evidence there is any fair probability that the legal rights would, at any future time, have been actually and effectually asserted by the wife, then there is evidence of dependency.” In another passage his Lordship applies Keeling's case³ to the case of children, where he says (at p. 89), “In my opinion . . . the decision of the House of Lords in *New Monckton Collieries, Limited, v. Keeling,*³ although it does not refer to the case of infant children, logically carries with it the result that in their case the County Court Judge is bound to consider the practical value of the father's legal obligation to support them, and that if he comes to the conclusion that there is a reasonable probability that this will be enforced in the future he is entitled and bound to hold them to be dependants and to award compensation accordingly.”

Now, I think that all those passages, with which I respectfully concur, really bring the matter to this—It is a question of fact, and it is a practical question. In a case like this, so far as the past is concerned we must consider what support the children have been in fact getting. They have been getting nothing; therefore the past is gone. So far as the future is concerned one must make a valuation of what one thinks the dependency is worth in the whole circumstances. Now, in this case I do not wish to prejudge the learned arbitrator in this matter. I think he is entirely master of the situation. If he came to the conclusion that in the whole circumstances of this case the probability of getting £1 in the future, after £3 out of the £4 had been otherwise applied, was practically worth nothing, I Dec. 10, 1912. think he could competently so find. But I do not know whether he has found so or not. What he undoubtedly must find is some answer to the question that is implicitly put by subhead (a) (ii.) of paragraph (1) of the First Schedule, which says this: "If the workman does not leave any such dependants, but leaves any dependants in part dependent upon his earnings, such sum, not exceeding in any case the amount payable under the foregoing provisions, as may be agreed upon, or, in default of agreement, may be determined, on arbitration under this Act, to be reasonable and proportionate to the injury to the said dependants." I am treating this, of course, as a case of partial dependency, because I think it is perfectly clear on the facts that the arbitrator never would come to the conclusion that there was total dependency. What he would value the partial dependency at, I cannot say.

¹ [1911] A. C., at p. 653.

² [1912] 1 K. B. 83.

³ [1911] A. C. 648.

Dobbie v.
Egypt and Levant
Steamship
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

I think, upon the whole matter, that we cannot answer the questions as put, and that the case must go back to the arbitrator in order that he may indicate the ground of his decision. He may repronounce his decision if he wishes, or he may do otherwise. But I think it would not be just to the pupil children not to send the case back, because I think it is impossible to say whether the arbitrator has gone upon the view of fact and fact alone—and if he has done so I do not think that Keeling's case¹ touches the result he has arrived at—or whether he has gone upon the proposition in law that when you find that as a matter of fact a father has deserted his children for three years and paid nothing towards their support during that period, that necessarily ends the matter, a proposition which, so stated, is not in accordance with the authorities.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship on the simple ground put by Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton in the case of Lee,² in the passage already read, in which his Lordship says that the legal obligation of support must be taken not at its theoretic but at its practical value. It is because I am not quite sure, from the way in which the case has been stated, that the Sheriff-substitute dealt with the matter upon that footing, that I agree that the case must go back. The arbitrator has an entirely free hand to dispose of the matter as he thinks just.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—
"Refuse to answer the questions of law as stated in the case:
Sustain the appeal: Recall in hoc statu the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator, and remit the cause back to him to reconsider his judgment."

T. M. POLE, Solicitor—BOYD, JAMESON, & YOUNG, W.S.—Agents.

¹ [1911] A. C. 648.

² [1912] 1 K. B. 83.

No. 52. THE SCHOOL BOARD OF GLASGOW, First Parties.—Constable, K.C.—

D. P. Fleming.

Dec. 10, 1912.

ELIZA SPENCE ALLAN, Second Party.—Murray, K.C.—

J. R. Christie.

Glasgow
School Board
v. Allan.

School—Powers of School Board—“Medical examination and supervision” of pupils—Provision of medical or dental treatment—Education (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 63), secs. 4 and 6.

Held that the power conferred on school boards by sec. 4 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1908, to provide, out of the school fund under their administration, for the medical “examination and supervision” of pupils attending school, did not authorise them to provide medical or dental “treatment.”

1ST DIVISION. ON 5th November 1912 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court by the School Board of Glasgow, first parties, and Eliza Spence Allan, the testamentary trustee of James Allan senior, ironfounder, Glasgow, second party, with reference to the right of the first parties to make provision, out of the school fund under their administration, for medical or dental treatment of pupils in schools within their district.

The case stated as follows:—

“1. The parties of the first part are the School Board of Glasgow. The party of the second part, as trustee foresaid and also as an individual, is a ratepayer liable to contribute to the assessed school rate in respect of heritable properties of substantial rentals within the area for which the first parties are the School Board.

“2. [Reference was made to sections 4, 6, and 17 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1908.*]

* The Education (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 63), enacts:—
Sec. 4. “A school board may, and where required by the Department shall, provide for the medical examination and supervision of the pupils attending schools within their district to such extent and subject to such requirements as may from time to time be prescribed by any code or minute of the Department, and, for the purposes of this section, the school board may employ medical officers or nurses, or arrange with voluntary agencies for the supply of nurses, and provide appliances or other requisites. It shall be a condition of grant to the managers of any school within the district of the school board at which there is not provision to the satisfaction of the Department for the medical examination and supervision of the pupils, that such managers shall give admission and all necessary facilities for the discharge of his duties to any person so employed or supplied.”

Sec. 6. “(1) When as the result of medical inspection or otherwise it is brought to the notice of a school board that a child attending a school within their district is in a filthy or verminous state, or is unable by reason of lack of food or of clothing to take full advantage of the education provided, it shall be the duty of the school board, after due warning, to summon either or both of the parents or the guardian of such child to appear before them to give an explanation of the child's condition, and, if the school board shall find that such explanation is not forthcoming or is insufficient or unsatisfactory, and that the condition of the child is due to neglect, they shall transmit a copy of such finding to the parent or parents or guardian of the child and to the procurator-fiscal, and it shall be the duty of the procurator-fiscal to institute a prosecution under the subsection immediately following.

“(2) Without prejudice to the general operation of the Prevention of

"3. The Scotch Education Department issued a memorandum on Dec. 10, 1912, 31st March 1909,* dealing with the medical examination and supervision of school children. This memorandum is printed as an appendix to this special case, and its terms are to be held as if fully incorporated by quotation herein. It was sent to the first parties along with a circular letter which requested them to prepare a scheme for the approval of the Department, and thereafter the first parties formulated a scheme which was duly approved. On 18th April 1912 the Scotch Education Department issued a circular which is also

Glasgow
School Board
v. Allan.

Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 (4 Edw. VII. cap. 15), or any Act amending the same, neglect to exercise due care of a child as aforesaid shall be deemed wilful neglect likely to cause the child unnecessary suffering within the meaning of such Act, punishable summarily as an offence of cruelty in terms of such Act, and subject to the provisions thereof as to the committal and custody of the child and otherwise:

"Provided that if it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the school board, or in the event of a prosecution under such Act of the Sheriff, that such parent or parents or guardian are unable by reason of poverty or ill-health to supply sufficient and proper food or clothing for the child, or to give the child the necessary personal attention, the school board, if satisfied that the necessities of the case will not be provided for by voluntary agency, shall make such provision for the child out of the school fund as they deem necessary during such period while the child is under obligation to attend school as they may determine: But it is hereby provided that any aid given in terms of this section shall not deprive such parent or guardian of any franchise, right, or privilege, or subject him to any disability:

"Provided also that the school board, where they deem it necessary owing to the condition of the child, shall have power to make temporary provision for the child out of the school fund pending the completion of the procedure hereby prescribed; and to recover the cost of such provision from such parent or guardian as an alimentary debt, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the school board that such parent or guardian was unable by reason of poverty or ill-health to supply sufficient and proper food or clothing for the child, or to give the child the necessary personal attention."

Sec. 17, subsec. (6). "Where under section 4 of this Act a school board provide for the medical examination and supervision of the pupils attending schools within their district in accordance with a scheme prepared by the committee, or where a school board district is co-extensive with the district of a committee by the school board, and in either case approved by the Department, there shall be paid in each year to the school board a sum equal to one half of the cost incurred by them in making such provision."

* The memorandum contained, inter alia, the following clause:—

"5. Amelioration and Physical Improvement.

"The object of medical inspection would be defeated if the examination stopped short at the mere discovery of diseases and defects. The school boards have powers to enforce attendance at school, but effective attendance at school presupposes the physical and mental fitness of the child to profit by the education offered, and, therefore, if a child is found, for any reason, unfit, the school board are entitled to require of the parent or guardian that all necessary measures shall be taken to remedy any defects, and to have any diseases properly treated. Where the parents or guardians fail the school board are themselves empowered, in certain cases, to take full personal charge of the child, and do what is needed to restore him to a condition of fitness for effective attendance."

Dec. 10, 1912.

Glasgow
School Board
v. Allan.

printed in the appendix hereto and held to form part of this case.* It is admitted that such part of the £7500 referred to in the latter circular as may be allocated to the first parties will be inadequate to meet the whole cost of medical or dental treatment, of the nature hereinafter specified, required by necessitous children attending schools within the district of the first parties.

"4. The first parties have had to deal, inter alia, with the cases of two children who, on examination, were found to be in urgent need of the treatment aftermentioned. The particulars of one of the cases are as follows:—Teresa M'Veigh, aged 7½ years, daughter of and residing with James M'Veigh, boot finisher, 79 Ladywell Street, Glasgow, a pupil in St Mungo's Roman Catholic School, Glasgow, was found, when examined medically, to require the extraction of several temporary and permanent teeth. The condition of the child's teeth was such as to cause injury to her health and to necessitate immediate treatment by a skilled dentist, and to render the child incapable of taking full advantage of the education provided by the first parties. In this case the parent of the child was in such financial circumstances as to be able to provide the child with the dental treatment required.

"5. The particulars of the other case are as follows:—Mary Norman Ferguson, aged 6½ years, daughter of and residing with John Young Ferguson, white lead worker, 96 Oran Street, Maryhill, Glasgow, a pupil in Eastpark Public School, was found, when examined medically, to require the extraction of several temporary teeth and the filling of four permanent teeth. In addition, it was found that two of her permanent teeth were misplaced. In this case also the condition of the child's teeth was such as to cause injury to her health and to necessitate immediate treatment by a skilled dentist. Further, the chief medical officer of the first parties reported that it rendered her incapable of taking full advantage of the education provided by the first parties. These facts having been brought to the knowledge

† The circular of 18th April 1912 was in the following terms:—

"I am directed to inform you that a sum of £7500 has been assigned for the purpose of medical treatment of school children in Scotland.

"I am to remind you that the expenditure of school boards on medical inspection under section 4, Education (Scotland) Act, 1908, is being aided by grants under section 17 (6). The further grant now available is to be applied mainly for the medical treatment of necessitous children in terms of section 6.

"The Department have under consideration the question of how this grant can be most equitably and most usefully distributed, and it would materially assist their deliberations if you can let them know, at your early convenience, and in any case not later than 10th May, what amount (if any) your board have expended during the year ended 31st ultimo in providing medical treatment for necessitous children under section 6, Education (Scotland) Act, 1908, and also what amount (if any) they estimate that they may require to expend in a similar way during the year ending 31st March 1913.

"The Department are at the same time prepared to consider the question of making grants in aid of open-air schools for children suffering from tuberculosis or other ailments requiring open-air treatment or in aid of any similar arrangement for improving the health of school children. They will be glad to have before them the proposals of any boards which may be contemplating arrangements of the special character indicated."

of the first parties, they made inquiry and satisfied themselves—and it is the fact—that the parent of the child was unable, on account of poverty, to provide the child with the dental treatment required, and that the necessities of the case would not be provided for by voluntary agency. Dec. 10, 1912.
Glasgow
School Board
v. Allan.

"6. The first parties, considering that they were entitled to provide and pay out of the school fund under their administration for the dental treatment required by the children, proceeded to arrange for the children receiving the same at places outside the school and from persons not on the ordinary school medical staff, when they were threatened with an action of declarator and interdict at the instance of the second party, who contended that the first parties had no power to do what they proposed. The effect of such provision and payment would be to throw the cost of the treatment, in whole or in part, upon the school rate, for which the second party is assessed.

"7. The cases of Teresa M'Veigh and Mary Norman Ferguson, before mentioned, are typical of many cases which are discovered in the course of the medical examination of children conducted by the first parties. In such cases children are discovered to be in a condition requiring individual medical or dental treatment, and in many of these cases the parents are unwilling or unable, by reason of poverty or ill-health, to provide the necessary medical or dental treatment.

"8. The first parties maintain that they are entitled to provide, and to pay out of the school fund under their administration, for the appropriate medical or dental treatment required in such cases, either (a) by providing the necessary apparatus and medical staff at one or more schools or other places, or (b) by sending the children to be treated by competent private practitioners or at hospitals or infirmaries; and that at all events they are entitled to do so in cases where the parent is unable, on account of poverty or ill-health, to provide the necessary medical or dental treatment. With reference to the cases of Teresa M'Veigh and Mary Norman Ferguson, the first parties maintain that they are entitled to provide and pay for the dental treatment required by them, as aforesaid.

"9. The second party, on the other hand, maintains that the first parties are only entitled to provide for the medical examination and supervision of pupils attending schools within their district. She maintains that the first parties are not entitled to expend the school fund under their control or any part thereof in providing for individual remedial medical or dental treatment, which, consequent on said medical examination or supervision, may be found to be required by pupils attending such schools, either generally or even in cases where the parent is unable, on account of poverty or ill-health, to provide same, so as to throw the cost or any part thereof upon the rate-payers assessed for school rates; and in particular that the first parties are not entitled to provide medical or dental treatment in the manner stated in their contention. With reference to the particular cases of Teresa M'Veigh and Mary Norman Ferguson, the second party maintains that the first parties are not entitled to provide the dental treatment indicated at the expense of the school fund."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Where any pupil in a school within the district of the first parties requires individual medical or dental treatment, are the first parties entitled to provide and pay out of the school fund under their administration for such medical or dental treatment, either (a) by providing the necessary apparatus

Dec. 10, 1912.
Glasgow
School Board
v. Allan.

and medical staff at their own schools or other places, or (b) by sending the children to private practitioners or to hospitals or infirmaries? (2) If the first question be answered in the negative, are the first parties entitled to make provision and payment as aforesaid in cases where the parent is, by reason of poverty or ill-health, unable to provide the necessary medical or dental treatment? (3) In the case of the child Teresa M'Veigh above referred to, are the first parties entitled so to provide and pay for the dental treatment required by her? (4) In the case of the child Mary Norman Ferguson above referred to, are the first parties entitled so to provide and pay for the dental treatment required by her?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 15th November 1912.

Argued for the first parties;—Section 4 of the Act of 1908¹ gave school boards powers of "medical examination and supervision." "Supervision" necessarily involved providing medical treatment; and that this was intended was clearly shown by the terms of section 6, which enacted that, if required by the necessities of the case, a school board might make "provision" for a child out of the school fund. It was also to be inferred from the language of section 4 with reference to the supplying of "nurses" and "appliances," which could only be required if treatment were to be provided. That this was the intention of the Legislature was clearly seen if reference were made to the analogous provisions of the English Education (Administrative Powers) Act of 1907.² Further, the memorandum issued by the Department stated that "the object of medical inspection would be defeated" if it were not followed up by further attention, and the circular of 18th April stated that the grant of £7500 therein referred to was assigned for, and was to be applied to, the "medical treatment" of school children in Scotland.³

Argued for the second party;—Section 4 of the Act was quite explicit in its terms, and gave powers of medical examination and supervision only. That could only mean examination and supervision in school, and could not be held to imply medical treatment at home or elsewhere. The only extension of that power given by section 6 was with reference to children in a filthy or verminous state or insufficiently fed or clothed. Had it been intended by the Legislature that school boards should have power to supply medical treatment out of the school fund, this would certainly have been made the subject of express provision. In the absence of any such provision it would be an unwarrantable extension of the phraseology of the Act to supply that power by inference; and, accordingly, all the questions should be answered in the negative.

At advising on 10th December 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This special case has been brought to determine the powers of the School Board of Glasgow as to expending the money raised by rates in providing for the dental and medical treatment of children attending the Board Schools. Two concrete cases are put before us, viz., those of two little girls whose teeth are in a bad condition, and who, if treated by a skilled dentist, would in both cases be in need of teeth extraction and teeth stopping, and in one case also in need of a plate in the Dec. 10, 1912. mouth. The only difference between the two cases is that in one case the parents are able to employ a dentist if they choose, while in the other case they are unable, owing to poverty, to do so. The questions, however, as put to us are general and, in view of the widespread operations of the School Board, important.

¹ 8 Edw. VII. cap. 63.

² 7 Edw. VII. cap. 43, sec. 13 (1) (b).

³ Sec. 17 (6) of the 1908 Act was also referred to.

Glasgow
School Board
v. Allan.

The powers of the School Board in such matters are admittedly contained in the Education (Scotland) Act of 1908. The sections to which the School Board particularly appeal are sections 4 and 6. Section 4 reads thus:—[His Lordship quoted the section]. Now, it is certain that what the School Board is thereby empowered, and bound if required by the Department, to provide is medical examination and supervision of children. Accordingly, it is somewhat instructive to find that in the questions put to us those framing the case have really found it impossible to express—and I do not blame them—what the School Board really contend for without substituting for the words “examination and supervision” the word “treatment.” And a very short answer at once suggests itself, viz., that “supervision and examination” are one thing and “treatment” is another, and that if Parliament had meant “treatment” it could easily have said so.

This view is, I think, enforced by two considerations, one, so to speak, intrinsic, and the other extrinsic, of the phraseology of the Act. The first will be understood by looking at section 3, which is a comprehensive section, detailing what may be called the general powers of the School Board. The first subsection deals with education in general, the other subsections deal with things which are not educational in themselves, but are each in their own way helpful to education. Then, look at subsection (2), which deals with the supply of meals. If it had been intended to authorise the School Board to incur expenditure, and to defray it out of the school fund, in providing for the medical and surgical treatment of children—for dentistry is just a branch of surgery—I cannot help thinking there would have been a section corresponding to subsection (2). The other consideration is found in reflecting upon the enormous expense which might be incurred if the contention of the School Board were correct. There is no half-way house in this matter so far as power is concerned. It means the whole expense of the medical and surgical treatment of all children of school age. It is no answer to say that the School Board may be trusted not to act foolishly and extravagantly in such a matter. The point is, did Parliament entrust to an educational body the power of incurring enormous expense and charging it against the ratepayers, leaving it to the educational authorities to determine whether an obligation which has hitherto been regarded as lying on the parent should be placed upon the public generally? It is, to say the least, unlikely that this would be done by words which need, so to speak, sedulous construction to bear that meaning, when plain and appropriate words would suggest themselves to the veriest tyro in draughtsmanship.

It is said, however, that if we examine section 4 more closely, then, notwithstanding such general considerations, we shall be driven to the conclusion that “examination and supervision” include “treatment.” In the first place, it is urged that this is the natural inference to be drawn from Dec. 10, 1912. the words "may employ medical officers or nurses, or arrange with voluntary agencies for the supply of nurses, and provide appliances or other requisites." This seems to me to go a very short way. These phrases are just as consistent with the ordinary meaning of "examination and supervision" as with the extended interpretation which is now sought to be put upon them. The School Board cannot examine and supervise the children themselves, they must have others to do it. A medical "officer" is the appropriate term for an official who is to examine and supervise. It is not an appropriate term for a doctor who is to treat. It is evident that for examination at home, of a certain sort, a nurse may be much less expensive and just as efficient as a doctor, and it is quite unnecessary to draw from the term "nurse" the idea that there is to be attendance during sickness. And lastly, the word "appliances" may easily and naturally be taken to refer to the provision of laryngoscopes, auriscopes, &c., for the examination of children in a room at school.

Next, it is pointed out that the provision for medical examination and supervision is to be to such extent, and subject to such requirements, as may from time to time be prescribed by any code or minute of the Department, and it is said that the Department has authorised the kind of expenditure here contended for. Now it must be obvious that whatever be the true construction of the words, "medical examination and supervision," it is only as to that that the Department can prescribe the "extent" and the "requirements," so that if a minute or code of the Department did enlarge the meaning of the words, "medical examination and supervision," it would be ultra vires. A minute or code of the Department with an accompanying memorandum was issued on 31st March 1909, and has been printed as an appendix to this case. As I have already said, nothing therein contained could really affect the question to be decided, but, as it has been mentioned and commented on, I think it is only fair to the Department to say that I cannot find in it the slightest justification for the wider contention pleaded. It is possible, by taking single phrases away from the context, to pick out expressions which might seem to contemplate treatment of school children at home by the school authorities; but, taking the document as a whole, it seems to me to be carefully worded, and not to go a whit beyond recommendations in connection with proper inspection and supervision. I would refer particularly to the passage dealing with the provision of spectacles as necessarily inconsistent with the idea that the School Board should itself provide them. I would refer also to the way in which other Acts of Parliament are prayed in aid, which would not be necessary if the School Board had the powers contended for. And there are many other passages which point in the same direction.

We were also referred to a circular of 18th April 1912 dealing with a sum of £7500, which, the letter bears, "has been assigned for the purpose of medical treatment of school children in Scotland." The letter asks, ". . . what amount (if any) your board have expended during the year . . . in providing medical treatment for necessitous children under section 6" of the Act of 1908. I think the phrase is an unfortunate one, for it is absolutely clear that section 6 deals exclusively with the case of children who are (first) in a filthy or verminous state, or (second) who are underfed or underclothed, and does not deal with medical treatment at all, except to Dec. 10, 1912. the limited extent that medical treatment may be necessary for a verminous child. But, as I have already indicated, this circular cannot affect the mean-^{Glasgow} School Board ing of the statute. It must also be remembered that if the House of ^{v. Allan.} Commons choose to put a sum in the estimates, commit that sum to the Ld. President. Department, and allow them to spend it, it would need no statutory authority to allow a school board to spend the money for the purpose for which it was given them. It is a different thing when they propose to raise more money and charge it on the rates. No department and no resolution of the House of Commons can authorise them to do that. They must find that power in an Act of Parliament.

Accordingly, in my opinion, section 6 does not extend the scope of section 4, or give in any way independently of that section the power that is here contended for.

The only other section alluded to in the argument was section 17 (6), but that merely repeats the words of section 4. I am therefore of opinion that we should answer all the questions in the negative.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

The Lord President intimated that LORD JOHNSTON, who was absent at advising, concurred.

THE COURT answered all the questions of law in the negative.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—DUNCAN MACLENNAN, Solicitor—Agents.

HEGARTY & KELLY, Pursuers (Respondents).—Chree, K.C.—Paton.
THE COSMOPOLITAN INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Morison, K.C.—Wark.

No. 53.

Dec. 10, 1912.

Contract — Breach — Rescission — Arbitration — Exclusion of arbitration clause by rescission of contract.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

A contract between an insurance company and a firm of cattle salesmen, for the insurance of cattle sold by the firm, contained an arbitration clause providing that any dispute between the parties as to the construction of the contract should be referred to an arbitrator, and that "no action shall be maintainable against the insurers except upon" the award of such arbitrator. The insurers, having taken exception to certain actings of the firm, declined to do further business with them. The firm replied that they would continue to insure live stock on the insurers' account in terms of the contract.

In an action of damages at the instance of the firm against the insurers for breach of contract, the question whether there had been breach of contract or not depended on the construction to be put upon a certain clause of the contract. The defenders maintained that the construction of this clause fell to be determined by arbitration before any action of damages could be maintained.

Circumstances, in which held (rev. judgment of Lord Skerrington) that the parties had not treated the contract as rescinded, and, accordingly, that the arbitration clause was still binding; and action sisted that the construction of the clause in dispute might be determined by arbitration.

Municipal Council of Johannesburg v. D. Stewart & Co. (1902), Limited, 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 53, distinguished.

Dec. 10, 1912. ON 28th June 1910 Hegarty & Kelly, live-stock agents, Glasgow, brought an action against the Cosmopolitan Insurance Corporation there, in which they concluded for £6000 (restricted to £4500), as damages for breach of contract.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

1st DIVISION.
Lord
Skerrington.

The contract referred to was constituted by minute of agreement entered into between the pursuers, therein described as the sellers, and the defenders, therein described as the insurers, dated 2nd and 3rd March 1909. The terms of the minute of agreement, so far as material to the present report were as follows:—

“Now these presents witnesseth that the insurers hereby agree to pay the full value of all insured home-bred (i.e., bred in the United Kingdom) live-stock sold by the sellers for killing purposes that may be condemned as being unfit for human food, at the following rates, viz.:— . . . And the parties also agree upon the following conditions, viz.:— . . .

“IV. This agreement to be in force for three years from 1st March 1909. . . .

“VI. The sellers shall observe the following further conditions:—

(a) The sellers shall warrant all fat cattle and pigs sold by them to pass the authorised meat inspectors subject to the conditions herein-after stated. . . . (n) The sellers shall exercise all due discretion regarding the risks undertaken by them on behalf of the insurers, and shall decline to insure any animal which, in their opinion, is suffering from disease. And

“VII. Any dispute or difference between the insurers and the sellers as to the construction of this agreement, or any matter arising out of or in connection with the same, shall be referred to a single arbitrator, to be mutually chosen or, failing agreement, to be appointed by the Court on the application of either party, and the award of such arbitrator shall be final, and no action shall be maintainable against the insurers except upon such award.”

The circumstances out of which the action arose were as follows:— By letters of 1st, 6th, 13th, and 23rd September 1909 the insurers formulated complaints to the sellers of their failure to observe the terms of Article VI. (n) of the agreement, in respect that they were selling an undue number of animals that were afterwards condemned; and they, the insurers, claimed the right to insure only such animals as should be passed by their representative at the sales, a veterinary surgeon. In reply the sellers wrote repudiating entirely the interpretation put upon the agreement by the insurers.

On 9th October 1909 the insurers wrote to the sellers as follows:— “We have your memo. of 8th inst., together with cheque value £153, 15s., but regret we must return the latter, and same is enclosed herewith. We are compelled to decline further business in view of your total disregard of our letters of 1st, 6th, 13th, and 23rd September last, all of which we confirm.”

The sellers replied on 11th October as follows:—“We are in receipt of your communication of 9th Oct., with enclosure as advised. We regret the attitude you take up with reference to the contract entered into between your Corporation and this firm, which leaves but one alternative open to us. The adoption of this course is not pleasant to us, and, before taking further steps in the matter, we give you the opportunity of reconsidering your decision, and shall be pleased to return our cheque to you, on your applying for same. Meantime, we shall continue to insure live stock on your account in terms of the contract." The insurers then wrote suggesting the nomination of an arbitrator "to determine the questions which have arisen." Dec. 10, 1912.

Thereafter Mr William Gillies, writer, Glasgow, was appointed arbitrator to determine these questions, and proof in the arbitration proceedings was fixed for 17th March 1910. On the morning of the proof the insurers sought to amend their condescendence and claim by including therein an averment that the sellers were in breach of Article VI. (a) of the agreement, in respect that they failed to warrant (and so to insure) all fat cattle sold by them at their sales. The arbitrator disallowed the amendment, on the ground that it raised a question which was not submitted to him under the minute of reference.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

On 9th June 1910 the arbitrator issued his decree-arbitral in which he found that the sellers had not, in any of the ways claimed by the insurers in their condescendence and claim, committed a breach of the agreement, but that the agreement still subsisted, and that both parties were bound to perform their respective parts of it for its full course of three years. He further found that the insurers were not entitled by their representative to reject animals put forward for insurance; that they were not warranted in refusing to implement the agreement after 9th October 1909, and were therefore in breach of the agreement; and found them liable in expenses.

On 18th April 1910 the insurers had written to the sellers as follows:—"In view of the fact which has recently come to our knowledge, and which has been admitted by you in the proof in the arbitration presently before Mr Gillies, that you have not insured all the fat cattle, which in your opinion were not diseased, sold by you for killing purposes since the commencement of the contract between us, we beg to intimate that you have thereby broken the contract. On that ground—which, notwithstanding of our contention to the contrary, Mr Gillies has held is not covered by the reference to him—quite apart from other grounds maintained in the reference, the contract is at an end." After the arbitrator had issued his proposed findings, though before his final decree, the sellers' agents wrote to the insurers' agents asking if they were prepared to pay the damages due, and stating that if the damages were not paid, they were instructed to initiate proceedings in the Court of Session for payment. The insurers' law-agents replied as follows:—"In respect that your clients were in breach of the contract, as mentioned in our clients' letter to your clients of 18th ult., of a date prior to the alleged breach of contract on our clients' part, there can be no damage due your clients as now claimed. On the contrary, our clients maintain that your clients are liable to them in damages, the claim for which is meantime reserved. As you are already aware, our clients desired to raise this question in the arbitration, and were denied an opportunity of doing so. They accordingly intend to challenge the arbiter's award."

The insurers thereafter brought an action in the Court of Session for reduction of the decree-arbitral, on the ground that the arbitrator was wrong in refusing to allow the amendment referred to above. The Lord Ordinary, holding that the arbitrator was justified in his refusal, dismissed the action, and, on a reclaiming note, the First Division, on 9th December 1911, adhered.

The present action of damages, which had been brought on 28th

Dec. 10, 1912. June 1910, immediately after the final decree-arbitral was issued, but which had been sisted pending the decision of the action of reduction, was then awakened and the sist recalled.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

In their condescendence the pursuers (the sellers) quoted the defenders' letter of 9th October 1909, and averred:—"The defenders on said date refused, and since said date have continued to refuse, to implement said contract, and at said date they were in breach of contract in respect that they then refused to accept further premiums or to pay any losses arising out of said contract. Since said date, and until the raising of the present action, the defenders have never withdrawn from the position that they repudiated the contract, and that the same was at an end." They also referred to the arbiter's award, and averred:—"The defenders have finally repudiated said contract, and the present action of damages in respect of their breach has accordingly been rendered necessary. The defenders having repudiated said contract, and refused to recognise in any way said arbiter's award, and having declined all further business with the pursuers, the pursuers have been compelled to treat and have treated said contract as being now at an end, and, as after stated, have made other arrangements for protecting themselves against risks arising in connection with their sales of insured cattle." They also denied that they were in breach of Article VI. (a) of the agreement, and explained that they had customers who would not buy insured cattle and that:—"The words 'all fat cattle and pigs' occurring in clause VI. (a) of the said contract were used as meaning 'all fat cattle and pigs which may be sold as insured by the sellers,' and this was the meaning contemplated and intended by both parties to the contract."

In their answers the defenders averred that the pursuers were in breach of Article VI. (a) of the agreement in respect that they were in the habit of selling fat cattle without warranting them and therefore as uninsured. They also averred that they themselves had all along been willing to refer the whole matters in dispute to arbitration, and that the pursuers were bound to refer the present dispute to arbitration, and to obtain the arbitrator's award thereon as a condition precedent to maintaining an action of damages for breach of contract against the defenders.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders, being in breach of their contract with pursuers as condescended on, are liable to the pursuers for the loss and damage thereby sustained and to be sustained by them. (2) The pursuers, having suffered loss and damage as condescended on in consequence of said breach, are entitled to be compensated by defenders therefor, and the said loss and damage being reasonably estimated at the sum sued for, the pursuers are entitled to decree accordingly. (3) The defenders having repudiated said contract of insurance, are barred from now founding upon its terms.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent in respect it is not laid upon an award of an arbitrator finding that the position taken up by the defenders in their letter of 9th October 1909 was not justified by the facts. (2) The action is excluded by the arbitration clause in the contract founded on, and should accordingly be dismissed. (6) The pursuers being in breach of the contract founded on are barred from maintaining the present action.

On 5th July 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defenders: Allows the record to be amended in terms of the minutes of amendment for defenders and pursuers respectively, Nos. 19 and 20 of process: Opens up the record in order that said amendments may be made, and the same having been made, of new closes the record: Allows parties a proof before answer of their averments, and to the pursuers a conjunct probation, on a day to be afterwards fixed: Reserves all questions of expenses." * Dec. 10, 1912.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are a firm of live-stock agents, and the defenders are an insurance company. On 2nd and 3rd March 1909 the parties entered into a somewhat obscure written agreement, which was to remain in force for three years, and which was intended to indemnify the pursuers against loss arising from the live stock which they sold for killing purposes being condemned as unfit for human food. I do not need to explain how it came about that the pursuers, as auctioneers, were interested in the fate of the animals which they sold. . . .

"In the present action the pursuers claim £6000 (restricted to £4500) in name of damages through the defenders having since 9th October 1909 refused to do any business with the pursuers or to insure any of their live stock. The defence is primarily founded upon the 7th clause in the insurance agreement:—'Any dispute or difference between the insurers and the sellers as to the construction of this agreement, or any matter arising out of or in connection with the same, shall be referred to a single arbitrator, to be mutually chosen or, failing agreement, to be appointed by the Court on the application of either party, and the award of such arbitrator shall be final, and no action shall be maintainable against the insurers except upon such award.' The defenders' first plea in law is:—'The action is incompetent in respect it is not laid upon an award of an arbitrator finding that the position taken up by the defenders in their letter of 9th October 1909 was not justified by the facts.'

"The dispute, which in the defenders' view ought to be decided by arbitration, arises out of clause 6 (a) of the insurance agreement, which, as the defenders construe it, bound the pursuers to pay premiums upon all the live stock which they sold, and did not entitle them to insure the bad and doubtful animals, while refusing to pay premiums upon the good ones. The defenders' sixth plea in law is that 'the pursuers being in breach of the contract founded on are barred from maintaining the present action.' The defenders' advisers seem to have had so much confidence in their first plea that they did not think it necessary to make their averments in support of this sixth plea with proper specification or in such a form as to elicit a reply from the pursuers. Accordingly, the defenders will require to amend their pleadings if, contrary to their contention, the present action is held to be competent.

"I am unable to hold that in the circumstances disclosed and admitted in the pleadings, the present action is incompetent. However wide a construction one may put upon the arbitration clause, the fact remains that at the date when the present action was instituted (28th June 1910) the pursuers held (as they still hold) a decree-arbitral, dated 9th June 1910, by which the arbiter (Mr Gillies) found 'that the said Hegarty & Kelly did not in any of the ways claimed by the said The Cosmopolitan Insurance Corporation, Limited, in the said condescendence and claim commit a breach of the said agreement, but that the said agreement still subsists, and that the said The Cosmopolitan Insurance Corporation, Limited, and the said Hegarty & Kelly are bound to perform their respective parts of the said agreement for its full course of three years from 1st March 1909 as therein provided; . . . and further, I find that the said Cosmopolitan Insurance Corporation, Limited, were not warranted in refusing to implement their part of the said agreement from and after 9th October 1909,

Dec. 10, 1912.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 13th and 14th November 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers (defenders);—The award of an arbitrator finding that there had been breach of this contract was a condition precedent to any action for recovery of damages therefor.¹ There had been no breach of contract on the part of the defenders, and there had been no repudiation thereof such as might bar them from founding upon the arbitration clause, and therefore the circumstances were distinguishable from those in *Municipal Council of Johannesburg v. D. Stewart & Co. (1902), Limited.*² Even if the defenders had intended by their letter of 9th October 1909 to renounce the contract, their intention would have been defeated, because renunciation by one party did not amount to rescission of a contract,³ and the pursuers had not adopted the renunciation, but by their letter of 11th October 1909 had clearly refused to accept it. The pursuers having adopted and are therefore in breach of said agreement.' It is true that the arbiter did not adjudicate upon the particular dispute which I have already explained, because he considered, and (as the Court afterwards decided) rightly considered, that he had no jurisdiction to do so. The question whether the present pursuers had contravened article 6 (a) of the insurance agreement was raised by the present defenders for the first time on 16th March 1910, the day before the proof in the arbitration, whereas Mr Gillies (and subsequently the Court) held that by the terms of the minute of reference of 10th and 16th November 1909, his jurisdiction was limited to the decision of the disputes which were in existence at the last-mentioned date. The defenders protested against the arbiter's decision upon this point, and after the issue of his award they unsuccessfully attempted to reduce it upon the ground that he had refused to decide a question which was within the submission. The summons of reduction was signeted on 20th June 1910 and was finally dismissed by the Inner House on 9th December 1911. Pending this action the present action of damages was sisted, but the sist was recalled on 15th December 1911. From the foregoing statement it is, I think, apparent that when the present action was instituted the defenders had never made any competent demand upon the pursuers to submit to arbitration the new dispute as to the pursuers' alleged violation of article 6 (a) of the insurance agreement. I do not require to consider how the rights of parties would have stood if, immediately on the issue of the decree-arbitral, the defenders had intimated that they acquiesced in it, and if they had then called upon the pursuers to join with them in a new reference to an arbiter. Instead of taking this course the defenders persisted in their erroneous contention that the new dispute had already been submitted to Mr Gillies. In these very special circumstances I am of opinion that the pursuers were entitled to sue upon the award in their favour, and that they were entitled to treat the defenders as persons who refused to go to arbitration before a new arbiter.

'The defenders' second plea in law raises somewhat awkwardly the question whether, assuming the action to be competent, I ought not to sist process until the dispute as to the pursuers' alleged breach of contract has

¹ Caledonian Insurance Co. v. Gilmour, (1892) 20 R. (H. L.) 13, Lord Chancellor Herschell, at p. 15, Lord Watson, at p. 18; Scott v. Avery, (1855) 5 H. L. C. 811, Lord Chancellor Cranworth, at pp. 847-849, Lord Campbell, at pp. 853-4; Anstruther v. Burns, (1894) 1 S. L. T. 421; Hamlyn & Co. v. Talisker Distillery, (1894) 21 R. (H. L.) 21.

² 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 53, Lord Shaw, at p. 56.

³ Johnstone v. Milling, (1886) 16 Q. B. D. 460, Lord Esher, M.R., at p. 467.

that attitude, were barred from now maintaining that the contract was at an end in order to avoid the operation of the arbitration clause. If there was a material breach of contract by one party the other might either rescind the contract altogether, or might hold to it and claim damages; but if he took the latter course—as the pursuers were doing here—he was then bound by all its terms, including the arbitration clause.¹

Dec. 10, 1912.
Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

Argued for the respondents (pursuers);—The question raised by the pursuers' averment that the defenders had repudiated their contract was one for the determination of the Court, and until it was decided, the defenders were not entitled to appeal to the arbitration clause.² Further, that clause could not stand in the way of the present claim for damages, because by the defenders' repudiation of the contract and refusal to fulfil their part of it, the pursuers were forced to make other arrangements, and were accordingly relieved of all the

been decided by arbitration. The pursuers' counsel argued that, although a question had arisen as to the construction of article 6 (a), that question did not fall to be decided by arbitration, because admittedly the arbitration clause does not empower the arbiter to assess damages, and because the arbiter is entitled to construe the contract only so far as is necessary in order to explicate his own jurisdiction. The Court took this view in the case of Mackay v. Leven Police Commissioners, 20 R. 1093, but the arbitration clause there was not identical with that now under construction. He also argued that the clause was executorial only and could have no further effect seeing that the contract time expired on 1st March 1912. I am not prepared to sustain either of these contentions. If both parties had treated the contract as binding and subsisting for the whole period of three years, and if their only dispute had been whether the defenders were justified in having refused during these years to insure a particular kind of stock, e.g., sheep, as not being 'live stock' within the meaning of the agreement, I should have thought that the question whether the defenders were liable in damages ought to be decided by arbitration, in spite of the fact that the arbiter could not assess the damages and in spite of the fact that the contract period had now expired. The peculiarity in the present case is that the defenders' position ever since October 1909 has been a complete refusal to insure any of the pursuers' live stock. That looks very like a repudiation of the contract on the part of the defenders, but I do not propose to pronounce any decision to that effect, because the position taken up by the pursuers and also the arbitration proceedings may have to be considered in their bearing on the question of repudiation. The safer course is to allow the pursuers a proof of their averments including those in support of their third plea in law, 'The defenders having repudiated said contract of insurance, are barred from now founding upon its terms.' That was the course adopted by the House of Lords in the case of Johannesburg v. Stewart, 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 53. If it be the fact that either justifiably or unjustifiably the defenders have refused to fulfil their part of the contract, prima facie I should think that they cannot demand specific performance of the arbitration clause. If they were right in the dispute and acted justifiably, then the defenders will be assoizied in the present action of damages, and can in their turn sue the pursuers for

¹ Pollock on Contracts (8th ed.), 621; Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon, & Co., (1884) 9 App. Cas. 434, Lord Chancellor Selborne, at p. 439; Turnbull v. M'Lean & Co. et c contra, (1874) 1 R. 730, Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, at p. 738.

² Municipal Council of Johannesburg v. D. Stewart & Co. (1902), Limited, 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 53.

Dec. 10, 1912. contractual obligations arising under it, including those imposed by the arbitration clause.¹

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

At advising on 10th December 1912,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—The only point argued on this reclaiming note was whether the question now in dispute between the parties should be settled by arbitration, or whether the pursuers are entitled to the proof which the Lord Ordinary has allowed. Now, the nature of the present dispute turns upon the proper construction to be put upon clause VI. (a) of the contract.—[His Lordship read that clause and the arbitration clause, and continued]—In the previous arbitration between the parties, the Cosmopolitan Insurance Corporation, Limited, the insurers, had proposed to raise by amendment the question whether Hegarty & Kelly were bound, on a construction of VI. (a), to pay premiums to them on all fat cattle and pigs sold by them, or whether they were entitled to sell certain of these without insurance. The position of Hegarty & Kelly upon clause VI. (a) was that it is permissive and not obligatory in its terms, and did not prohibit them from selling cattle uninsured. The arbiter refused to allow the amendment, and your Lordships have held by interlocutor of 9th December 1911 that he was within his rights in taking this course. This question has therefore never been considered or determined, and the reference clause in the contract applies in terms to such a dispute as the present.

The difficulty which the pursuers seek to introduce into the case arises on their averment that the defenders repudiated—to use their phrase—the contract, and that they are entitled to a proof of this. Their argument upon this point was really founded solely upon the case of The Municipal Council of Johannesburg v. D. Stewart & Company (1902), Limited.² I think this argument proceeded on a misapprehension of the term repudiation. If one party to a contract is in breach of it as regards a stipulation which goes to the root of the contract, the other party has the option of rescinding the contract. If he does, then the contract with all its clauses goes, and amongst them the clause providing for a reference to arbiters. In the view taken in the House of Lords the facts averred in the Johannesburg case² were of a character to bring that case within this category. In the present case it sufficiently appears, in my opinion, without any proof, that the parties never treated the contract as rescinded. The pursuers found upon damages. On the other hand, if the defenders were in the wrong in refusing performance, the damages due to the pursuers will be assessed in the present action.

“I repel the defenders' first plea in law, and I allow the record to be amended as proposed by the defenders in their minute and by the pursuers in their answers thereto. I close the record of new, and before answer I allow the parties a proof in common form. I do not repel the defenders' second plea in law as it is possible that the agreement for arbitration may still be held binding upon the parties, though not as a condition precedent to the present action.”

¹ Shiells v. Scottish Assurance Corporation, Limited, (1889) 16 R. 1014; Leake on Contracts (6th ed.), §39; Ripley v. M'Clure, (1849) 18 L. J., Exch. 419; M'Donald v. Kydd, (1901) 3 F. 923; Munro v. M'Geogha, (1888) 16 R. 93.

² 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 53.

the letter which the defenders wrote to them on 9th October 1909 stating Dec. 10, 1912. that they were compelled to decline further business in view of the pursuers' total disregard of certain of their previous letters. These were the letters which raised the questions in dispute in the previous arbitration. The reply to this was dated 11th October and contains this passage: "Meantime we shall continue to insure live stock on your account in terms of the contract." On 13th October the defenders wrote to the pursuers that they had nothing to add to their letter of the 9th inst., except to invite them to concur in nominating a suitable arbitrator as provided by the agreement to determine the questions which had arisen. These were the questions which were disposed of in the previous arbitration. Messrs Hegarty & Kelly were thus at this date treating the contract as a going contract. This is entirely in harmony with what they wrote on the 14th September 1909: "We have a good-going plain-worded contract which admits of only one interpretation, is valid for three years, and any breach of the whole, or part of which, will involve the committal of the whole matter into a Court of law." The arbiter endorsed this view when he found by his decree-arbital that the agreement still subsisted, and that both parties were bound to perform their respective parts of the agreement for its full course of three years from 1st March 1909.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

On the 18th of April 1910 the defenders wrote to the pursuers that in view of the fact which had recently come to their knowledge, and which was admitted in the proof in the arbitration, that they had not insured all the fat cattle, they intimated that they had broken the contract, and that on that ground, apart from other grounds maintained in the reference, the contract was at an end. Messrs Hegarty & Kelly did not assent to this view, and on 28th June 1910 raised the present action to recover damages for the difference between the rates at which they had been compelled to insure as compared with those agreed on with the defenders.

The action was sisted on the 18th of October 1910. After the decision in the action of reduction the sist was recalled. As I understood the argument put by pursuers' counsel, they founded not on the letter of the 9th October 1909 alone, but on the fact that the defenders did not say that they were going to the arbiter to see if they were entitled to end the contract or not. The question, however, whether they were entitled to take up the position they did in their letter of 9th October 1909 is just the question of which party is right in the construction to be put upon clause VI. (a) of the contract.

In such circumstances as these the judgment in the case of *Johannesburg*¹ does not help the pursuers, and the expressions of opinion in it do not apply to the facts of this case. The arbiter in this case has not power to award damages, but the question whether the defenders are liable in damages or not depends upon the view whether they are in breach of contract. In my opinion the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and the case sisted that parties may go to the arbiter and get him to decide the dispute between them as to the proper construction to be put upon clause VI. (a).

¹ 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 53.

Dec. 10, 1912.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. Lord Watson, in the House of Lords, in the case of Hamlyn & Company v. Talisker Distillery,¹ says this:—"The jurisdiction of the Court is not wholly ousted by such a contract"—viz., the contract to submit the matter in dispute to arbitration. "It deprives the Court of jurisdiction to inquire into and decide the merits of the case, while it leaves the Court free to entertain the suit, and to pronounce a decree in conformity with the award of the arbiter. Should the arbitration from any cause prove abortive, the full jurisdiction of the Court will revive, to the effect of enabling it to hear and determine the action upon its merits. When a binding reference is pleaded in limine, the proper course to take is either to refer the question in dispute to the arbiter named or to stay procedure until it has been settled by arbitration. The latter course was adopted in Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company,² where the reference was to arbiters unnamed, but had been confirmed by statute. I cite that case, not as establishing, but as illustrating, the rule of procedure, which was in force long before its date."

Now, in the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company,² the extent of the arbitration clause was as follows:—"All differences which may arise between the parties hereto respecting the true meaning or effect of this agreement, or the mode of carrying the same into operation. . . ." I think that is about as near the clause in the present case as one could well wish, for the clause here reads thus:—"Any dispute or difference . . . as to the construction of this agreement, or any matter arising out of or in connection with the same, shall be referred to a single arbitrator."

I humbly think that that law, which is treated by Lord Watson as being the well-established law of Scotland, and of which a previous illustration may be found in Lord Rutherford Clark's opinion in the case of Mackay v. The Parochial Board of Barry,³ was not altered—as was pled to us—by the judgment of the House of Lords in the Johannesburg case.⁴ In the Johannesburg case⁴ it was held that the contract had been so thoroughly repudiated that it was gone altogether. But I concur with Lord Mackenzie in the distinction he has drawn between the Johannesburg case⁴ and this case. I would also beg leave to repeat what I said in the North British Railway Company v. Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company,⁵ to the effect that, although there are traces in the Johannesburg case⁴ of a doctrine which seems to be good law in England, and which I assume was rightly applied in the Johannesburg case⁴—a case in which the whole stipulations fell to be construed by English law—viz., the doctrine that the Court may apply the arbitration clause or not, as it thinks right in the circumstances, such a doctrine is wholly alien to the law of Scotland. If there is a binding reference, then to the tribunal which the parties have thus chosen the parties must go, and the Court has no dispensing power.

¹ 21 R. (H. L.) 21.² (1883) 10 R. 1046.³ 10 Macph: 892.⁴ 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 53.⁵ 1911 S. C. 710.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Dec. 10, 1912.

The Lord President intimated that LORD JOHNSTON, who was absent at advising, also concurred.

Hegarty &
Kelly v.
Cosmopolitan
Insurance
Corporation,
Limited.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—
“Recall said interlocutor in so far as it repels the first plea in law for the defenders and allows proof: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor: Sist the cause to allow the parties to determine by arbitration the true meaning of clause VI (a) of the contract between them.”

MAXWELL, GILL, & PRINGLE, W.S.—J. & J. GALLETTY, S.S.C.—Agents.

RICHARD DARROLL, Appellant.—Moncrieff, K.C.—Fenton.
THE GLASGOW IRON AND STEEL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—
Horne, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

No. 54.

Dec. 10, 1912.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (16)—Review of weekly payments—Industrial disease—Recovery—Susceptibility to recurrence—Question whether susceptibility due to original attack—Onus of proof.

Darroll v.
Glasgow Iron
and Steel Co.,
Limited.

In an application by employers for the ending or diminishing of a weekly payment of compensation it was proved that the workman, after being duly certified as suffering from miner's nystagmus (an industrial disease), was awarded compensation, that he had “now completely recovered from this attack,” but that he was susceptible to a recurrence of the disease. It was not proved whether the susceptibility was due to the original attack or to constitutional predisposition, the evidence being inconclusive.

Held that, as the workman had recovered from the original attack, and as he had failed to discharge the onus which lay on him of proving that his susceptibility to recurrence of the disease was due to that attack, the compensation fell to be ended.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, under a minute presented by the Glasgow Iron and Steel Company, Limited, craving review of a weekly payment of 8s. 10d. made by them to Richard Darroll in respect of nystagmus acquired by him while employed as a miner at their Parkneuk Colliery, Motherwell, the Sheriff-substitute at Hamilton (Shennan) ended the compensation and, at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The case set forth:—

“The respondents desire to have the weekly payment of compensation ended or diminished in respect it is alleged that the incapacity of the said appellant for work for which the said weekly payment was awarded has entirely ceased, or at least has become greatly lessened.

“Proof was taken before me on 29th July 1912, when the following facts were admitted or proved:—(1) The appellant having been duly certified as suffering from miner's nystagmus from 3rd September 1910, was paid full compensation at the rate of 13s. 10d. per week down to 27th October 1911. (2) On 27th October 1911, in proceedings for review instituted by the respondents, the appellant's compensation was reduced to 8s. 10d. per week on the ground that he was fit for

Dec. 10, 1912.

Darroll v.
Glasgow Iron
and Steel Co.,
Limited.

surface work of a limited character. (3) The medical witnesses for both parties concurred in stating that Darroll has now completely recovered from this attack of nystagmus. No one could now detect that he has ever suffered from nystagmus, and he has good sight. (4) The medical witnesses on both sides also agreed in thinking that it would be unwise for Darroll to resume work underground, because of the danger of a second attack of nystagmus, but the evidence was inconclusive as to the cause of this liability to recur. On the one side, the opinion was given that the liability to recur was due to the constitutional predisposition of the appellant, which the first attack merely revealed. On the other side, the opinion was expressed that the first attack left a condition of susceptibility to subsequent attacks. The evidence was entirely in the region of opinion and was inconclusive.

"I held that the onus was on the appellant to prove that his present susceptibility to a recurrence of nystagmus is due to the attack of September 1910, from which he has now recovered. As he had failed to discharge this onus and had completely recovered from the first attack, I ended his compensation."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Was the onus on the appellant to prove that his existing susceptibility to a recurrence of nystagmus is due to his previous attack? (2) On the facts stated was the appellant's compensation rightly ended?"

The case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 26th November 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—Nystagmus was an industrial disease under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,¹ and was equivalent to an injury caused by accident.² The certificate required by section 8 (1) merely determined that the workman was suffering from an industrial disease, and did not otherwise affect the adjustment of compensation and everything incidental thereto.³ It was found as a fact that the appellant was still liable to a recurrence of the disease, and this amounted to "incapacity" within the meaning of the Act.⁴ No employer knowing of the appellant's susceptibility would ever give him work, and this inability to obtain work, being due to a cause personal to the appellant following on an "accident," entitled him to compensation.⁵ The only difficulty in the case lay in the question upon whom the onus rested of proving the connection, or want of connection, between the original attack of the disease and the liability to a recurrence. The answer was that the onus rested upon the party

¹ 6 Edw. VII. cap. 58, sec. 8; Statutory Rules and Orders, No. 407, May 22, 1907.

² Jones v. New Brynmally Colliery Co., Limited, (1912) 5 B. W. C. C. 375, per Cozens-Hardy, M.R., at p. 378.

³ Garrett v. Waddell & Son, 1911 S. C. 1168, per Lord Johnston, at p. 1172.

⁴ Thomas v. Fairbairn, Lawson, & Co., Limited, (1911) 4 B. W. C. C. 195.

⁵ Carlin v. Stephen & Sons, Limited, 1911 S. C. 901, per Lord Salvesen, at p. 907; Duris v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 74; Ball v. William Hunt & Sons, Limited, [1912] A. C. 496, also reported as footnote to Duris, 1912 S. C. (H. L.), at p. 77; Garnant Anthracite Collieries, Limited, v. Rees, (1912) 5 B. W. C. C. 694; Clelland v. Singer Manufacturing Co., (1905) 7 F. 975.

who was the true pursuer in the issue before the Court.¹ In the present case the onus was on the employers, since they were applying for review of an existing award, and it was for them to show a change of circumstances.² Jones v. New Brynmally Colliery Company,³ relied on by the respondents, was distinguishable, because that was the case of an application at the instance of a workman, where the burden of proof lay on him and he failed to discharge it.

Dec. 10, 1912.
 Darroll v.
 Glasgow Iron
 and Steel Co.,
 Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—The appellant was originally found entitled to compensation because he was certified to be suffering from an industrial disease. But the arbitrator had found as a fact that the man had “completely recovered” from that attack. This exhausted the effect of the certificate, and on the strength of that finding the employers were entitled to have the compensation ended. It was not disputed that susceptibility to nystagmus, if it was due to the original attack, would be a good ground for claiming compensation, but it would be a new ground, and the workman would have to establish it by evidence. This he had failed to do, and the compensation accordingly fell to be ended. The case was ruled by Jones v.
New Brynmally Colliery Company, Limited,³ and M’Ghee v. Summerlee
Iron Company, Limited,⁴ and was distinguishable from Garnant Anthracite Collieries, Limited, v. Rees,⁵ where the susceptibility to recurrence was proved to be due to the previous attack, and from M’Callum v. Quinn,⁶ where the employers failed to prove that the workman had ever recovered.

At advising on 10th December 1912,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—By statutory rules passed under authority of the Workmen’s Compensation Act an affection of the eyes to which miners are liable, and which is called nystagmus, is placed in the category of accidents falling under the statute. This affection is one from which complete recovery is possible, so that a miner who has suffered from it may be found in a condition in which he is quite fit to resume his work. Such is the case now before us. We are informed that the arbitrator has found it to be proved by the evidence of the medical witnesses, both for the appellant and the respondents, that the appellant has now “completely recovered from this attack of nystagmus,” and that “no one could now detect that he has ever suffered from nystagmus,” and that “he has good sight.” In ordinary circumstances such findings would be conclusive against the appellant. The employer, in applying for an ending of the compensation, discharges the onus resting upon him by bringing evidence to the satisfaction of the arbitrator that there has been complete recovery from the attack, just as he would discharge the onus in a case of injury by accident if he proved complete restoration to present health and strength. The proof of being well and fit for work is all he is called on to establish.

¹ M’Callum v. Quinn, 1909 S. C. 227; Borland v. Watson, Gow, & Co., 1912 S. C. 15.

² Higgins v. Poulson, [1912] 2 K. B. 292, per Cozens-Hardy, M.R., at p. 294; M’Ewan v. William Baird & Co., Limited, 1910 S. C. 436; Cory Brothers & Co., Limited, v. Hughes, [1911] 2 K. B. 738.

³ 5 Butterworth’s W. C. C. 375.

⁴ 1911 S. C. 870.

⁵ 5 Butterworth’s W. C. C. 694.

⁶ 1909 S. C. 227.

Dec. 10, 1912. On the other hand, it is true that although a man may be able for his work he may, in certain circumstances, be entitled to resist the ending of the compensation if there is a proved liability to recurrence of evil consequences of the original injury; in short, that recovery, though complete at the present time as regards present health and capacity, may not be complete as regards probable emerging consequences, causing breakdown of existing capacity, such breakdown being directly associated with the original evil, as effect with cause. But if such a case for not ending the compensation is to be made out, it rests with the workman to make it good; the burden of proof of such a case rests upon him. He cannot call upon the employer to prove a negative,—viz., to prove that if he gets another attack of the disease it will not be a result of the previous attack. If the workman who is proved to have recovered his capacity is not as a consequence to have the door closed on him, it is he who must take action to keep it open. He must show cause by proof that he is entitled to have it kept open.

Darroll v.
Glasgow Iron
and Steel Co.,
Limited.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

In this case can it be said that the appellant has brought such proof? I do not think it can. What is found is not fact, but rather that fact is unascertainable. It is true that the medical opinion on both sides is to the effect that it would be unwise for the appellant to resume work underground, because he might again be attacked by nystagmus. But this, which is of course only opinion of what may be, is not based on any distinct ground. On the one hand it is suggested that the man has a constitutional predisposition to this particular disease, on the other that the attack left the sufferer in a condition of susceptibility which might lead to another attack. But the arbitrator felt himself quite unable to give a finding of fact one way or the other; he merely found that the evidence was entirely in the region of opinion, and was inconclusive, and therefore he held that the appellant had not discharged the burden of proof which rested on him. This being so, the arbitrator has ended the compensation. I am of opinion that his decision was right, and that no other course was open to him.

I consider that the present case is a fortiori of the case of M'Ghee.¹ There a development of evil had taken place for the second time, but, as it was not possible to prove in fact that the new development was a result of the original accident, the workman was held not entitled to succeed. It is also important to notice that in the case of Jones,² the workman, who had suffered from an attack of the same disease as the workman in this case, and who had recovered but was found susceptible to a recurrence of the disease, failed in his application for an award of compensation because he did not prove that his susceptibility was due to the original attack. The whole matter turns on what is to be proved and who is to prove it. A tendency to a recurrence of evil may be incapacity under the Act, but unless the workman can prove that such tendency is connected with the original evil condition produced by the accident—as in this case by the attack of nystagmus—the employer cannot be called on to pay any further compensation. Should it happen that a miner in the position of the appellant returns to work, and that he has another attack of nystagmus, he would, of course, have his claim for an award—as for a new injury producing incapacity—against the employer in whose employment he then be; just as a workman who has recovered from an accident can have a claim for compensation if he has the misfortune to meet with another injury when at work.

¹ 1911 S. C. 870.

² 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 375.

Dec. 10, 1912.
Darroll v.
Glasgow Iron
and Steel Co.,
Limited.

LORD DUNDAS.—This case raises purely a question of onus probandi. It arises out of an application by the employers to have a weekly payment of compensation to the appellant—a miner named Darroll—ended or diminished, in respect that his incapacity has entirely ceased, or at least become greatly lessened. The essential facts are few and simple. Darroll, having been duly certified as suffering from miner's nystagmus as from 3rd September 1910, was paid full compensation at the rate of 13s. 10d. per week down to 27th October 1911. On this latter date, in proceedings for review instituted by the employers, the compensation was reduced to 8s. 10d. per week, on the ground that Darroll was fit for surface work of a limited character. As the result of the proof in the present application the learned arbitrator found—“(3) The medical witnesses for both parties concurred in stating that Darroll has now completely recovered from this attack of nystagmus. No one could now detect that he has ever suffered from nystagmus, and he has good sight.” Counsel for the employers contended, and I think rightly, that the primary onus incumbent upon them as applicants is sufficiently discharged by this finding of the man's complete recovery from the attack which had incapacitated him. But the point of the case is raised by the arbitrator's fourth finding, which bears that “the medical witnesses on both sides also agreed in thinking that it would be unwise for Darroll to resume work underground because of the danger of a second attack of nystagmus, but the evidence was inconclusive as to the cause of this liability to recur.” It is further explained in the finding that the evidence, which was inconclusive and entirely in the region of opinion, left it open whether the liability to recurrence of nystagmus was due to a constitutional predisposition, or to a susceptibility to subsequent attacks left by the first attack.

The appellant's counsel urged that it was for the employers to prove that the liability to recurrence of nystagmus was not due to the previous attack; and that, as they had failed to do so, the compensation could not be ended. I think this contention is wrong. It seems to me that when the employers have proved the man's complete recovery from the original attack of nystagmus the onus probandi shifts to the workman to prove, if he can, that any liability to a second attack which may exist is a direct consequence of the first. This view appears to me to be in accordance with reason and good sense, and I think it is supported by authority. In M'Ghee v. Summerlee Iron Company, Limited,¹ the employers sought to have the compensation reviewed and ended, and they discharged their primary onus probandi by producing the certificate of a medical referee, conclusive as at its date, that the man was then fit to work as a miner. The workman

¹ 1911 S. C. 870.

Dec. 10, 1912, pleaded that he had, since the date of the certificate, again become incapacitated, and was, and would be for the future, unfit for his work. The arbitrator made a remit to a medical referee, who reported that M'Ghee was again incapacitated and unfit for his former work as a miner; that he was fit for work on the surface; and that the reporter could not say whether M'Ghee's present incapacity was the result of his accident. The arbitrator held that the onus lay on the workman to prove that the supervening incapacity was due to the accident, and that he had failed to do so; and ended the compensation. The Court upheld the arbitrator's decision on the ground that the employers having by the medical referee's certificate established the man's recovery (as the employers here have done, looking to the terms of the third finding), the onus fell upon the workman to prove that the supervening incapacity was due to the accident, just as in an original application he must show that his incapacity is due to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. An earlier case—*M'Callum v. Quinn*¹—where the facts were peculiar and rather complicated, was distinguished. The employers were unsuccessful in their application for review, because, as the rubric bears, they had failed to prove that the workman had recovered from his injuries. That that was the proper and sufficient ground of judgment in Quinn's case¹ appears clearly from Lord M'Laren's opinion; but I must frankly say that my own brief observations in the case seem to have been erroneously expressed. A decision bearing even more closely upon the point than M'Ghee's case² is to be found in Jones v. New Brynmally Colliery Company.³ A workman who had suffered from miner's nystagmus had recovered, but was unable to resume his old employment by reason of his liability to recurrence of the disease. The County Court Judge awarded compensation; but the Court of Appeal held that, in the absence of evidence that the liability to such recurrence was due to the previous attack, the award of compensation could not be sustained. Cozens-Hardy, M.R., observed: "There was no evidence that he [the workman] was rendered, by reason of the past nystagmus, liable to a recurrence of nystagmus, and unless that can be made out it seems to me that the applicant must fail." Buckley, L.J., said that the County Court Judge "found that he [the workman] was now quite well, but that if he resumed occupation underground he would not continue to be quite well. But he does not find, which I think is the crucial fact to be found, that if he went back underground the recurrence would be attributable to the previous attack of nystagmus. In the absence of any evidence to that effect, and I find none, I think that this compensation cannot be sustained." It seems to me that this English case was rightly decided, and that it is in no material way distinguishable from that now before us. Still more recently, in Garnant Anthracite Collieries, Limited, v. Rees,⁴ the opinions expressed in Jones's case³ were approved by the Court of Appeal, though their decision went in favour of the workman, because the County Court Judge had found that the effects of the attack of nystagmus had not in fact disappeared, and that

¹ 1909 S. C. 227.

² 1911 S. C. 870.

³ 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 375.

⁴ 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 694.

the man's subsequent susceptibility to further attack was therefore attributable to the first. I think we are not here at all in the region of cases like Daris,¹ which the appellant's counsel pressed upon our attention. The appellant is not, in my judgment, entitled to plead that his sphere of employment is restricted by his susceptibility to a recurrence of nystagmus, for the simple reason that he is unable to connect that susceptibility, as effect with cause, with his original attack.

On the grounds now stated I agree with the reasoning and the conclusions which are thus expressed by the learned arbitrator in the case before us: "I held that the onus was on the appellant to prove that his present susceptibility to a recurrence of nystagmus is due to the attack of September 1910, from which he has now recovered. As he had failed to discharge this onus, and had completely recovered from the first attack, I ended his compensation." The two questions put to us should, in my opinion, be answered in the affirmative.

I ought, perhaps, to add a few words in regard to a topic mooted, but not exhaustively argued, during the discussion at our bar. Miner's nystagmus, though not among the industrial diseases specified in the Third Schedule to the Act of 1906, has been brought within the scope of the Act by the statutory rules and orders of 1907. The point mooted was whether or not such an industrial disease is precisely equivalent to a personal injury by accident, so that the whole statutory consequences must be held to follow as much in the one case as in the other. The question might open a large field; it seems already to have been the subject of divergent judicial opinions—see *Jones*²; it may come up sharply hereafter for decision; and it is unnecessary in the present case to decide it. In these circumstances I desire to reserve my opinion upon the matter.

LORD SALVESEN concurred.

THE COURT answered both questions of law in the affirmative.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

(Poor) CATHERINE E. FLORENCE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Paton.
GEORGE SMITH, Defender (Respondent).—Lippe.

No. 55.

Dec. 11, 1912.

Process—Mandatory—Defender and Respondent in appeal abroad but within British Dominions.

Florence v.
Smith.

In March 1912 Poor Catherine E. Florence brought an action of affiliation and aliment against George Smith, bank-clerk, Dundee, in the Sheriff Court at Dundee. On 26th July 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Neish) assoilzied the defender. The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and thereafter lodged a note in which she stated that "the defender and respondent has been out of the country for some weeks," and craved the Court to ordain him to find caution or to sist a mandatory. On the case appearing in the Single Bills of

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

¹ 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 74.

² 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 375.

Dec. 11, 1912. the Second Division of 11th December 1912, counsel for the appellant moved in terms of the prayer of the note.¹

Florence v.
Smith.

It was stated at the bar that the respondent had intended to leave this country before the action was brought; but that he had remained to await the issue of the action, and had, since being assoltized in the Sheriff Court, left for South Africa where he had obtained an appointment.

THE COURT—after delivering opinions in which they founded on the circumstances that the respondent (1) had been assoltized in the Sheriff Court, (2) had left the country bona fide for the purpose of his business, and (3) was within the jurisdiction of a Court of the British Dominions—refused the prayer of the note hoc statu.

CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—DOUGLAS & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 56.

MRS AGNES HUGHES AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—
Crabb Watt, K.C.—A. M. Mackay.

Dec. 11, 1912.

ROBERT C. ROBERTSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Wilson, K.C.— D. M. Wilson.

Hughes v.
Robertson.

Process—Proof or jury trial—Averments of pursuer stating competent and incompetent grounds of action—Danger of jury being misled—Several pursuers—Non-community of interest.

Reparation—Solatium—Unauthorised post-mortem examination.

In an action of damages brought against a doctor by the widow and children of a deceased miner the pursuers averred (1) that the defender had made an unauthorised post-mortem examination of the body of the deceased; and (2) that, in consequence of the method in which it had been performed and of certain other actings of the defender, difficulty, delay, and expense had been incurred in prosecuting a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Some of the pursuers were not persons entitled to compensation under the Act. The issue proposed and allowed by the Lord Ordinary for the trial of the cause by jury was whether the defender "did wrongfully make a post-mortem examination and dissection of the body of the deceased."

Held that, while the action was competent (and was appropriate for jury trial) in so far as founded on the wrong done to all the pursuers jointly by the unauthorised post-mortem examination, it was incompetent in so far as founded on the second wrong which affected certain of them only; and, the pursuers having declined to amend their record by deleting the averments which related to the second wrong, issue refused and case sent to trial before a Judge, in view of the likelihood of a jury confusing the competent and incompetent grounds of action.

1ST DIVISION. ON 28th June 1912 Mrs Agnes Hughes, widow of Thomas Hughes, miner, Kilmarnock (as an individual, and also as tutor and administrator-in-law of his five pupil children), and his five other children, of whom four resided with their mother, and the fifth, Mrs Ledger-

¹ The following authorities were referred to:—For the appellant.—D'Ernesti v. D'Ernesti, (1882) 9 R. 655; Aitkenhead v. Bunten & Co., (1892) 19 R. 803. For the respondent.—Mackay's Manual, p. 235; Bank of Scotland v. Rorie, (1908) 16 S. L. T. 130; Young v. Carter, (1906) 14 S. L. T. 411, (1907) 14 S. L. T. 829.

wood, resided with her husband, brought an action of damages against Dr Robert C. Robertson, Kilmarnock. Dec. 11, 1912.

The pursuers averred that Thomas Hughes, on 31st May 1911, was injured in the abdomen by a fall of coal in a pit belonging to the Caprington and Auchlochan Collieries, Limited, with whom he was employed as a miner; that he was removed to the Kilmarnock Infirmary where he died on 7th June 1911, and that the defender, a surgeon in the infirmary, thereafter made a post-mortem examination and dissection of the body wrongfully, illegally, and without the consent and contrary to the expressed wishes of the pursuers. Hughes v.
Robertson.

They further averred:—(Cond. 6) "Shortly before his removal to the infirmary the deceased Thomas Hughes instructed an intimation and claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, to be made against his employers, the Caprington and Auchlochan Collieries, Limited. The said intimation and claim were made on or about the 6th of June 1911 by the pursuer Michael Hughes on his behalf. Following upon the said intimation and claim, an arbitration under the said Act was instituted after Hughes's death by the pursuer Mrs Hughes on behalf of the dependants of Thomas Hughes, and upon 20th March 1912 Sheriff-substitute Mackenzie, as arbitrator therein, pronounced a finding that Hughes's death was caused by injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and awarded the dependants a sum of £196, 6s. sterling as compensation. The sum so awarded was compensation provided by Act of Parliament for the loss of means of support resulting to the dependants from the said accident. . . ." (Cond. 8) "The defender is and has been familiar with compensation claims and other legal claims arising out of accidents in connection with the industry of coal mining. He was, accordingly, bound to understand from the circumstances stated, and he did in fact understand, that a question or questions of legal liability depended upon the determination of the cause of Hughes's death. All such questions within the district in question, and particularly those arising with Hughes's employers, are conducted on the employers' behalf by the Ayrshire Coalowners' Association, for whom the defender has regularly and constantly acted as chief medical and surgical expert in contested cases for at least the past ten years. The defender had accordingly a strong interest in respect of his connection with the Caprington and Auchlochan Collieries, Limited, and the other coalowners belonging to the said association to ascertain whether the origin of the inflammatory condition of Hughes's intestines could be ascribed to any other origin than that of accident in the course of his employment, and to procure and preserve evidence, if such were forthcoming, to that effect. It is believed and averred that, on or about Tuesday, 6th June 1911, he formed the desire and intention, arising from his said interest, to procure a further examination of the body of Thomas Hughes, to be conducted after the death of Hughes by himself. It is further believed and averred that his object in so desiring was to collect, if possible, and preserve evidence pointing to a cause of death other than accident in the mine. . . ." (Cond. 12) "In the course of the said illegal proceedings certain portions of the body of the said Thomas Hughes were removed by the defender from the rest, and, in particular, the whole affected portion of the intestines and the heart were so removed. These portions were not, as they ought to have been, replaced in situ, but were, by the instructions, or at least with the assent and authority of the defender, taken away and burned or destroyed or otherwise dealt with for the purposes of the infirmary. Thereafter, the incomplete body was carried to the home of the pursuer Mrs Hughes, and deposited there. . . .” (Cond. 13) “As a consequence of the said illegal proceedings the pursuers have suffered severely in their feelings, and the defender is liable to them in reparation therefor. In particular, the pursuer Mrs Hughes, who was already in deep grief, was greatly distressed and shocked when she learned what had transpired, and when the mutilated body of her husband was brought home to her house. The notion of a mutilated body only being left to her was extremely repugnant and horrifying, and she became ill and was confined to the house for some days in consequence. The other pursuers and the pupil children, for whom the pursuer Mrs Hughes sues as tutor, also suffered similarly in their feelings, and are entitled to solatium for the wrongous and illegal actings of the defender. Moreover, by reason of the said wrongous and illegal actings of the defender, and the destruction of most important articles of evidence thereby sanctioned, and by the dealings of the defender with the report after-mentioned, the pursuers, other than Mrs Ledgerwood, who were all dependants of the deceased Thomas Hughes, have been made to endure an unnecessary amount of anxiety, delay, and expense in obtaining the compensation to which they were justly entitled. Inter alia, the solicitors for the deceased’s trade society were authorised by its officials to inquire into the circumstances with a view to taking action on behalf of the relatives, if such were justified, and for that purpose, after ascertaining that a post-mortem had already been made, to instruct a fresh one on behalf of the said society. They did so, but in consequence of the previous mutilation of the body by the defender the result was purely negative. In consequence, they felt themselves bound to advise the said society to withdraw their financial support, and the relatives were consequently at the necessity of finding fresh agents, and of instructing the prosecution of a claim on their own behalf. This in their impoverished circumstances they found it very difficult to effect, and in the result a much longer time elapsed before they could establish their rights, and more expense was incurred than would have been necessary but for the defender’s illegal actings. . . .” (Cond. 14) “ . . . Within a few days of the said post-mortem examination the defender prepared, and obtained the signatures of the two other medical gentlemen to, a report of the result of the post-mortem examination, and sold the same to the agents of the said Ayrshire Coalowners’ Association, whom he knew to be acting in the interests of the Caprington and Auchlochan Collieries, Limited, and who had an adverse interest to that of the pursuers who were dependants of Hughes. Further, upon application being made to the defender on behalf of the pursuer Mrs Hughes for information as to the whereabouts and as to the condition of the missing parts, he replied in terms importing that the examination was conducted on behalf of the said Coalowners’ Association, and that the report thereof was consequently their property. The pursuers understood this (as it was intended to be understood) as a refusal to impart to them the information obtained by him through his said unwarranted examination of the body of their relative, on the ground that it was made in furtherance of other interests than theirs. They made application as suggested by the defender to the said association’s agent, who refused to supply a copy of the report, and the report was held up against her by the opposing agents, with the defender's knowledge, approval, and sanction, and its terms were, with his knowledge and approval, sedulously concealed from her during the subsequent course of the proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and until a late stage in the resulting proof in the arbitration."

Dec. 11, 1912.

Hughes v.
Robertson.

Dec. 11, 1912.
Hughes v,
Robertson.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender, having wrongfully and illegally made the post-mortem dissection libelled, and having authorised or permitted the illegal destruction of parts of the body as alleged, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers, is liable in reparation for the injury done to them, and this being moderately estimated at the sum sued for, decree should be pronounced as concluded for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (3) (a) The averments of the pursuers are irrelevant, (b) the action is incompetent as laid. (4) The post-mortem examination having been duly authorised by or on behalf of the pursuers, the defender should be assoilzied. (5) The post-mortem examination having been performed regularly and lawfully, and without any illegal or improper destruction of parts of the body, the defender should be assoilzied. (6) In any view, the pursuer Michael Hughes's claim is unfounded, in respect that he consented to the post-mortem examination being made. Separatim, he is barred by personal exception, by his own admissions and actings, from insisting in the claim now made by him. (7) The averments of the pursuers, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defender should be assoilzied."

On 27th November 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) approved of the following issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether, on or about the 7th of June 1911, and in the Kilmarnock Infirmary, Kilmarnock, the defender did wrongfully make a post-mortem examination and dissection of the body of Thomas Hughes, miner, the husband and the father of the pursuers respectively, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?"

"Damages laid as follows:—[Here followed the name of each pursuer with a separate sum of damages appended.]"

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Mackenzie, and Lord Skerrington) on 11th December 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The action was incompetent because the issue referred to one wrong only, viz., the making of the unauthorised post-mortem, whereas in the action a lump sum was claimed in name of damages for each of the pursuers for two different wrongs, viz., (1) making the post-mortem without consent, (2) obstructing and delaying the recovery of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was not competent thus to claim a lump sum in respect of two different wrongs, particularly where one at least of the pursuers, Mrs Ledgerwood, had no interest in the second wrong, having no claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act.¹ Only if the averments with reference to the second wrong were deleted, and the pursuers' first plea amended, would the action be competent. If the record were not so amended the action should be dismissed. In any event it should be tried before a Judge and not a jury, because

¹ Killin v. Weir, (1905) 7 F. 526; Conway v. Dalziel, (1901) 3 F. 918, Lord President Kinross, at p. 921.

Dec. 11, 1912. the alleged injury to each pursuer was separate, and demanded separate conclusions and separate issues,¹ the interest of the pursuers not being identical as they were not all dependants of the deceased.

Hughes v.
Robertson.

Argued for the respondents;—The wrong complained of, viz., an unauthorised post-mortem, was a relevant ground of action²; and the action as laid was competent and should be sent to a jury on the issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary, which was in the usual and proper form setting forth as it did a separate sum for each pursuer and not merely a lump sum.³ The respondents did not propose to amend their record, for there was no averment here of two separate wrongs, but of one wrong committed in a continuing series of acts, the sequence and the consequences of which were relevantly averred. If it was proved that the post-mortem examination was made with consent, the presiding Judge would guard against the jury drawing any wrong inferences from the evidence as to the other actings of the defender.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am not prepared to hold, in accordance with one part of the reclaimer's argument, that there is not a relevant case in this action to go to a jury. I think that the main cause of action is just one of those which are most appropriate for jury trial, and in ordinary circumstances I should have no hesitation in sending it to a jury, even although there might be some perplexities suggested on record which might embarrass the trial. But then I think that in the present case there is a little more than the suggestion of such perplexity. I think the case is so laid as to raise a very troublesome question for the consideration of the tribunal—whatever it be—that has to consider the facts. The action is, in my opinion, competent in so far as it is founded on the wrong done to all the pursuers jointly. It is plainly incompetent in so far as it is founded on a separate and distinct wrong done to certain of the pursuers, and not to others who are nevertheless joined with them in one summons. I think that it might have been maintainable, in these circumstances, that the action should be dismissed as laid, leaving it to the pursuers to frame a different condescendence in support of a second action. But that, to my mind, would be too harsh a view to take of the actual record before us, because the only issue allowed is confined to the joint wrong. But the pursuers insist on retaining in their record averments which go to support the incompetent and not the competent claims. It is not for us to make a new record; and—as the difficulties are all occasioned by the introduction into the condescendence of statements which do not directly go to prove the only wrong which the pursuers ask to be sent for the verdict of a jury, and as these are difficulties which might be, I think, very simply removed by amendment of the condescendence so as to make it clear that the case to be actually tried must be limited by the terms of the issue sent to the jury, and as the pursuers have declined to make these amendments—I am afraid there is no other course, in order to do justice between the parties, than to allow a proof and Dec. 11, 1912. let the case be tried by a Judge. Personally, I have a very strong feeling of sympathy with the pursuers' argument that cases of this kind should go to a jury. I think they might easily have had this case sent to a jury by making sundry simple amendments upon the record; but as they decline to do so, I propose to your Lordships that it should be sent for proof before the Lord Ordinary.

¹ Paxton v. Brown, 1908 S. C. 406; Harkes v. Mowat, (1862) 24 D. 701, Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, at p. 703.

² Pollok v. Workman, (1900) 2 F. 354.

³ Gray v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1912 S. C. 339; Smyth v. Muir and Another, (1891) 29 S. L. R. 94; Gibson v. Macqueen, (1866) 5 Macph. 113.

Hughes v.

Robertson.

Lord Kinnear.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am entirely of the same opinion. If the pursuers' averments had been of the same nature as the averments in the case of Pollok v. Workman,¹ I should then have taken the view Lord Kyllachy took in that case and held that the case was one which was appropriate for jury trial. The leading averments of the pursuers are directed to the same issue that was adjusted in the case of Pollok v. Workman,¹ but they go on to overlay those leading averments with a great deal of matter which in my opinion might create a difficulty in disposing of this case by way of jury trial.

No doubt, theoretically, it would be possible to obtain directions at various stages of the case to keep the jury right; but as I read the record I am unable to be sure that the jury might not go entirely wrong in consequence of the way in which the evidence could be presented which bears upon the articles in the condescendence we were referred to, and more particularly, the passages in Cond. 13. I think it might well be that a jury, under this issue, might take the view that there had been a failure to prove that there was no consent; but, at the same time that, although the consent had been given by the pursuers, they never sanctioned the mode of carrying out the post-mortem which the pursuers describe in article 13. And therefore, under this issue, the result might be that, although the pursuers failed to establish what is essential to obtaining a verdict, nevertheless the jury might, considering that the defender's actings had been of such a character, award them damages; that is to say, they might apply, as Lord Adam points out in the case of Conway v. Dalziel,² the view that the mode of conducting the post-mortem as described by the pursuers here went far beyond the mere wrong which is done by performing a post-mortem on a relative without obtaining the necessary consents.

Accordingly, I think that the pursuers have really brought the result your Lordship proposes upon themselves. If they desired to try the simple issue whether there was an unauthorised post-mortem they could have done that by framing their record in exactly the same way as in Pollok v. Workman,¹ and have proved all necessary incidents in connection with the post-mortem examination, that is to say, proved so much of what they aver in Cond. 13 as has a bearing upon the damages due in name of solatium. But they trace out the bearing of those averments upon the preparation of a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and they condescend upon the expense they were put to in preparing that case in consequence of the way in which the defender is alleged to have acted; and that seems to me to bring in what might be considered an entirely separate and different ground

¹ 2 F. 354.² 3 F. 918.

Dec. 13, 1912.

M'Guire v.
Paterson &
Co.

from the said representative of the insurance company the sum of £6, and granted therefor a receipt, which the defenders are hereby called upon to produce. With reference to the averments in answer, denied that the pursuer had no claim to compensation from the defenders under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. In accepting the said sum of £6, the pursuer understood that his claim to such compensation was admitted by the defenders." (Cond. 4) "In so far as the said receipt bears to be a discharge of all claims competent to the pursuer, it was granted by him without any consideration. The sum of £6 paid to the pursuer represented compensation at the rate of 12s. 9d. per week for ten weeks, and no consideration whatever was paid to the pursuer in respect of a discharge by him of claims that might be competent to him after the expiry of that time. Further, at the time when the said receipt was granted both the pursuer and his agent, and also the insurance company's representative, were in total ignorance of the true nature of the pursuer's injuries. All of them thought that the injuries were only superficial, and that the pursuer would not require to be off work for more than ten weeks altogether. In point of fact, at the date when the said receipt was signed the pursuer was suffering from septic poisoning of the hand. The entries in the Infirmary books show that such was the fact, though the pursuer had not been so informed by the doctor, and was unaware of it. After the said date the pursuer continued to attend the Infirmary regularly until 30th December 1909, when he entered the hospital of Govan Poorhouse to undergo an operation. The thumb, forefinger, and part of the second finger of the pursuer's right hand have since been removed, and he is now totally and permanently incapacitated for work. The said incapacity arises from the accident condescended upon." (Cond. 5) "Up to the date of granting the said receipt the pursuer had received no weekly payments by way of compensation, and he and his family were in great straits for want of money. In accepting the sum of £6 the pursuer understood that this was in lieu of compensation at the rate of 12s. 9d. per week for ten weeks, and it was upon that understanding, and on a representation to that effect made to him by the representative of the insurance company, that he granted the said receipt. While he did not anticipate being off work for a longer period, the pursuer understood that he would be entitled to further compensation in the event of his disablement being protracted beyond that time. The pursuer is an illiterate man, and the pain in his hand was so great on the occasion referred to that he was unable to sit still, and was pacing the floor during the whole interview with the insurance company's representative." (Cond. 6) "Following upon the granting of the said receipt by the pursuer, the memorandum of agreement of which reduction is now sought was drawn up, and, on the application of the defenders, it was recorded in the register on 19th November 1909. No such agreement was arrived at between the pursuer and the defenders. In accepting the said sum of £6 the pursuer understood that the defenders' liability was admitted, and that, as the representative of the insurance company stated, he was getting ten weeks' compensation, whereas the insurance company's representative did not admit the defenders' liability to compensate the pursuer, and looked upon the £6 as an ex gratia payment. There was, accordingly, no consensus in idem placitum between the parties. Further, at the date of the said alleged agreement, the parties were in error as to the nature of the pursuer's injuries, and it was not till after the said memorandum of agreement had been recorded that the fact that the pursuer's hand was poisoned came to the knowledge of the parties." (Cond. 7) "The sum of £6, which, according to the said recorded memorandum, the pursuer is said to have accepted in full settlement of all claims in respect of the said accident, was quite inadequate compensation for the injuries sustained by him. No sufficient information was laid before the registrar, or asked for by him, to enable him to judge of the adequacy of the said sum as consideration for a discharge of all the pursuer's claims in respect of the said accident. Had the registrar been in possession of such information, he would have refused to record the said memorandum, as he was entitled to do under section 9 (d) of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

Dec. 13, 1912.
M'Guire v.
Paterson &
Co.

The defenders averred:—(Ans. 2) " . . . The pursuer's said injuries did not arise from an 'accident' in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906." (Ans. 3) " . . . The pursuer had no claim to compensation from the defenders, in respect that the pursuer's injuries were not caused by an 'accident' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The defenders and the insurance company did not admit liability, but made the said payment in order to obtain a full discharge and avoid further dispute and expense."

Both parties referred to prior proceedings in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, which were thus narrated in the answers for the defenders:—"On 18th May 1910 the pursuer presented an application in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, craving the Court to grant warrant to remove from the register the said memorandum of agreement, upon the ground as stated in the initial writ in the said application, 'that the same was obtained by improper means, the pursuer having granted the discharge under essential error as to the nature and effect of the injury from which he was suffering, it being represented to him by a representative of the insurance company acting on behalf of the defenders that he would be incapacitated only for a few weeks, whereas the injury was serious and permanent, mortification having set in resulting in the amputation of the thumb and two fingers of his right hand; he . . . is still under treatment.' Explained, further, that the parties lodged a joint minute of admissions in the process, and that the Sheriff-substitute refused the application by award dated 22nd July 1910. The said award is in the following terms:—'Glasgow, 22nd July 1910.—The Sheriff-substitute having heard parties' procurators and considered the cause, finds it admitted (by joint minute of admissions for parties) that, when £6 was paid by the defenders to the pursuer as compensation for the alleged injuries sustained by him on 4th October 1909, he was advised by a law-agent as to his rights, and that the agent explained to him, in the presence of the representatives of the insurance company with whom the defenders were insured, that the £6 was in settlement of all his claims under the Act: Finds it also admitted that neither the defenders nor the insurance company nor anyone on their behalf used or tried to use any improper means to bring about said settlement: Therefore refuses the present application; finds no expenses due to or by either party; and decerns. JOHN CRAIGIE.' The pursuer thereafter intimated that he desired to bring the said award under

Dec. 13, 1912.

M'Guire v.
Paterson &
Co.

review in the Court of Session by a stated case, and a draft stated case was in course of adjustment by the parties, but the pursuer abandoned his intention and raised the present proceedings. Reference is made to the proceedings in the said applications in the Sheriff Court. Explained that by said award it was conclusively settled as between the parties that the pursuer had received the £6 in consideration of a discharge of all his claims, and that the pursuer was advised to that effect by his own law-agent at the time. The pursuer's averments to the contrary are not only unwarranted, but cannot now be competently made by him or further inquired into. Further, in the joint minute of admissions it was agreed, inter alia, as follows:—

“ 4. That on 20th October pursuer consulted a law-agent, who on same day intimated a claim for compensation to the defenders; that pursuer and his agent had several meetings with the representative of the company with whom defenders are insured; and that on 9th November 1909, in presence of the pursuer, terms of settlement of the claim were arranged between the pursuer and his agent on the one hand and the insurance company's representative on the other hand, whereby the insurance company, on behalf of the defenders, paid the pursuer the sum of £6, 12s. 6d. in settlement of the claim and expenses.

“ 5. That pursuer's agent explained to him in the presence of the representative of the insurance company that the receipt was in settlement of all claims under the Act.

“ That pursuer casually mentioned to his agent some days before the settlement that the arm was becoming inflamed, and that the doctor was afraid it might prove a bad arm, that his agent formed the opinion that this was a very remote contingency.

“ 6. That neither pursuer's agent nor the representative of the insurance company saw the pursuer's hand, and had no medical advice as to the nature and extent of the injury he had received, and that all they knew of the progress of the injury was gathered from the pursuer.

“ 7. That the entry in the Dispensary Journal of the Royal Infirmary on 18th October 1909 showed that pursuer was then “suffering from septic hand.” Neither pursuer's agent nor the representative of the insurance company knew of this entry at that time.”

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) No agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, having been concluded between the pursuer and the defenders, decree of declarator should be pronounced as concluded for. (5) The said recorded memorandum of agreement ought to be reduced, in respect that the discharge upon which it proceeds was granted by the pursuer without consideration, at a date when both parties were in error as to material facts. (6) The consideration for the discharge of the pursuer's claims contained in the said memorandum of agreement being grossly inadequate, and no sufficient information having been furnished to the registrar to enable him to test its adequacy, the record of the said memorandum should be expunged from the register, and decree of reduction pronounced as concluded for.*

* The Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, enacts, paragraph (9):—“Where the amount of compensation under this Act has been ascertained, or any weekly payment varied, or any other matter decided under this Act, either by a committee or by an arbitrator or by agreement, a memorandum thereof shall be sent, in manner prescribed by [Act of

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action ought to be dismissed.

On 18th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) sustained the fourth plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.*

M'Guire v.
Paterson &
Co.

Sederunt], . . . to the [Sheriff-clerk] who shall, subject to such [Act of Sederunt], on being satisfied as to its genuineness, record such memorandum in a special register. . . . Provided that . . . (d) Where it appears to the [Sheriff-clerk], on any information which he considers sufficient, that an agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum . . . ought not to be registered by reason of the inadequacy of the sum . . . or by reason of the agreement having been obtained by fraud or undue influence, or other improper means, he may refuse to record the memorandum of the agreement sent to him for registration, and refer the matter to the [Sheriff] who shall, in accordance with [Act of Sederunt], make such order (including an order as to any sum already paid under the agreement) as under the circumstances he may think just. (e) The [Sheriff] may within six months after a memorandum . . . has been recorded in the register, order that the record be removed from the register on proof to his satisfaction that the agreement was obtained by fraud or undue influence or other improper means. . . ."

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the circumstances and stating that both parties founded on the joint minute of admissions lodged in the proceedings before the Sheriff]—The pursuer maintained that the parties, in concluding the alleged agreement, were in mutual error as to an essential fact, viz, the nature of the pursuer's injuries, and further, that there was no consensus in idem placitum, in respect that while the pursuer understood that his claim to compensation under the Act was admitted by the defenders, the defenders did not regard his claim as a competent claim under the Act at all, but agreed to make the payment of £6 ex gratia, and without admitting liability, that the agreement therefore was in fact not an agreement to settle an admitted claim under the Act, but an agreement that no claim should be made under the Act. The averments, on which the pleas of no consensus in idem placitum and of mutual error are founded, are contained in Condescendence 6.

"I am of opinion that these averments are not relevant to infer the conclusions of the summons. The pursuer's averments as to consensus in idem placitum come to no more than this that, while agreeing to settle the pursuer's claim as a claim under the Act, the defenders did not admit that the claim was a competent claim under the Act. But both parties were none the less at one as to what the agreement was intended to effect. There was no difference of view as to either the subject-matter, the terms, or the consideration. The defenders were under no mistake as to what the pursuer's claim was, and for the purpose of settling it, they agreed to pay a certain amount of compensation. In so doing, they assumed that it was, and treated it as, a claim properly arising under the Act, and it seems to me a matter of no relevancy whatever what mental reservation they made as to its competency. There was no expressed reservation of any kind. For the purposes of the claim they admitted liability, and so entitled the workman to take all the steps competent to him under the Act, including the recording of a memorandum of the agreement. That they were bound by the memorandum was assumed and admitted by both parties in the proceedings in the Sheriff Court. In the face of its express terms, it seems to me impossible to pronounce a decree of declarator in the terms concluded for, solely on the ground that the defenders, though consenting to be parties to the agreement, declined to admit the validity of the pursuer's claim.

"The other ground on which the pursuer founded was, that there was

Dec. 13, 1912.

M'Guire v.
Paterson &
Co.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Hunter) on 1st and 7th November 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The agreement should be reduced and expunged from the register, because the statutory procedure for obtaining warrant to record had not been observed. Paragraph 9 (d) of the Second Schedule to the Act of 1906 empowered the Sheriff-clerk in certain cases to refuse to record, and to refer the matter to the Sheriff. Inferentially this laid on him the duty of applying his mind to the considerations enumerated in that paragraph, and obtaining information. This was the view taken in England,¹ and it was not inconsistent with the rules of procedure in Scotland.² In the present case the Sheriff-clerk had made no investigation. If he had done so, he would have ascertained that the agreed-on sum was wholly inadequate to the injury, and that in fact there was no agreement at all under the Act. There was never any consensus, because of the mutual error as to the extent of the injuries, and also because the parties were not at one as to the nature of the transaction they were entering into, the pursuer thinking that he was receiving compensation, and the respondents thinking they were making an ex gratia payment. The employers never admitted liability to pay compensation. The payment they made was no evidence of such an admission, and the fact that the payment had been received did not bar the workman from now claiming compensation.³ The agreement, not being an agreement under the Act, should never have been put on the register.⁴ It was the compromise of a disputed claim, not the "redemption of a weekly payment,"⁵ and the latter was the only kind of "lump sum" agreement recognised by the Act. The present action was competent, and the pursuer was not mutual error as to a material fact which existed at the date of the agreement, namely, that whereas the parties thought that the workman was merely suffering from superficial injuries done to his hand by lime burning, he was, in fact, suffering from septic hand—that the true nature of the injury was therefore unknown. It seems to me that at the best for the pursuer the ignorance of the parties was only as to the extent of the injuries he was suffering from, but the pursuer is not entitled to go back upon an agreement to accept a certain sum as in full settlement of his claim merely because he now finds that the injury has proved more serious than he anticipated, and that he under-estimated the compensation which he might have demanded. It is not said that the defenders were acting in mala fide in coming to terms with the pursuer. It seems to me a hard case for the pursuer, but I cannot give him the relief which he seeks in this action. The fact that a man has made a bad bargain is no reason for holding that he has made no bargain at all.

"In dismissing the action on the ground that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant, I have assumed that it is competent, but I do not decide that it is."

¹ Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1907, 49 (1) (a), and Form 36 (a); Mortimer v. Secretan, [1909] 2 K. B. 77; "Segura" v. Blampied, (1911) 4 Butterworth's W. C. C. 192.

² Act of Sederunt, June 26, 1907, (11) (12).

³ Rendall v. Hill's Dry Docks and Engineering Co., Limited, [1900] 2 Q. B. 245.

⁴ M'Ewan v. William Baird & Co., Limited, 1910 S. C. 436, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 438, Lord Kinnear, at p. 442.

⁵ Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (17).

barred by the previous proceedings. Having failed to get redress under paragraph 9 (e) of the Second Schedule, he was still entitled to his common law remedy of reduction,¹ notwithstanding that the memorandum had been recorded.² In fact he had no other remedy, for paragraph 9 (e) did not provide for the case of inadequacy, which was the point he now wished to raise. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and proof allowed.

Argued for the respondents;—There was nothing in the Act by which any duty was laid on the Sheriff-clerk to inquire into the matters mentioned in paragraph 9 (d) of the Second Schedule before recording an agreement. The English Rules had no bearing in Scotland where the procedure was wholly regulated by the Act of Sederunt, which contained no provisions corresponding to the English Rule 49 (1) (a). If the agreement were obviously inequitable, or if facts were brought to his notice by either party, the Sheriff-clerk might be bound to investigate, but that was not the state of matters in the present case. In any event, the result would have been the same even if the Sheriff-clerk had made inquiry. The agreement was perfectly in order, and was a typical case of an agreement for the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum, for the sum was calculated on the amount of the weekly payments which would have been due. Since the workman had been settled with on the footing that he was entitled to compensation, and had received all that he could get under the Act, it was immaterial whether or not his claim was formally admitted or denied. The pursuer was personally barred from following out the present action. Having admitted that the agreement was an agreement under the Act—as he did by the request for recording which it contained—he could not now maintain that no such agreement was in existence.³ The averments as to the extent of the injuries and the inadequacy of the compensation were irrelevant. The pursuer might have made a bad bargain, but he was not on that account entitled to have it set aside.⁴

At advising on 13th December 1912,—

LORD SALVESEN.—This is an action of reduction of a memorandum of agreement dated 9th, and recorded in the register kept by the Sheriff-clerk at Glasgow on 19th, November 1909, which bears that the pursuer accepted the sum of £6 sterling in full settlement of all claims in respect of an accident which happened to him while in the defenders' employment. The pursuer also seeks a declarator that no agreement as to compensation to be paid to him under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of the injuries so sustained, has been concluded between the parties.

On the facts averred, the sole ground of reduction is that the parties were in error at the time when the agreement was made as to the extent of the pursuer's injuries, that at the time it was thought that recovery would be complete within ten weeks from the date of his ceasing work, whereas, as matters have turned out, parts of his fingers have had to be amputated, and

¹ Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited, (1904) 6 F. 770.

² Hughes v. Thistle Chemical Co., 1907 S. C. 607.

³ Robert Forrester & Co., Limited, v. Fleming, (1908) 16 S. L. T. 139.

⁴ North British Railway Co. v. Wood, (1891) 18 R. (H. L.) 27; Dornan v. Allan & Son, (1900) 3 F. 112.

Dec. 13, 1912. he is permanently incapacitated for work. It appears that in making the settlement of his claims the pursuer had the assistance of a law-agent, that M'Guire v. Paterson & Co. no undue representations were made to him by or on behalf of the defenders, and that they as well as he believed that the injuries were alight. I

Lord Salvesen. agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that these averments disclose no relevant ground at common law for setting aside the agreement. The decision of the House of Lords in The North British Railway v. Wood,¹ appears to be conclusive on this point. The facts there were very much more favourable to the pursuer, for he had not had the benefit of an agent to consult with, and was suffering from the effects of the accident at the time when the settlement was made; whereas here in a minute of admissions which was produced in certain other proceedings at the pursuer's instance it is expressly stated that both the pursuer's agent and the representative of the insurance company who carried through the settlement acted in good faith. As the Lord Ordinary points out, the fact that a man has made a bad bargain is no reason for holding that he has made no bargain at all. In making the bargain he took his chance that he might not recover within the period of ten weeks for which he was allowed compensation.

A second ground upon which the agreement was challenged was that it was not an agreement which could be properly registered under the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was said that at the time when it was made the defenders did not admit liability under that Act, having taken up the position, to which they still adhere, that the pursuer had not met with an accident. According to the pursuer the transaction was a compromise of a disputed claim and not a redemption by way of a lump sum of a weekly payment due under the Workmen's Compensation Act. There would have been force in this argument if the pursuer had averred that he accepted less than he would otherwise have considered himself entitled to under the Workmen's Compensation Act, being apprehensive that if he prosecuted his claim he might recover nothing. There is no such averment on record. On the contrary the pursuer says (cond. 6), "In accepting the said sum of £6 the pursuer understood that the defenders' liability was admitted, and that, as the representative of the insurance company stated, he was getting ten weeks' compensation." He cannot, therefore, maintain that the compensation agreed on was, so far as he and his agent were concerned, fixed with reference to the possibility that he had no legal claim at all. In short, the attitude of the defenders on the question of liability had no bearing on the transaction. Although not admitting liability they were prepared to settle with him on the footing that he had a good claim for compensation under the Act, and the only matter to which the parties applied their minds was the probable duration of his continued incapacity for work. Both parties were honestly of opinion that recovery might be looked for within ten weeks of incapacity emerging, and the sum of £6 is said by the pursuer himself to have represented compensation at the rate of 12s. 9d. per week for that period. This sum is not an exact multiple of 12s. 9d., which would have amounted to 7s. 6d. more for the agreed-on probable duration of the incapacity, but it was explained that some 12s. 6d. more was in fact paid at the time, part of which apparently the pursuer authorised his agent to retain. I am unable to hold that the mere fact that the employer disputes liability will prevent a settlement of a workman's claim under the 1906 Act, if, in fact, he is willing that the compensation should be fixed exactly on the same footing as if liability were admitted.

¹ 18 R. (H. L.) 27.

Dec. 13, 1912.
M'Guire v.
Paterson &
Co.

Lord Salvesen.

The most serious argument in the case, and the only one which makes it of general interest, was maintained on the terms of paragraph (9) of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which prescribes the procedure for getting a memorandum of agreement recorded. The facts averred are that the memorandum was signed by the pursuer's own law-agent and transmitted by him to the Sheriff-clerk in Glasgow, that intimation was made to the employers of the presentation of the memorandum, and that, no objection having been taken by them, it was placed upon the register. It is not said that the pursuer's agent in so acting acted outwith his authority, and indeed I think it may fairly be taken to have been part of the arrangement that he should present the memorandum to the Sheriff-clerk and be paid for doing so by the employers. So far as the Sheriff-clerk was concerned the procedure specifically prescribed by the Act was apparently complied with. Subhead (d) of paragraph (9), however, introduced a new provision for the purpose of protecting an injured workman against a settlement of his claims for an inadequate sum. It is in these terms :—[His Lordship quoted subhead (d)]; and subhead (e) provides that the Sheriff may, within six months after the recording of a memorandum of agreement as to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum, order that the record be removed from the register on proof that the agreement was obtained by fraud or undue influence, or other improper means. The pursuer has already taken advantage of this latter subsection, but failed to convince the Sheriff-substitute that there were any grounds upon which the register should be corrected. It is noteworthy that while one of the grounds on which the registrar may refuse to allow a memorandum to be recorded is the inadequacy of the sum accepted, no machinery is provided to have the register rectified on this ground after the memorandum has entered it.

The only averment on this head is contained in cond. 7, where, after narrating that the sum of £6 was quite inadequate compensation for the injury sustained, the pursuer goes on to say: "No sufficient information was laid before the registrar, or asked for by him, to enable him to judge of the adequacy of the said sum as consideration for a discharge of the pursuer's claims in respect of the said accident. Had the registrar been in possession of such information, he would have refused to record the said memorandum, as he was entitled to do under section 9 (d) of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906." An Act of Sederunt was passed in 1907 to regulate the procedure under, inter alia, this section, but it makes no provision for the Sheriff-clerk, in the performance of his statutory duty, doing anything more than notifying all parties interested other than the party on whose behalf the application is presented. It leaves it, however, open to him to exercise the power conferred by subsection (d) of refusing to register the memorandum if he has any information which he considers sufficient that it ought not to be regis-

Dec. 13, 1912. tered by reason of the inadequacy of the sum accepted by the workman.

M'Guire v. It appears that by the Rules framed by the English Judges the registrar
Paterson & must make certain inquiries of the parties before proceeding to register,
Co. but no such duty is laid on Sheriff-clerks by the Act of Sederunt.

Lord Salvesen. It was argued, however, that he must apply his mind to the question, and that his failure to do so in any given case entitles the workman to disregard the agreement which he had himself made. I am unable to reach this result. I think what the statute primarily contemplates is that there is something on the face of the agreement which the Sheriff-clerk thinks calls for explanation, in which case he is entitled to make inquiries, not necessarily limited to the parties themselves as under the Rules of Court in England, as to whether the workman has not really been taken advantage of; and if he is of that opinion he is to refer the matter to the Sheriff. We were also given by way of illustration the case where the workman himself raises objections; in such a case I think the Sheriff-clerk would be bound to refuse to record without referring the matter to the Sheriff. If it were otherwise we should have to hold that in every case where a lump sum accepted as compensation proved to be inadequate the injured workman was entitled to have the agreement set aside if he could show that the Sheriff-clerk had in fact made no inquiry. No duty of inquiry is laid upon the Sheriff-clerk; and it would involve a very large extension of his duties in a town like Glasgow if it were to be held that in every case of the kind he was bound to ascertain the facts connected with an accident and the probable duration of the injuries resulting therefrom. Where the workman and employer, both acting under legal advice, are agreed as to the amount of compensation payable, it may in the ordinary case be presumed that it fairly represents the amount to which the workman is entitled; and I cannot find that the Sheriff-clerk has any duty of refusing, in the possible future interests of the workman, to record such an agreement. Here there was nothing on the face of the memorandum to show that the parties' estimate of the extent of the injuries was erroneous. The injury is described as an "injury to right hand through being burned by lime caused by accident in the employment of" the defenders. The memorandum further sets out that the question in dispute was as to the amount of compensation payable to the claimant for final settlement, and that it was determined by agreement. All this is an accurate account of what had taken place; and there was nothing to suggest to the mind of the Sheriff-clerk that he ought to suspend the operation of the agreement until he had made inquiry into the facts. At all events it is certain that he had no duty imposed upon him by statute or by the Act of Sederunt to make inquiry; and his failure to do so cannot be described as a departure from the statutory procedure. On these grounds I think this branch of the pursuer's case also fails, and that we ought to affirm the interlocutor appealed from.

LORD HUNTER.—I also think that this reclaiming note ought to be refused. The only question of difficulty appears to me to be whether or not any agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, was entered into between the parties, a memorandum of which could be regi-tered. Had the payment of £6 by the defenders to the pursuer been a payment of a lump sum without any reference to the amount of the weekly payment to which the pursuer was entitled under the Act, and made with a view to prevent any claim either under the Act or at common law, I do not think that the memorandum would have been registrable under the Act. Such an arrangement would not be an agreement relative either to the amount of compensation payable under the Act during incapacity or to the redemption of a weekly payment by a lump sum payment, but an agreement to exclude the workman from the benefit of the provisions of the Act, and for the registration of a memorandum of such an agreement I do not find any statutory sanction. The defenders have by the statements they have made in defence allowed this point to be taken against them. But the pursuer's case must be judged by his own averments. He says that the payment of £6 represented compensation at the rate of 12s. 9d. for ten weeks, both parties contemplating that his incapacity for work would not be of longer duration. Such a payment is a typical redemption payment under the Act as to which parties may in terms of paragraph (17) of the First Schedule to the Act come to an agreement without having recourse to the machinery of the statute. The agreement is not invalidated by the defenders not admitting liability if they have agreed to the amount being fixed as though they were liable, and that is how the pursuer presents the case against them.

The pursuer founded upon the terms of paragraph (9) (d) of the Second Schedule to the Act, which provides that—[His Lordship quoted the paragraph]—It is plain that the Legislature intended this provision to be some protection to the workman. In the case of Mortimer v. Secretan,¹ the Master of the Rolls, at p. 79, says: "He (i.e., the employer) may make an agreement with the injured workman, but not an agreement in the sense in which a master and servant would, under ordinary circumstances, make an agreement, for the Act contemplates that an agreement made between an injured workman and his employer under which the workman is to receive a lump sum, ought to be carefully investigated, and it provides, in order to terminate the liability of the employer to continue the weekly payments, that the memorandum of agreement shall be recorded. The parties first have to go before the registrar, who acts not on evidence, but on information, and if he thinks the amount is inadequate, then he has to report it to the Judge and has to give notice to the parties."

Under Rules of Court in England (49 schedule C of the Act and schedule thereto 36 (a)) provision is made for the registrar getting information from the parties which will enable him to consider as to the adequacy of the lump sum payment. In Scotland there are no similar provisions imposing any duty of inquiry upon the Sheriff-clerk. But sections 11 and 12 of the Act of Sederunt, dated 26th June 1907, passed to regulate the procedure under the Workmen's Compensation Act, contemplate that the Sheriff-clerk may exercise the discretion entrusted to him by refusing to register. To enable him to exercise this discretion I think it would be preferable if the memorandum of agreement were expressed in other language than that

¹ [1909] 2 K. B. 77.

Dec. 13, 1912. adopted in the present case, and bore upon its face to be an agreement for the redemption of a specified weekly payment. There is, however, nothing in the present case to lead one to suppose that if the Sheriff-clerk had received the information from the parties which the registrar in England obtains he would have formed a different opinion as to the nature and extent of the pursuer's incapacity from that formed by the pursuer himself and his agent. It is unfortunate for the pursuer that his injuries have turned out to be more serious than parties contemplated when he received payment of the lump sum, but that is no sufficient ground for reduction of the recorded memorandum of agreement.

M'Guire v.
Paterson &
Co.

Lord Hunter.

Lord Salvesen intimated that the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, who was absent at the advising, concurred in Lord Salvesen's opinion, which he had had an opportunity of reading.

LORD DUNDAS and LORD GUTHRIE were present at the advising.

THE COURT adhered.

D. MACLEAN, Solicitor—J. & R. A. ROBERTSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58. THOMAS GOODALL NASMYTH AND OTHERS (A. H. Nasmyth's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.

Dec. 17, 1912. THE NATIONAL SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN, Claimants (Reclaimers).—Constable, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Nasmyth's
Trustees v.
National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.
THE SCOTTISH NATIONAL SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN, Claimants (Respondents).—Chisholm, K.C.—W. Mitchell.
Succession—Testament—Construction—Proof—Admissibility of extrinsic evidence—Ambiguity in designation of beneficiary.

A Scotsman living in Scotland left, among other legacies to charities all of which were Scottish, a legacy to "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." In a competition between "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" (London) and "The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" (Edinburgh), held that the designation in the will was ambiguous, and proof allowed of extrinsic facts to show which of the Societies the testator meant.

2D DIVISION. ON 17th August 1911 the testamentary trustees of the late Alexander
Lord Hunter. Hogg Nasmyth of Middlebank, Fife, brought an action of multiple-pounding against The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, London, and The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Edinburgh, to determine the rights of the defenders in a legacy bequeathed by the testator to "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." Claims in the multiplepounding were lodged by both Societies.

The clause in the testator's settlement which contained this legacy was in the following terms:—"To the Dunfermline and West of Fife Hospital, One thousand pounds free of legacy or other Government Duty and other charges, To the Royal Blind Asylum, Edinburgh, Five hundred pounds, free of legacy or other Government Duty and other charges, To the Edinburgh Deaf and Dumb Benevolent Society, Five hundred pounds free of Legacy or other Government Duty and other charges, To The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Five hundred pounds free of Legacy or other Government Duty and other charges, To the Royal Edinburgh Hospital for Incurables (Longmore Hospital), Five hundred pounds free of Legacy or other Government Duty and other charges, To The Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Two hundred and fifty pounds free of Legacy or other Government Duty and other charges, To the Royal Edinburgh Hospital for Sick Children, Five hundred pounds free of Legacy or other Government Duty and other charges, and to the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, One thousand pounds free of Legacy or other Government Duty and other charges." The settlement was executed in 1911.

Dec. 17, 1912.
Nasmyth's
Trustees v.
National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

The National Society averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 2) "The claimants originated in 1884 as the London Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. In 1889, under a new constitution, they adopted the title of The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. In 1895 they were incorporated by Royal Charter as a body corporate under that name. Since 1889 they have continuously borne the name of 'The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.' No other society or body is or ever has been known by that name. By the constitution as contained in the Charter the sphere of operations of the Society embraces the whole of the United Kingdom. It is widely known throughout the Kingdom, including Scotland, as The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Its sole right to that name has recently been prominently before the public in Scotland, particularly in 1905 and again in 1907. This right was admitted by the competing society in 1907, and since that year that society has disclaimed that name and prominently published its disclaimer. The present claimants receive financial assistance from supporters in Scotland." (Cond. 3) "The claimants are the only Society for the prevention of cruelty to or otherwise for the furtherance of the interests of children whose constitution and operations are national in their scope by embracing the whole of the United Kingdom. The other defenders are in all respects limited to Scotland and are not entitled to use and do not use the name 'The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.' All the charitable societies named as legatees in the will are carefully and accurately designed. Another of those societies is The Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which is so named in the will with the intention and result of distinguishing it from The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, whose head office is in London." (Cond. 4) "With reference to the competing claim, denied that the interests of the testator were exclusively Scottish; that the competing claimants are the intended legatees of the fund in medio; that they are in Scotland or elsewhere The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children; that they are usually referred to in Scotland under that name; and that they are the only Society in Scotland devoted to the prevention of cruelty to children. On the contrary, there are in the Edinburgh district alone over 250 societies and agencies engaged in such work. Further, denied that the present claimants' charter was applied for with a view to the inclusion of the competing Society. As to the terms of affiliation referred to in the competing claim, it is explained that at no time were they more than a domestic document regulating how the present claimants should dispose of certain legacies after they had uplifted the same; that the terms were in law ab initio null and

Dec. 17, 1912.

Nasmyth's
Trustees v.
National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to
Children.

void; and that they were publicly denounced as such as early as 1905. With reference to the case of cruelty in 1909, founded on by the competing claimants, the present claimants have no knowledge and give no admission. It is denied that that case had anything to do with the origin of the legacy now in dispute. So far as regards that legacy, the testator's will of 1911 is a verbatim copy of an earlier will made by him in 1906. This fact was known to the competing claimants when they lodged their claim in this process. Believed and averred that the precise wording of the bequest was prescribed in writing by the testator himself." (Cond. 5) "All the facts regarding the existence of the two Societies, the differences in their names, and the scope of their operations, were well known to the testator."

The Scottish Society averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 2) "The claimant Society is the charity intended by the testator to be benefited by his bequest of £500 to The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and is the Society indicated by him under that designation. The claimant Society is in Scotland The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and is commonly referred to in Scotland under that name. It is the only society in Scotland devoted to the prevention of cruelty to children, and its operations in that behalf are widely known and favourably recognised in Scotland by charitable persons, by the authorities, and by the general public. The work of the claimant Society so far as Scotland is concerned is national in its character and scope. Its operations are constantly referred to in the public press and its reports are widely circulated. Subscriptions, donations, and legacies to a large amount are received by the Society from all parts of Scotland." (Cond. 3) "The claimant Society was formed under its present name in the year 1889 as the result of a series of successive amalgamations of a number of smaller bodies devoted to the same charitable work in Scotland. It continued to be known by its present name from 1889 to 1895, when negotiations were entered into with a view to affiliation or incorporation with a similar society which had been founded in London in 1884, and had adopted in 1888 the title of The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The latter society applied in 1895 for a royal charter and with a view to the inclusion of the Scottish Society within the scope of the charter, terms of affiliation, dated 19th January and 5th March 1895, were entered into. Under article 2 (5) of this agreement it was provided that 'all legacies left by Scottish testators, domiciled in Scotland, to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (unless directly specified to the contrary) shall belong to the Scottish Branch.' A charter was thereafter duly granted to the English Society, and in terms of the said agreement the claimant Society in 1895 adopted the designation of The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (Scottish Branch). After the said agreement had been acted on for ten years, it was found that the terms used in the said charter were insufficient to include the claimant Society, and in 1907 the latter reverted to the designation of The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The claimant Society has always maintained a separate and distinct organisation of its own. . . ." (Cond. 4) "The testator was a domiciled Scotsman and his interests and associations were exclusively Scottish. The trust administered by the pursuers is a Scottish trust and all the trustees are Scottish. Under his trust-disposition and settlement the testator also made a series of bequests in favour of other charities. All these other charities are Scottish, and there are no bequests in favour of any English charities. The bequest in question is preceded by three bequests and succeeded by four bequests, all in favour of Scottish charities. In the year 1909 the attention of the testator was particularly drawn to the operations of the claimant Society by a case of cruelty to children which occurred on his own estate of Middlebank, and in which he was interested. The case was taken up by the claimant Society, and had the accused not pleaded guilty, the testator's gamekeeper and gardener were to have been witnesses for the prosecution. It is believed and averred that the testator then formed a favourable opinion of the charitable work carried on by the claimants, and that the legacy now in dispute was designed by him to assist in the furtherance of their work."

Dec. 17, 1912.
Nasmyth's
Trustees v.
National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

On 17th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter), after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, repelled the claim of the National Society, and ranked and preferred the claimants the Scottish Society to the fund in medio.*

* "OPINION.—The late Mr Alexander Hogg Nasmyth of Middlebank died on 3rd June 1911 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, in which, inter alia, he directed payment by his trustees of a legacy in these terms:—'To the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Five hundred pounds, free of legacy or other Government duty and other charges.' In the present action of multiplepounding that legacy is claimed by two societies, The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, incorporated by royal charter, and having its central office in London, and The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 137 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

"The claimants each asked for a finding in their favour without inquiry, but the Scottish Society maintained that if against them I ought to allow them a proof of certain averments. It appears to me, however, that all the material facts averred are either made matter of admission as after stated, or that they are not of such a character that I could competently allow them to be proved. Neither claimant says that the testator subscribed to their funds, and, even if it be legitimate to inquire into the testator's intention, I think specific facts must be averred from which an inference of intention may be drawn. What the Court has a right to ascertain is, as the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) said in the case of Charter v. Charter, L. R., 7 H. L. 364, at p. 377,—'All the facts which were known to the testator at the time he made his will, and thus to place itself in the testator's position in order to ascertain the bearing and application of the language which he uses.'

"The National Society were, it seems, incorporated under their name in 1895. They had been known by the same name since 1889. They, therefore, say that, as they are the only one of the two societies claiming which the designation employed by the testator exactly fits, they are entitled to succeed. The strength of their position appears to me to be weakened by the circumstance, which was made matter of admission by their counsel, that their charitable operations do not extend to Scotland, but are entirely confined to England, Ireland, and Wales. They do not aver that the testator knew of their work or took any interest in their existence. The other claimants say they are in a similar position to a society in Australia or America making a claim to a legacy left by a Scotsman in a Scots will.

"The Scottish National Society maintain that the description used fits and designates them. To a Scotsman the Society which is national is, they say, the one which benefits his own nation, and the addition of the word

Dec. 17, 1912.

Nasmyth's
Trustees v.
National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

The claimants the National Society reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 17th December 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—There was no ambiguity in the will. These claimants were correctly named and designed therein, and the Scottish Society was not. The Lord Ordinary was wrong in treating the word "National" as descriptive; it was spelt with a capital letter, and was clearly meant to be nothing more than part of the name. In such circumstances extrinsic evidence of the testator's intention was inadmissible.¹ These claimants were therefore entitled to be ranked and preferred to the legacy de plano.

Argued for the claimants the Scottish Society;—The Lord Ordinary was right in holding that, in a Scottish will, "National" meant "Scottish." If, however, there was any ambiguity about the designation, a proof should be allowed to ascertain in what sense it was used by the testator.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Court is of opinion that it would hardly be safe to affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor without inquiry. The case is not sufficiently clear, although, so far as I can see at present, it is extremely probable that the testator was referring to the Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. There must be some inquiry, because we are here dealing with a word which is unquestionably ambiguous, the word "National"; and evidence is necessary to show in what sense it was used by this testator.

LORD SALVESEN and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and allowed the claimants a proof of their averments.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—BRUCE, KERR, & BURNS, W.S.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

'Scottish' neither adds to nor detracts from the designation. Certain illustrations of this, to which I need not refer, were given in the course of the argument which I heard. These claimants also point out that the will is in Scots form, and that the other charities benefited are all Scottish. These circumstances might, of themselves, have been insufficient to justify my finding in favour of the Scottish Society. They have, however, to be taken in conjunction with the fact that the other Society does no charitable work in Scotland; and that the Scottish Society was for a period of nine years prior to 1907 known as The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (Scottish Branch). The importance of the latter circumstance is, if anything, increased on the assumption that the National Society is right in stating that the testator's will of 1911 is a verbatim copy of an earlier will made by him in 1906. On the whole, I think that there is sufficient to justify me in preferring the claim of the Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children to the fund, and I shall accordingly do so."

¹ Charter v. Charter, (1874) L. R., 7 H. L. 364, per Lord Hatherley, at p. 376.

² Charter v. Charter, L. R., 7 H. L. 364; Wedderspoon v. Thomson's Trustees, (1824) 3 S. 396; Scottish Missionary Society v. Home Mission Committee, (1858) 20 D. 634; Jarman on Wills (6th ed.), vol. 1, pp. 513, 518.

Mrs EMMA MARY BROWN OR MEACHER, Pursuer (Respondent).—

No. 59.

M'Lennan, K.C.—T. G. Robertson.

PHILIP LAWRENCE KINGTON BLAIR-OLIPHANT, Defender (Reclaimer).

Dec. 17, 1912.

—Macphail, K.C.—Hamilton.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

Property—Title to Heritage—Inland loch—Riparian proprietors—Prior title to lands with parts and pertinents—Subsequent express title to loch—Prescription—Exclusive possession.

In the case of a grant of lands abutting on an inland loch, with parts and pertinents, there is a presumption that the grantee has a joint right of property in the loch, along with the other proprietor or proprietors whose lands abut upon it. This presumption will not be prejudiced by a subsequent express grant of the loch to another, unless that grant is followed for the prescriptive period by such exclusive possession as would be required by law for the establishment of a new and adverse right in the possessor; any lesser degree of possession, such as might be admissible for the purpose of explaining the limits of a grant or conveyance in a question with its author, being insufficient.

Evidence which was held (rev. judgment of Lord Guthrie) to be insufficient to establish exclusive possession of an inland loch.

Property—Title to heritage—Bounding title—Property described as lying within parish—Proof of parochial boundaries—Plans and Ordnance Survey maps.

In an action between two landed proprietors as to the ownership of a loch the pursuer contended that the defender was excluded from the loch by the fact that the latter's estate was described in his titles as lying within the parish of Blairgowrie, and that the loch lay outwith the parish boundaries.

Evidence on which it was held that the pursuer had failed to prove that the loch lay outwith the parish boundaries.

Observations (1) on the evidence required to prove parish boundaries, and (2) on the value of plans and Ordnance Survey maps as evidence.

Prescription—Positive—Admissibility of referring to titles prior to title forming basis of prescription.

In a question of prescription it is not permissible to refer to titles prior to the title or series of titles which forms the basis of the prescription for the purpose of explaining away, or altering, or qualifying the investiture secured by prescription.

On 14th November 1910 Mrs Emma Mary Brown or Meacher, EXTRA DIVISION. heiress of entail in possession of the lands and estate of Marlee and Balcairn, in the parish of Kinloch, and county of Perth, brought an action against Captain Philip Lawrence Kington Blair-Oliphant, the owner of Ardblair, in the parish of Blairgowrie and county of Perth, for declarator "that the pursuer has, under her titles, the sole and exclusive right to the Fingask Loch, in the county of Perth, including the solum thereof, and to the fishings thereof, together with the sole and exclusive right and privilege of using boats, nets, and rods, and fishing in and shooting from the said loch, and generally of exercising all rights of property in connection therewith, and that the defender has no right of property or servitude or other right whatever except the servitude of watering cattle or other bestial * in the said loch or

* The words in italics were added by amendment at the conclusion of the hearing on evidence in the Outer House.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

fishings or shootings and no privilege of using boats or fishing in or shooting from the said loch in any manner of way; and separatim, that the pursuer and her predecessors and authors have for time immemorial, or for forty years, been in the exclusive enjoyment and possession under their titles, of the said Fingask Loch, and the fishings and shootings thereof, including all the privileges connected therewith: And further, the defender ought and should be interdicted, prohibited, and discharged by decree foresaid from placing or using boats on the said loch, and from entering or trespassing upon the same, or passing on to or over the solum thereof, and from fishing in the said loch, either from the banks or from boats or by means of wading or in any other way, and from shooting from the said loch, and from, in any way, interfering with the pursuer's peaceable possession of the said loch and fishings and shootings in all time coming."

Fingask Loch is a narrow inland loch wholly surrounded by the lands of the pursuer and defender, Marlee, the estate of the pursuer, forming its western boundary, and Ardblair, the estate of the defender, forming its eastern boundary.

The oldest title with which the pursuer could connect herself by progress was a Crown charter of July 1764, of "Totas et integras villam et terras de Kinloch [the old name for Marlee] comprehendentes terras aliaque subscripta vizt., . . . necnon tres lacus et piscationes dictarum terrarum de Kinloch. . . ." One of the "tres lacus" was admittedly the Fingask Loch.

The oldest title with which the defender could connect himself by progress was a Crown charter of novodamus of May 1674 of "Totas et integras terras de Ardblair . . . cum piscationibus . . . annexis connexis partibus pendiculis et earum pertinentiis, quibusque jacen." The same charter contained further on a grant of "totam et integram umbrosam illam dimidietatem vulgariter vocat Shadouhalfe . . . cum partibus pendiculis et ejusdem pertinentiis et cum privilegio et libertate piscandi in tribus illis sive stagnis sive lacubus lee and lochs infra barroniam de Kinloch . . . cum libero introitu et exitu ad dictos lacus." This reference to Shadouhalfe never afterwards appeared in the progress of titles. From 1721 downwards the lands of Ardblair were described in all the titles as lying within the parish of Blairgowrie.

There were also extant other titles of earlier dates, with which, however, the parties could not connect themselves. The earliest of these relating to the defender's lands was a charter by William de Haya confirmed by the Crown, of 1423, the earliest relating to the pursuer's lands a Crown charter of 1541.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 6) "Under her said title the pursuer has the sole and exclusive right to and in the said Fingask Loch, including the solum, and to the fishings and shootings thereof of every description; and she has the sole right and privilege of using boats on the said loch, and of fishing therein and shooting therefrom." (Cond. 7) "In virtue of their titles the pursuer and her authors have for time immemorial, or at least for forty years, enjoyed exclusive possession of the said loch and fishings and shootings, and uninterruptedly exercised the said privileges connected therewith. In particular they, and their tenants with their permission, have for the above period kept boats upon the said loch, and used the same without interruption for fishing and shooting over the whole of the loch, including those portions of it lying ex adverso of the defender's lands. In or about the year 1890 the pursuer learned, as was the fact, that one of the defender's tenants named Falconer, had put a boat on the loch. She thereupon ordered him to take his boat off the loch, and he did so in obedience to her orders. The pursuer has been in the habit of letting the sporting rights on certain parts of her lands to the defender. The last lease was granted in 1904 for five years from 1st March 1904, and includes her sporting rights on the said loch. Annexed to the said lease, and signed by both the pursuer and the defender, there is a plan showing the said loch as lying wholly within the lands and estate of the pursuer. For many years, ending about 1860, the pursuer's authors regularly dug marl from the solum of the said loch, and either used or sold it as manure. A regular and substantial income was derived by the pursuer's authors from such sales of marl dug from the said loch. Marl digging in the said loch was practised only by the pursuer's authors, who asserted and enjoyed the exclusive right thereto, and exercised it in the knowledge and with the consent and acquiescence of the defender or his authors. In particular the pursuer's authors and they alone dug marl at points in the loch east of a straight line drawn across the loch from north to south connecting the eastmost point of their lands on the north shore of the loch with the eastmost point of their lands on the south shore. This they did unchallenged and in the knowledge of the defender or his authors, both ex adverso of their own lands and ex adverso of the defender's lands. The defender and his authors have thus acquiesced in the claim of the pursuer and her authors to the sole and exclusive rights in and to the said loch."

Dec. 17, 1912.
Meacher v.
Blair.
Oliphant.

In a statement of facts the defender averred, inter alia;—(Stat. 7) "The defender and his authors have at all times, and for far more than the prescriptive period, possessed the said loch as part of the said lands of Ardblair, and exercised the rights of riparian proprietors therein. In particular, the defender's authors, and those in their right have dug and removed marl therefrom and jointly with the pursuer's authors, have granted leases of the fishing and shooting in and upon the said loch. Further, the defender himself, prior to the granting of the leases mentioned in article 7 of the pursuer's condescendence, made use of the said loch for the purposes of fishing and shooting. The tenants of the defender and his authors have constantly exercised the right of fishing in the said loch and of keeping boats thereon, and have watered their cattle at the loch and pastured their cattle down to the water's edge below the flood mark, all with the knowledge and authority of the defender and his authors, and without challenge or interference on the part of the pursuer or her authors."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having, in virtue of her titles, the exclusive rights to the Fingask Loch, and to the fishings and shootings thereof, and the defender having challenged said right, decree of declarator should be granted as craved. (2) Separatim, the pursuer and her authors having for time immemorial, or at least for forty years, enjoyed the exclusive possession of the said loch and fishings and shootings, upon an express grant thereof in their titles, the pursuer is now exclusively in right of the said loch and fishings and shootings, and the defender having challenged said right, decree of declarator should be granted as craved. (5) The defender's title being a bounding one, and the said loch being situated beyond the boundaries of his lands, the defences should be repelled.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The pursuer having no title either by express grant or otherwise to an exclusive right to the said loch, the defender should be assolizied from the conclusions of the summons. (3) The defender, in respect of his titles, et separatim in respect of the possession had by him and his authors under the said titles, has a joint right to the said loch along with the pursuer as the other riparian proprietor, and should be assolizied from the conclusions of the summons.

A proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence will be found set forth in the opinions of Lord Dundas and Lord Mackenzie.

On 23rd November 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges, in terms of the conclusion of the summons for interdict, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—The subject in controversy, namely the right of the defender to joint ownership of the Fingask Loch with the pursuer, while it seems, from the possibility of future feuing, and the advantage the defender's water-side feus would have for that purpose, if they carried a right of boating, bathing, fishing, and shooting on the loch, to be of some conceivable future importance to the defender, is of only nominal value to the pursuer. Her concession of the defender's servitude of watering deprives her right of property of its most important incidents; and her project for killing out the pike and perch, and stocking with trout, would not have been objected to by the defender. The pursuer's position seems to be that of the captain in 'Hamlet':—'Truly to speak, and with no addition, we go to gain a little patch of ground, that hath in it no profit but the name.' And, before this case is ended, it may turn out that Hamlet's reply will be also applicable:—'Twenty thousand ducats will not debate the question of this straw.'

"Fingask Loch is bounded, as near as may be, to the extent of half by the pursuer's property of Marlee, on the west side, and as to the other half by the defender's property of Ardblair, on the east. In these circumstances, the presumption is that both pursuer and defender have a joint right of property in the loch—Cochrane v. Earl of Minto, 6 Pat. App. 139; Scott v. Lord Napier, 7 Macph. (H. L.) 35; Stewart's Trustees v. Robertson, 1 R. 334. The defender has never claimed more; the pursuer claims under her titles, and her titles with possession, an exclusive right.

"The pursuer founds, as her earliest title, on a Crown charter, dated 14th July 1541, in which, among the lands described in the dispositive clause, are the following:—'Easter Kinloch with the mill thereof, and with the three lochs and their fishings.' I hold it sufficiently proved that one of these three lochs was the Fingask Loch now in question, the other two being the Marlee Loch and the Rae Loch. (The defender argues that, because the pursuer does not claim exclusive possession of the Marlee Loch, she cannot claim exclusive possession of Fingask Loch. This is a non sequitur.) The title granted in 1604, No. 14, naming the lochs, although only a security writ, is legitimate evidence of this, and is confirmed by the universal understanding, and by the absence of any other lochs on the lands in question. The pursuer's previous title, in 1499, refers to lochs in the tenendas clause only, and does not mention any number. The subsequent titles all refer to three lochs, with the exception of a title in 1657, No. 23, where the number is omitted. From 1700 onwards, the three lochs are conveyed, not 'unacum,' but as separate subjects, and they are described as lying within the parish of Kinloch. There is a gap in the pursuer's titles between 1700, when they were in the ownership of Gall, and 1757, when, by No. 24, Farquharson of Invercauld conveyed the lands of Kinloch as

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 24th, 25th, 29th, and 30th October 1912.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The earliest title with which the pursuer could connect herself was a charter of 1764, the earliest with which the defender could connect himself was a charter of 1674, nearly a hundred years earlier. That charter contained a grant of Ardblair as complete as it was possible to make a grant, viz., a grant of the whole lands with parts and pertinents. The lands of Ardblair in fact abutted on the loch now, and must be held to have abutted on the loch at the date of the grant unless the contrary were proved, and no proof had even been attempted. The result was that the grant of Ardblair was a grant of the dry land of Ardblair with a portion of the solum of the loch proportional to the extent of the lands of Ardblair which abutted on the loch, and a right of shooting proprietor. The Crown charter of 1764, No. 26, is the first with which the pursuer connects herself without a break. The pursuer's father, Mr Brown, acquired the lands in 1844, from the Farquharsons of Invercauld, under the Act of Parliament of 1828, No. 20.

"An express title like the pursuer's, if granted subsequent to a Crown grant to another waterside proprietor of lands adjacent to the loch with parts and pertinents, can only prevail to prevent the proprietor under the earlier title having a joint right of property in the loch, by evidence of exclusive possession for the prescriptive period—Scott v. Napier, 7 Macph. (H. L.) 36; Stewart's Trustees v. Robertson, 1 R. 334. In the ordinary case of parts and pertinents, possession is necessary to show what the parts and pertinents cover, but, in the case of lands bordering a loch, if these lands are held with a clause of parts and pertinents, a joint right of property in the loch will be presumed, and this presumption can only be overcome, in the case of a subsequent express grant, by proof of exclusive possession by the holder of that express grant.

"The defender's earliest title is in 1423—a grant by a subject superior, confirmed by the Crown, which contains a clause of parts and pertinents connected with the lands of Muirton and Ardblair, one or other of which includes the defender's lands bordering on the loch of Fingask. The defender's earliest title is thus earlier than the pursuer's earliest title. Neither the pursuer nor the defender can connect themselves by an unbroken progress with the earliest title of their lands, namely the pursuer's of 1541 and the defender's of 1423. The defender's progress of titles is continuous after 1674, No. 146. Thus, whether the earliest title of the defender's lands be taken, namely, the title in 1423, or the earliest with which he can connect himself without a break, namely, the title of 1674, in either case his title, with parts and pertinents, is earlier than the pursuer's express title, for her earliest title is in 1541, and the earliest title with which she can connect herself is in 1764.

"The sole question is, has the pursuer, who has an express but subsequent title to the loch, possessed so as to involve an exclusive right of proprietorship? or, has the defender, who has, in an earlier title, a right to parts and pertinents, which may include a joint right in the loch, not possessed sufficiently to prevent a claim of exclusive possession by the pursuer? So stated, the onus is on the pursuer.

"The evidence of general repute does not go far back, and is to some extent discounted by the defender's admission that the pursuer is entitled to the rights of a part proprietor. But, so far as it goes, it may be said to be entirely in favour of the pursuer. Had the question been that of the pursuer's right to part proprietorship, her claim would have been clear from her title and the possession following on it. It is not so clear that she has

Dec. 17, 1912.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

and fishing over the whole in common with the other proprietor. It was a well-established rule of law that, apart from proof to the contrary, where lands abutted on a loch, a portion of the solum of the loch belonged to and formed part of those lands, and the owner of the lands had further a common right of shooting and fishing over the whole loch.¹ The loch was not in any sense merely a pertinent of the lands: it was part of the lands granted by the charter and accordingly no possession was required to interpret the grant as including it.² This was in fact just as good a grant of the loch as an express grant of the lands with the loch, and was accordingly as good a title as the title nearly a hundred years later in date produced by the pursuer. It was therefore quite unnecessary for the defender to fortify his title by possession. The case of *Agnew v. Lord Advocate*³ was quite different. That case dealt with the fore-shore, and there it was held that possession was required to give a ousted the defender from claiming that his title includes a right of part proprietorship in the loch. The pursuer has possessed the loch in every possible way, and has done so continuously and from time immemorial. It is unnecessary to go into details on this point. If she has not had exclusive possession, it must be on account of possession by the defender. The use of the loch by the public of Blairgowrie for boating and fishing was not an assertion of any right, and it is accounted for by the valuelessness of the subject.

"It therefore becomes necessary to consider what possession the defender has had of the loch, and to determine its nature and extent. That question may be looked at in two ways: First, what, if anything, did he do in assertion of his alleged right? Second, what, if anything, did the defender do inconsistent with his alleged right?

"First, what, if anything, did the defender do in assertion of his alleged right of part proprietorship of Fingask Loch?

"1. Watering animals. That the cattle and other animals, in the defender's fields adjoining the loch, drank the water in the loch without objection by the pursuer is admitted. But this use involved no assertion of a right of property on the defender's part. Its effect as establishing a servitude in favour of the defender has been conceded by the pursuer, with the result, probably, that the pursuer will be debarred from fencing, polluting, or draining the loch. It is true that not only did the cattle water, but fences were run into the area of the loch to keep the cattle in their respective fields. But this was a mere innocuous accessory of a servitude, which, as such, I am not satisfied that the pursuer could have prevented.

"2. Boating, fishing, and shooting. There is no evidence that the laird of Ardblair ever had a boat of his own on Fingask Loch down to 1903, when the defender took his Norwegian skiff there from the Rae Loch, at which date he had a sporting lease from the pursuer covering the whole loch. But he used boats belonging to other people, and, in particular, the boat of Menzies, pursuer's tenant. The effect of the evidence of boating, fishing, and shooting is discounted on both sides, when it is found that, right to the foreshore, the reason being that in the case of the fore-^{Dec. 17, 1912.} shore, in contrast with the case of the solum of a loch, there was no presumption that it went with the lands. If, however, it were necessary for the defender to show possession, the evidence showed that he and his authors had all along exercised the ordinary rights of a proprietor in the loch. He accordingly had a good and complete title fortified by possession for the prescriptive period.¹ When the charter of 1674 had been in existence for nearly a hundred years the Crown granted the pursuer's charter of 1764. If it was a grant of the whole loch of Fingask it was a grant a non domino, the Crown having already given the defender's author a portion of the loch. It was not, however, if fairly construed, a grant of the whole of the loch: it was not in any sense an exclusive grant, but was merely a grant which expressed in words what was implied in the defender's grant, viz., that the lands abutting on the loch carried with them a right to a certain portion of the solum and common rights of shooting and fish-

¹ Rankine on Landownership, 4th ed., p. 195; Scott v. Lord Napier, (1869) 7 Macph. (H. L.) 35; Mackenzie v. Bankes, (1878) 5 R. (H. L.) 192, at p. 202, (1877) 5 R. 278; Menzies v. Wentworth, (1901) 3 F. 941, Lord Kinnear, at p. 958; Bankton, ii. 3, 12; Stair, ii. 3, 73; Bell's Prin. (10th ed.) secs. 648-651.

² Stair, ii. 3, 60, and 73; Erskine, Inst. ii. 6, 4, and 5; Bell's Prin., secs. 648-651; Macdonell, &c. v. Caledonian Canal Commissioners, (1830) 8 S. 881, at p. 886; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, sec. 47 (2).

³ (1873) 11 Macph. 309.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Olipphant.

owing apparently to the proximity of Blairgowrie and the valuelessness of the fishing and shooting, Fingask Loch was free to all.

"3. Taking marl from the bed of the loch. The defender tried to prove the taking of marl. In my opinion, he has not done so. In view of the convenient situation of Fingask Loch, and of the value of marl, and of the defender having taken it from adjoining places, but never from Fingask, there is a strong presumption against his right of proprietorship in the loch.

"4. Taking reeds and sand. It is not proved that the reeds were taken in the loch. Sand has only been taken within the last twenty years, and only on two or three occasions, in insignificant quantities.

"5. Preparation of plans showing part of the loch within his property. The defender founds on plans prepared by Stobie, No. 168, and a copy in the Advocates' Library, and some evidence was led about the different versions of these plans. This point seems to me unimportant. Any proceeding by the defender, which could constitute an interference with the pursuer's exclusive possession, must have been one of which the pursuer knew or was bound to know—Place v. Breadalbane, 1 R. 1202; Reid v. Haldane's Trustees, 18 R. 744.

"Second, what, if anything, did the defender do inconsistent with his alleged right?

"1. Inserting a statement in his titles on and after 1721, No. 38, that his estate is all within the parish of Blairgowrie, whereas the loch is entirely within the parish of Kinloch. I do not found on this point. The proof is not clear that the Ordnance Survey map is right in taking the boundary of Blairgowrie parish outside the area of the loch—Gibson v. Bonnington Co., 7 Macph. 394. The two statistical accounts of 1796 and 1845 do not agree. Besides, the title of 1721 and subsequent charters by progress could not affect the defender's feudal estate if once duly constituted—Boyd, 11 Macph. 243, 246.

"2. Failing to challenge the action of the pursuer's authors in applying to Parliament and obtaining the Act of 1828, and selling under the Act, on the basis that the whole loch belonged to Marlee. The pursuer is entitled to make this point; but I do not attach much importance to it. The defender was not directly concerned with the parliamentary application.

"3. Accepting a lease from the pursuer on the footing that the pursuer was sole proprietor of the loch. In 1904 the defender took a sporting lease from the pursuer, No. 22, the terms of which, and plan attached,

¹ Lord Advocate v. McCulloch, (1874) 2 R. 27, at p. 32; Menzies v. Macdonald, (1854) 16 D. 827.

Dec. 17, 1912. ing over the whole. Taking it, however, as an express and exclusive grant, it was nearly one hundred years later than the defender's grant and could only give the pursuer a right to the loch if followed by continuous, exclusive, and adverse possession of the whole loch during the prescriptive period.¹ No lesser degree of possession was of any avail. In *Lord Advocate v. Wemyss*² Lord Watson's opinion that a lesser degree of possession might suffice to explain an antecedent grant than was required to establish a new right was limited to the case of a question between the author of the grant and the grantee. Here the de quo queritur was whether the pursuer had a right to the whole loch; and it was accordingly obvious that evidence that she had exercised rights in the loch along with the defender was quite immaterial and would only help to establish what the defender admitted and contended for, viz., a joint right. There was in the case no evidence of exclusive possession, but, on the contrary, evidence that both the pursuer and the defender had used the loch in the ordinary way as joint proprietors. The pursuer's suggestion that the defender's use of the loch for the purpose of watering cattle was in virtue of a right of servitude was merely an ingenious invention to explain away an adverse item of evidence. With regard to the argument that the defender was excluded from the loch by the fact that in certain of his titles the lands were stated to be within the parish of Blairgowrie, whereas the loch was outwith the parish, the answer was two-fold. In the first place it was not proved in the case that the loch was outwith the parish, the evidence of the maps and plans being contradictory and worthless.³ In the second place the description by parish boundary did not appear in the original grant, and the defender or his authors had acquired a good title to the loch before its introduction.⁴ If it were legitimate to go back to the earliest titles, it was in the defender's favour that his earliest title show the whole loch as part of the pursuer's estate. This strongly suggests that the defender did not at the time maintain his present contention.

"4. Framing estate plans on the footing that Fingask Loch was excluded. This involves a comparison between Nos. 168 and 183 of process, and depends on points which the evidence leaves obscure.

"5. Allowing pursuer's authors to make a road on the east side of the loch. The evidence about this road is too vague to be of any value. The point is not made on record.

"6. Allowing pursuer to take marl from the eastern side of the loch. This is not proved.

"7. Granting a lease on the footing that the defender had no interest in the loch. See the lease of 1897 by the defender to Thomas Henry Smith, No. 145.

"On the whole, with some reluctance, I hold that the pursuer has proved possession of all kinds in the loch for time immemorial, and has sufficiently shown that there was no possession of the loch by any other person, and, in particular, by the defender or his predecessors, to exclude her claim founded on exclusive possession."

¹ Scott v. Lord Napier, 7 Macph. (H. L.) 35; Stewart's Trustees v. Robertson, (1874) 1 R. 334.

² (1899) 2 F. (H. L.) 1.

³ Place v. Earl of Breadalbane, (1874) 1 R. 1202.

⁴ Boyd v. Bruce and Others, (1872) 11 Macph. 243; Reference was also made to Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, (3rd ed.) vol. i., pp. 599, 603; Baird v. Robertson, (1836) 14 S. 396; Dick v. Earl of Abercorn, (1769) M. 12,813.

was one with a clause of parts and pertinents prior in date to the pursuer's earliest title which referred to lochs in the tenendas clause only, and did not mention the three lochs.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

Argued for the respondent;—On a sound view of the titles and the evidence as to possession, the pursuer was entitled to the whole loch. The defender's case broke down at its very outset. The foundation of the defender's case was the alleged grant in 1674 of lands de facto abutting on the loch. The defender had however completely failed to prove that in 1674 the lands of Ardblair did abut upon the loch, and therefore the whole of his subsequent argument fell to the ground. The fact that Ardblair at the present time reached the loch was no evidence that it did so in 1674. This in itself disposed of the defender's case. Assuming however that that fact had been proved by the defender, the pursuer's title, followed by the possession which had been proved, gave her the whole loch. Her title was equivalent to an express grant of the loch, while the defender's title made no mention of the loch and could only cover it as a "part and pertinent." At best the defender's was an ambiguous title with perhaps a presumption of right in the loch, and, in a competition between an earlier ambiguous title and a later express title, the later title prevailed, at any rate if there had been sufficient possession under the later title to explain away the earlier title and redargue the presumption.¹ Exclusive and adverse and continuous possession, such as was required for the acquisition of a new right, was not necessary.² In *Stewart's Trustees v. Robertson*³ the dicta that exclusive possession was necessary were accounted for by a misapprehension of the facts in Scott v. Lord Napier.⁴ In *Baird v. Robertson*⁵ the later title cum lacubus with possession was upheld against the earlier cum pertinentibus. It was a general rule applicable to all subjects that "where a tenement of land is possessed by one barely as pertinent, and by another in virtue of an express right, he who possesses under the express right is in dubio to be preferred to the other."⁶ In the present case the pursuer had proved possession of the loch exercised by all the known means of exercise, and in view of the fact that she or her authors had alone worked the marl, the most important adjunct of the loch, there were good grounds for saying that her possession had been exclusive, had it been necessary for her to prove exclusive possession. The defender however failed upon another and independent ground. All his later titles described the lands as lying within the parish of Blairgowrie. That was a bounding title, and excluded from his lands everything which lay beyond the parish boundary.⁷ The Ordnance Survey map and the other plans produced showed that the loch was beyond the limits of the parish, and there was no contradic-

¹ Scott v. Lord Napier, 7 Macph. (H. L.) 35, at pp. 74 and 81; Scott v. Lindsay, (1635) M. 12,771; Menzies v. Macdonald, (1856) 2 Macq. 463, at p. 474.

² Lord Advocate v. Wemyss, 2 F. (H. L.) 1, per Lord Watson, at pp. 9 and 10; Earl of Fife's Trustees v. Cuming, (1830) 8 S. 326; Agnew v. Lord Advocate, (1873) 11 Macph. 309; Macdonald v. Farquharson, (1836) 15 S. 259; Auld v. Hay, (1880) 7 R. 663; Young v. North British Railway Co., (1887) 14 R. (H. L.) 53.

³ 1 R. 334.

⁴ 7 Macph. (H. L.) 35.

⁵ 14 S. 396.

⁶ Ersk. Inst. ii., 6, 3.

⁷ Gordon v. Grant, (1850) 13 D. 1; Lord Advocate v. Wemyss, 2 F. (H. L.) 1, Lord Watson, at p. 10.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

tory evidence. Doubtless an Ordnance Survey map was not in itself conclusive evidence,¹ but in the present case there was proof that it had been compiled from the best contemporaneous evidence, and it was borne out by the estate plans.² The defender could not get rid of this boundary limitation by the simple expedient of going back to his earliest title in which it did not appear.³ The only charter to which it was lawful to go back to correct an error in a charter by progress was the original investiture,⁴ and the charter of 1674 was not an original investiture but a charter of novodamus. The case of *Boyd v. Bruce and Others*⁵ referred to by the Lord Ordinary was distinguishable on various grounds, and, inter alia, on the ground that the question there was one between a superior and his vassal. The fact too that the lands of Shadonhalfe, granted in the same deed to the same grantee, had annexed to them a permit or right of access to the "three lochs," tended to show that the grantee had no right of ownership in the lochs. If he had had any such right, the permit would have been superfluous and unnecessary. It was illegitimate in any case to go back beyond the progress of titles with which the parties could connect themselves.

At advising on 17th December 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The pursuer of this action, Mrs Meacher, is heiress of entail in possession of the estate of Marlee in Perthshire. The defender is proprietor of the estate of Ardblair, which lies immediately to the east of and marches with Marlee. The dispute is as to the parties' rights of ownership respectively in Loch Fingask, which is 23 acres in extent, and is bounded in about equal proportions by lands admittedly belonging to the parties. The pursuer claims to be sole proprietrix of the loch. The defender says that he is owner of its solum to an extent corresponding with his riparian ownership, and has joint rights with the pursuer in and over its waters. The summons concludes for declarator of Mrs Meacher's sole and exclusive right in virtue of her titles; et separatim, of those titles followed by exclusive possession. The Lord Ordinary has granted decree "in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons." It is admitted that the interlocutor as framed cannot stand.

One must consider, in the first place the respective titles of the parties. Ancient deeds are produced upon both sides, with which it is admitted they cannot connect themselves by an unbroken progress of title. These may be dismissed from consideration; they are not the title-deeds of the parties to the case. The earliest title produced by the defender with which he can validly connect himself is a Crown charter of novodamus, dated in 1674, in favour of John Blair of Ardblair and his son, of the lands of Ardblair with parts and pertinents. It is admitted that the defender's estate now abuts

¹ Gibson v. Bonnington Sugar Refining Co., Limited, (1869) 7 Macph. 394.

² Reid v. Haldane's Trustees, (1891) 18 R. 744. Sec. 17 of the Ordnance Survey Act, 1841 (4 and 5 Vict. cap. 30), was also referred to.

³ Threipland v. Rutherford, (1848) 10 D. 1079, Lord Fullerton's dissenting opinion.

⁴ Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin, (1889) 16 R. 1104, Lord Adam, at p. 1117.

⁵ 11 Macph. 243.

on Loch Fingask, as already stated. The pursuer's counsel suggested rather Dec. 17, 1912. than argued that it is not proved that it did so in 1674. There is, I think, ^{Meacher v.} no substance in the suggestion. No notice of any such point is given by Blair-^{Oliphant.} the pursuer on record; she avers that the defender's lands "abut on the east side of the Fingask Loch"; and the present description of the defender's lands in his title has been substantially the same for a very long period of time. The defender's charter of 1674 therefore must be taken to be a grant by the Crown of lands de facto abutting on this loch. I think that such a grant, with parts and pertinents, is sufficient, apart from possession, to carry a joint right of property in the solum of the loch; and that a subsequent grant by the Crown to another, expressly conveying the entire loch, would be pro tanto ultra vires of the Crown, as proceeding a non domino, and inept, unless followed by exclusive possession of the whole loch for the prescriptive period. This is, in my opinion, the correct result of the authorities to which we were referred, particularly of *Scott v. Napier*¹ and Stewart's Trustees v. Robertson.²

The earliest title upon which the pursuer can found is a Crown charter in favour of her author in 1764,—ninety years later than the defender's title already referred to,—of, inter alia, the lands of Kinloch Easter and others, necnon tres lacus et piscationes dictarum terrarum de Kinloch. It is admitted that one of the tres lacus here referred to is Loch Fingask. It is unnecessary, in the view I take of the case, to consider or decide whether this grant of lands necnon tres lacus, &c., conferred any better or higher right on the grantee than one of the lands with parts and pertinents; but there seems to be authority in support of a negative answer to that question. It is, I think, clear that the pursuer's title cannot prejudice or prevail against the defender's earlier grant, unless it has been fortified by exclusive possession of the whole loch in question for the prescriptive period.

One must next consider whether or not the pursuer has proved such exclusive possession. Her counsel, as I understood them, suggested that possession might in this case be sufficient for their purpose, though falling short of the exclusive possession which has been held necessary in the ordinary cases with which one is familiar. They were not, however, able to explain what amount of possession might be considered sufficient; and I confess I find it difficult to understand the legal basis of their contention. We were referred especially to a dictum by Lord Watson in Lord Advocate v. Wemyss,³ where a distinction is recognised between "the prescriptive possession which establishes a new and adverse right in the possessor, and the prescriptive possession which the law admits for the purpose of construing or explaining, in a question with its author, the limits of an antecedent grant or conveyance." The pursuer cannot, in my opinion, derive the smallest aid from the distinction thus recognised. She is not here in a question with her author—I suppose the Crown; but is endeavouring to fortify—in a question with an earlier grantee from that author—a title which, according to my view, proceeded a non domino in so far as it pur-

¹ 7 Macph. (H. L.) 35.² 1 R. 334.³ 2 F. (H. L.) 1, at p. 9.

Dec. 17, 1912. Meacher v. Blair-Oliphant. Lord Dundas. reported to carry right to the whole solum of the loch, by prescriptive possession, which must, I apprehend, be of a character and quality sufficient to establish, as against the prior grantee, a better right to the portion of the solum which he claims. If, then, as I think, the possession had by the pursuer must, in order to establish the right she asserts, be continuous, exclusive, and adverse possession of the whole loch for the prescriptive period, I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that she has entirely failed to prove her case. The Lord Ordinary has held "with some reluctance, . . . that the pursuer has proved possession of all kinds in the loch, for time immemorial, and has sufficiently shown that there was no possession of the loch by any other person, and, in particular, by the defender or his predecessors, to exclude her claim founded on exclusive possession." I am unable to agree with this conclusion, or with the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary in support of it. It seems to me that, upon his Lordship's own showing, the pursuer's possession has not been exclusive.

I do not propose to deal in detail with the voluminous evidence in the case, but I shall endeavour to summarise such points in it as are sufficient, in my judgment, to negative the Lord Ordinary's conclusion. The most important acts of possession averred by the pursuer relate to the digging or "fishing" of marl from the loch. It is, I think, proved by the evidence, documentary and oral, that the pursuer's authors at one time dug marl to a considerable extent, and used or sold it as manure; they had a boat, or boats, for the purpose; the remains of an old pier used in connection with the "fishing" are spoken to; and the estate accounts produced, though they relate only to a comparatively recent period (1847-1856), show that marl was being dug, though not to a very remunerative extent, at that time. It also appears that several marl-pits have been dug in that part of the solum of the loch which the defender claims as his property; and the traces of at least one marl "midden" on the defender's land near the loch are deponed to. The pursuer's counsel urged that, as no positive evidence is forthcoming to the effect that the Ardblair proprietors or their tenants ever dug marl in the loch, the Court must infer that the operations just described were done by Marlee, in the exercise or assertion of a proprietary right, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of Ardblair. I do not think such an inference can, upon the evidence, be justifiably drawn. We know nothing of the time at which, or the circumstances in which, or the persons by whom, the pits were dug in the part of the loch claimed by the defender, and there is no proof that the digging in it was not done, as, for all we know, it may have been, by the proprietors of Ardblair or their tenants. Next, the pursuer avers that, a tenant of Ardblair named Falconer having put a boat on the loch, she ordered him to take it off and he accordingly did so. But this averment is, I think, not only not proved, but is disproved by the parole evidence. And, apart from Falconer's boat, it seems clear that the Ardblair tenants (the Scotts) have had boats on the loch from time to time, apparently without remonstrance on the part of Marlee. I refrain from commenting on such acts of possession as the cutting of reeds or taking of sand from the loch further than to say that the evidence is scanty and inconclusive on either side. Fishing (such as it is) stands in a similar position; but in so far as the proof shows that almost anyone who chose to do so fished in the loch unchecked and unheeded, it militates pro tanto against the pursuer's theory of exclusive possession. I next notice two points (of slight importance) which the Lord Ordinary thinks adverse to the defender's case. In 1904 the defender leased from the pursuer the shooting on some of the Marlee farms, "together with the sporting rights of the proprietrix in the adjoining loch of Fingask," for five years, at a rent of £15. The map annexed to the lease shows the farm lands coloured pink, and a pink line enclosing the whole of the loch. The Lord Ordinary observes that "this strongly suggests that the defender did not at the time maintain his present contention." The Lord Ordinary's view is, I think, unfair to the defender. It was, to my mind, quite right that the entire loch should be so shown on the plan, as the sporting rights which the pursuer admittedly has over the whole of it, even upon the defender's theory of joint proprietorship, were included in the subject of the lease. Then, in 1907, the defender granted a lease to a Mr Smith of "the exclusive right of sporting and shooting over the estate of Ardblair (including the White-loch),"—this express inclusion was, as the correspondence shows, specially desired by Mr Smith,—and also over the portion of Marlee let by the pursuer to the defender by the lease before mentioned, "and the sporting and shooting rights of the said proprietrix of Marlee in the adjoining loch of Fingask, all as presently possessed by the" defender. The Lord Ordinary says that this lease was granted "on the footing that the defender had no interest in the loch." But I do not think the terms of the lease, though perhaps unhappily expressed, are inconsistent with the defender's present contention that he is joint owner of the loch along with the pursuer. I next advert to a point which I consider to be of real importance on the question of possession, and as to which the Lord Ordinary has, in my judgment, gone materially astray. It is proved, and indeed I think admitted by the pursuer, that the cattle and other animals in the defender's fields adjoining Loch Fingask have always watered in the loch, and that fences have been run by the Ardblair tenants into the area of the loch to keep the beasts in their respective fields. The pursuer's counsel, very adroitly I think, sought to negative the effect of these prima facie formidable and adverse facts by tendering (at the conclusion of his speech upon the evidence) an amendment of the summons to the effect of admitting the existence of a "servitude of watering cattle or other beastial" in favour of the defender. The Lord Ordinary allowed the amendment, and in his opinion merely observes that the watering of cattle "involved no assertion of a right of property on the defender's part," and that the extension of the fences upon the solum of the loch "was a mere innocuous accessory of a servitude which, as such, I am not satisfied that the pursuer could have prevented." This method of dealing with the matter is, to my thinking, fallacious. If the pursuer's right to the whole solum of the loch was otherwise established, the watering of the defender's cattle might well be ascribed to a servitude acquired by him by way of burden on the pursuer's right. But the pursuer's right is not so established; it was, upon the assumption of the whole case, in the course of making, so to speak, by possession upon a title habile as a basis for prescription, but not in itself a complete or sufficient title of ownership.

Dec. 17, 1912.
Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.
Lord Dundas.

Dec. 17, 1912. The actings, therefore, of the defender's authors by way of watering and fencing cannot, in my opinion, be ascribed to servitude, but constitute evidence of an assertion by them of a proprietary right, sufficient probably by itself to negative the pursuer's claim to exclusive possession of the entire

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

loch. Upon a consideration of the whole evidence, it appears to me that the defender and his authors have throughout acted in a manner quite consistent with his present claim, and that the pursuer has entirely failed to prove exclusive possession of the loch for the prescriptive period.

Lord Dundas.

There remains, however, for consideration one matter which is not wholly free from difficulty. In the defender's titles from 1721 onwards, his lands are described as lying within the parish of Blairgowrie. The pursuer says that Loch Fingask lies wholly outside that parish, and that, the defender's title being a bounding one, he can have no right to any part of the solum. The Lord Ordinary is in the defender's favour on this point; he passes over the matter rather lightly in his opinion, but I think his conclusion is right. The pursuer's strongest point is the Ordnance Survey map of 1859, which shows the boundary of Blairgowrie parish as going along the east shore of Loch Fingask, and her witness, Mr Bennett, exhibited the "Boundary Remark Book," with the original sketches and notes from which the survey of this part of Perthshire was made. It contains a certificate by two inhabitants of the district, who had apparently been appointed by the Sheriff as "meersmen" to assist the surveyors, in terms of the Act 4 and 5 Vict. c. 30, and the certificate bears that "the boundary as described in this book from p. 49 to p. 62 between the parishes of Blairgowrie and Kinloch was pointed out by us this day and is strictly correct." This evidence is admissible, but it is not conclusive. One notices that the certificate applies generally to the whole line of the boundary between the parishes. It is not easy to conjecture how the "meersmen" can have known, or thought they knew, the parish boundary as regards this loch—a subject in itself of no importance for parochial purposes. But the Ordnance Survey map does not stand uncontradicted. Stobie's revised plan of 1805, which I gather from Mr Walker's evidence may be regarded as of considerable authority, is in the defender's favour, while each party claims to derive advantage from the production of a copy of the same author's earlier map of 1783. The Statistical Accounts of 1796 and 1845 (which are not, strictly, evidence at all) differ from one another. The pursuer founds strongly upon two plans—especially on No. 171 of process—produced by the defender under diligence, as showing that no part of Loch Fingask was considered by the defender's authors to be their property. But we know nothing about the plan No. 171, as to its date, its authorship, or the purpose for which it was made. I do not think it is of material weight in the case—(see Lord Neaves' observations in *Place*¹). Upon this point, therefore, I hold, with the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuer has failed to prove that Loch Fingask lies outwith the parish of Blairgowrie. In this view, it is unnecessary to consider or determine whether the defender is entitled to found upon the fact that his earliest title-deed—the Crown charter of 1674—contains no limitation by way of parochial boundary.

¹ 1 R. 1202.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; find that the defender, in virtue of his titles, has a joint right of property along with the pursuer in Loch Fingask, and that the pursuer has failed to prove her alleged exclusive right to the same; and assoilzie the defender from the whole conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question in this action is in regard to Fingask Loch, the size of which is stated to about 23 acres. The estate of Marlee belonging to the pursuer, and the estate of Ardblair belonging to the defender, both abut upon it. The pursuer claims the sole and exclusive right to the loch under her title, and also under her title and the possession which has followed upon it. The defender claims a joint right to the loch along with the pursuer as the only other riparian proprietor.

The earliest title with which the pursuer can connect herself is a Crown charter in 1764, which makes express mention of tres lacus. It is admitted that one of these lochs is identified as being Fingask Loch. The pursuer maintains that she has an express title to the loch. The earliest title which the defender can connect himself with is a Crown charter in 1674 of the lands of Ardblair, with parts and pertinents. An argument was founded on the fact that this charter contains a conveyance of lands called Shadouhalfe, with certain rights in the three lochs. Shadouhalfe, however, drops out of the progress, and no point arises in this case regarding it. The title of the defender is thus a conveyance of land with parts and pertinents earlier in date than the title granted to the pursuer. The lands in question abut on the loch, and I do not think there is room for the argument that it has not been shown they abutted at the date of the grant.

Before considering the law applicable to titles in such a position it is necessary to advert to a specialty in the case. In the defender's progress there is introduced for the first time, in a Crown charter of adjudication in 1721, as part of the description of the lands that they lie within the parish of Blairgowrie. Two questions arise upon this, (1) whether the defender can go back to the charter of 1674 which contains no boundary, and (2) if he cannot, whether the pursuer has succeeded in proving that the whole of Fingask Loch lies outside the boundary of the parish of Blairgowrie. If she has, then under the authority of *Gordon v. Grant*¹ the defender holds under a bounding charter which excludes Fingask Loch. I go straight to the second question, because if it is answered in the negative the first does not arise. But upon the first question I may say in passing that as the defender's charter of 1674 contains a novodamus there seems to me strong ground for saying that he may as competently go back to it as he might to an original charter;—I refer to what Lord Adam said upon this point in the case of Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin.² I do not, however, think it necessary to decide this, because, in my opinion, the pursuer has failed to prove that the parish boundary runs along the eastern margin of Fingask Loch. I think the parish boundary is not distinctly defined as regards the loch. There is a difference

¹ 13 D. 1.

² 16 R. 1104, at p. 1117.

Dec. 17, 1912. between the two copies of Stobie's plan of 1783, which have been referred to. Stobie's revised plan of 1805, as Mr Meacher admits in his evidence, shows that the loch was divided between the parish of Blairgowrie and the parish of Kinloch. No doubt the Ordnance Survey map which was prepared in 1859 does show a dotted line intended to indicate the parish boundary running round the eastern margin of the loch, and the docquet of the meersmen on the plan was founded upon by the pursuer. This, however, would not be evidence sufficient to prove the fact, nor can the statements in the statistical accounts be regarded as evidence in the case. It was argued that the defender's estate plans, which do not indicate Fingask Loch as forming part of the estate of Ardblair were conclusive against him. But the point which the pursuer has to establish is that the dotted line on the Ordnance Survey was truly the parish boundary, and this I do not think the estate plans whether pursuer's or defender's enable him to do. It is not in my opinion proved that the defender is excluded from Fingask Loch by the line of the parish boundary.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The next question is as to the law applicable to the case. As already stated, the pursuer maintained that she has an express title to the loch, and I take the case on that assumption. The defender holds an earlier title to lands abutting on the loch, with parts and pertinents. The law as decided in Scott v. Napier,¹ and Stewart's Trustees v. Robertson ² I take to be this, that in the case of a grant of lands abutting on an inland loch with parts and pertinents there is a presumption that the grantee has a joint right of property in the loch which will not be prejudiced by a subsequent express grant of the loch unless the latter is followed by exclusive possession. The joint right as is pointed out by Lord Selborne in the case of Mackenzie v. Bankes,³ carries with it the share of the solum pertaining to the lands ex adverso and a right in common with the other riparian proprietors over the whole of the water. It was argued that the possession which the holder of the express title requires to have in order to rebut the presumption in favour of the holder of a title to lands abutting with parts and pertinents was something less than the exclusive and adverse possession which is required to establish a right, and it was maintained that the opinion of Lord Watson in the case of the Lord Advocate v. Wemyss ⁴ supported this view. There it was pointed out that what was termed explicative possession might be sufficient. I am unable to take the view that this applies to the present case. That was a dispute between grantor and grantee, which this is not. Further, the quality and extent of the possession necessary in each case largely depends upon the nature of the subject possessed. Whatever application the observations made in the case of Wemyss ⁵ may have to the case of coal, they do not seem to me to apply to a case where both pursuer and defender have had possession of a loch, and the pursuer maintains that her possession is exclusive. The pursuer, therefore, requires to prove exclusive and adverse possession in the ordinary sense.

As regards possession, that of the marl is most important. If the pursuer could have shown that she or her predecessors had worked marl in

¹ 7 Macph. (H. L.) 35.

² 5 R. (H. L.) 192, at p. 202.

³ 1 R. 334.

⁴ 2 F. (H. L.) 1.

that portion of the solum of the loch which is ex adverso of Ardblair, this Dec. 17, 1912. would have been very material in instructing an exclusive right. But there is an entire absence of such evidence. Mr Meacher no doubt proves that there are holes from which marl has been evidently taken in the eastern portion of the solum of the loch, but there is no evidence as to when these were made or who worked them. The evidence in regard to the working of marl is not inconsistent with a joint right on the part of the defender. There are traces of a marl midden on Ardblair, although where the marl came from is not established. There is nothing in the lease between Farquharson of Invercauld, the pursuer's predecessor, and William Anderson in 1797, nor in the lease by the laird of Ardblair to James Baxter of Whiteloch Farm in 1756, as I read them, to exclude the idea that the proprietor of Ardblair could have worked marl in the loch had he wished to do so. The terms of the deed of entail by Farquharson of Invercauld in 1788, and the accounts and receipts for marl worked by Marlee proprietors from 1847 to 1856, do not instruct that the pursuer's predecessors had possession of the whole solum of the loch. The reference to marl in the statistical accounts does not, in my opinion, prove as a fact that Farquharson of Invercauld was the sole proprietor.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

Next, as to the watering of cattle by Ardblair tenants—the evidence of this is complete and seems to me destructive of the pursuer's position unless she is successful in relegating it to the exercise of a servitude right. The pursuer endeavoured to turn the defender's position by tendering a minute of amendment excepting from the conclusions of the summons the servitude of watering cattle or other bestial. If the watering of cattle had been the only competing act of possession on the part of the defender, it might have been possible to deal with it in this way. The pursuer, however, cannot, in my opinion, strike out the evidence upon this head when the whole evidence is being weighed. Acts of possession of this nature do tend to weaken the case for exclusive possession, and must be taken into account along with the other evidence in the case. Not only were the cattle watered, but fences were run down between the defender's fields into the solum of the loch, which, according to the pursuer's contention, was her exclusive property. There were no fences along the margin of Ardblair estate where it abutted on the loch.

The proprietor and tenants of Ardblair exercised the right of boating on the loch over a long period. The Scotts—grandfather, father, and son—tenants of Whiteloch Farm on the Ardblair estate had a connection with the place stretching back for fifty-six years. All had boats on Fingask Loch. Major Chalmers, whose recollection goes back to 1850, speaks of getting a boat on Fingask Loch from the farm of Whiteloch in that year. The evidence of any interruption is quite inconclusive. Daniel Scott speaks of Mr Anderson, who was factor both on Ardblair and Marlee, writing to ask him to take off his boat because he could not thole to see the boys amusing themselves. Scott says he took it off not in consequence of this letter, but because he was afraid the boys would drown themselves. In any case it cannot be said that Mr Anderson was asserting a right on the part of Marlee as against Ardblair. An attempt was made to prove that William Falconer, who was at one time tenant of Whiteloch sawmill, had Dec. 17, 1912. been told to take his boat off Fingask Loch. Falconer denies this, and it is not proved. There is also evidence of other tenants on Ardblair having boats on the loch. In the same way Thomas Menzies, tenant of the farms of Newbigging and Leys on Marlee, gives evidence of his having a boat on Fingask Loch. He says that he never heard of any of the Ardblair people being interfered with at all. It cannot be said that the successive proprietors of Marlee had exclusive possession of the loch as regards boating.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

Still less can it be said that they had exclusive possession as regards fishing. It is sought to discount such evidence as that given by the Blairgowrie Sheriff-officer, who has fished the loch for thirty years, and has been in the habit of applying to Captain Blair-Oliphant for permission to fish and use his boat, by the fact that all and sundry seem to have come from Blairgowrie to fish when they pleased. No doubt the care and attention bestowed on a loch which holds only pike and perch is not such as is given to water which has been netted of these and stocked with trout. The fact, however, remains, and it tells against the exclusive possession of the pursuer, that not only did people fish who had no right, but the Ardblair proprietor, who could claim under his title that he was exercising a right, did so, and so did his tenants.

As regards shooting, the pursuer here relies upon the terms of the lease granted by her to Captain Blair-Oliphant and the plan annexed thereto, and the subleases granted by him. I do not consider it necessary to go into them in detail. The plan annexed to No. 22 shows the whole subject over which the pursuer was letting her sporting rights, whatever those rights might be. There is not, in my opinion, sufficient to establish acquiescence on the part of the defender in the position which the pursuer is now maintaining. The evidence as to taking sand and cutting reeds does not come to much. There is evidence that defender's tenants took sand from the loch. As regards reeds, the pursuer lays no stress on this as they were only cut on her own side.

Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to discharge the onus there is upon her to prove exclusive possession. The possession by the defender and his predecessors is of the nature, quality, and extent which might be expected in the case of one who had a joint right. I am accordingly of opinion that the defender is entitled to a judgment that he has a joint right in the loch.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree entirely with the opinions which have been delivered by Lord Dundas and by Lord Mackenzie. I do not think it necessary to repeat what has been said, or to go into any further detail, in expressing my own views, than is unavoidable in order that I should state the opinion I entertain upon the main points of the case.

I think, in the first place, with your Lordships, that if this question stood upon a competition of titles alone, the defender must certainly prevail; the defender has a title which, according to all the authorities, gives him a joint right in the loch with the other riparian proprietors or proprietor. I do not think it is now disputed that a title to lands surrounding a loch of this kind is a sufficient title to the loch itself, and in like manner when the adjacent lands belong to different proprietors, so that the loch cannot be said to be surrounded by one estate, each has a common joint right with Dec. 17, 1912. the others in the loch, although it is not expressly mentioned in his titles, Meacher v. Blair-Oliphant, unless it can be shown that he is excluded by a prior express title, or by a later title which is in its terms exclusive and which has been followed by prescriptive possession. I understand that to be the law, and it is entirely Lord Kinnear. in accordance with what has been said by your Lordships.

The first question, therefore, as between the competing titles is whether the defender's is not preferable in respect of his prior infestment, and upon that point I think it right to make one observation in passing and with great respect to the Lord Ordinary, because I think his Lordship has fallen into an error which, although in the particular circumstances of this case it may not be of practical importance, is nevertheless so serious in point of law that it is necessary to take notice of it, lest the Court should be supposed to have sanctioned a line of argument which is altogether inconsistent with settled law. The parties are I think agreed—at all events it is quite clear to my mind upon the titles adduced—that the earliest title under which the pursuer holds her lands is a Crown charter of 1764. The earliest title upon which the defender holds his lands is a title of 1674, and, therefore, in the competition between these two titles there is no question at all that the defender's is the prior infestment. But the Lord Ordinary examines a great variety of title-deeds, which he describes as the pursuer's and the defender's titles respectively. He goes back in the case of the pursuer to 1541, and to a description contained in a Crown charter of that date, and then he refers specifically to subsequent titles prior to the title of 1764. But the pursuer is unable to trace her right or to connect herself in any way with any one of these titles. Now, I apprehend that is altogether incompetent. These earlier documents are not the pursuer's titles at all; nor are the earlier titles which the defender adduces the defender's titles. The question is what is the title under which the parties respectively hold their lands? They hold only upon titles with which they can connect themselves,—that is to say, titles which they have a right to found upon as creating their rights. The earlier titles are mere pieces of antiquarian history. It is out of the question to assume that because there was a grant in the sixteenth century, which contained a certain right, therefore the proprietor of lands called by the same general name, who begins with the establishment of his own right in the eighteenth century, is entitled to refer to earlier documents with which he has no connection. This is especially material in a question of prescription. I apprehend that nothing can be better settled than that you cannot go back at all, for any purpose, to inquire what was the condition of the right prior to the date of the charter, or of the series of sasines standing together, which forms the basis of the prescriptive possession. The point is put very clearly and forcibly by Lord Moncreiff in the case of the Duke of Montrose v. Bontine,¹ where he says, at p. 1197, that to go back to previous titles "to explain away, or alter, or qualify the investiture secured by prescription, is contrary to the very principle of the statute, which, as I have always understood it, was intended and was effectual to shut out all such enquiries." I do not refer to the decision as an

¹ (1840) 2 D. 1186.

Dec. 17, 1912. authority, for it is not in point. But I cite Lord Moncreiff's language as expressing the established rule of law better than I can put it in my own words.

Meacher v. Blair-Oliphant. Therefore we start with the titles of the two dates I have mentioned. Lord Kinnear. The defender's title gives him an express right in riparian lands, and that by construction of law, carries with it a joint right along with the other riparian proprietors in the loch. But this is the earlier infestment, and if the pursuer is to exclude him by a later express grant it is necessary for her to show that the express grant has been followed by exclusive possession for the prescriptive time.

But then it is necessary to consider a point with which your Lordships have already dealt, and on which the pursuer maintains that the defender cannot have the benefit of this doctrine, because it is said his estate is bounded by the boundaries of the parish—being described as an estate lying within the parish of Blairgowrie—and that the loch in dispute lies outside the parish. I agree with Lord Mackenzie that, if it were necessary to decide whether that was in law a good objection, having regard to the position of the title in which the limitation by the parish boundary first found its way into a grant to the defender's author, it would require some serious consideration, but I agree with him also that the question is altogether excluded because the fact upon which the plea is founded has not been proved. There is, to my mind, no evidence requiring serious consideration that the parish of Blairgowrie is bounded by the loch, and, indeed, I am not surprised that there should be none, because it is very difficult to understand how any such evidence could ever come into existence.

There are two kinds of evidence of parish boundaries. In many cases there are authentic documents, either before or after the Reformation, establishing by ecclesiastical authority what are the respective limits of adjoining parishes, or else defining such limitations by decrees of the Commission. But in other cases the only possible evidence depends upon immemorial usage. It must be remembered that until very recently the parish was a purely ecclesiastical area. It is only of comparatively recent date that other public interests came to be regulated by parish boundaries, and, therefore, in all the questions in which boundaries of parishes have had to be considered it has been found necessary to see what was the ecclesiastical division prior to the institution of any civil rights which might be regulated by a parish boundary. Now if there are any such authentic documents as I have figured, which might establish the boundaries of parishes, applicable to the case of Blairgowrie we do not know what they are; they are not produced. I think it is extremely probable that there are none, but at all events their existence is not to be assumed. The other kind of evidence is evidence of long-continued parochial uses which must be, from the nature of the case, ecclesiastical uses; because there was no other interest until recently in the division of parishes. Now it does not appear to me at all probable that, in the present case, there should ever have been any evidence of such uses worthy of consideration, for this simple reason that there is no parochial interest in such a piece of water as this loch. One cannot imagine any ground upon which a question between the ministers of two neighbouring parishes could possibly arise with reference to such a subject. It is not teindable. It is not the residence of any Dec. 17, 1912.

 parishioner. There is no reason why persons interested in the limits of the parish parochial area should ever have considered whether the true parish boundary Blair-was an imaginary line drawn through the loch, or the verge of the loch Oliphant.
 itself. The probability, to my mind, is that it was absolutely disregarded Lord Kinneer.
 by both parishes, and that no one ever dreamed of raising such a question.
 It is, of course, good law to say that in Scotland there is no extra-parochial land, and I daresay if this loch had been drained and made available for some agricultural purpose a question might have arisen as to which parish was entitled to have the benefit of it. But that would involve an allocation of recovered land, and would depend upon different considerations, both legal and practical, from any that are before us now.

As to the evidence which has been actually produced I agree with what both your Lordships have said. I think the statistical accounts, besides being of very doubtful effect, are mere hearsay, and must be thrown aside altogether. As to the evidence of plans, I think the two cases of Place v.
*Earl of Breadalbane*¹ and *Gibson v. Bonnington Sugar Refinery*² are conclusive. We do not know enough of the mode in which the plans were drawn, or the reasons for drawing them, to attach any importance to them.
 So far as regards the Ordnance Survey map, which is in a somewhat different position from the other plan, I think the case to which I have referred—*Gibson v. Bonnington Sugar Refinery*²—is quite conclusive. The question there had reference to a piece of ground which was described as running along the Water of Leith. The grant of the piece of ground contained a river boundary, and, accordingly, by a well-known rule of law, gave the proprietor one-half of the alveus of the stream ex adverso of his land; but it was maintained that in this particular instance he could not be the proprietor of any part of the alveus because the lands were described as lying in the parish of St Cuthbert, and the Ordnance Survey map showed that the boundaries of St Cuthbert's and North Leith lay upon his side of the river. That is exactly the question that has to be considered now.
 The Court held that the Ordnance Survey map must be disregarded altogether. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Mure) treats it as of no weight in itself irrespective of other evidence, and he found no such evidence. Lord Neaves, at p. 400, put it more strongly, no doubt with the concurrence of the other Judges: "I am glad," he says, "that no doubt has been expressed by any of your Lordships with regard to the question of the parish boundaries, for I think it would be highly dangerous if we held that a man could be deprived of his property on such evidence as an Ordnance Survey map." That is a perfectly reasonable view, because we know nothing of the evidence upon which the engineer officer laid down the parish boundaries. His object was not to decide legal questions of boundaries either between parishes or between estates, but to lay down a correct plan of the country: and the value of his note of the boundaries depends entirely upon the evidence upon which he laid them down. It is said that in the present case we are entitled to hold that he proceeded upon the statements of meersmen. I do not think that makes the matter any

¹ 1 R. 202.² (1869) 7 Macph. 394.

Dec. 17, 1912, better. It shows that the evidence of the map as to parish boundaries rests upon nothing but hearsay and inference, and we know nothing of the grounds upon which the meersmen went, if indeed they made any statement about the matter. I think, for the same reasons which were held sufficient in the Bonnington Sugar Refining Company case,¹ we should disregard this evidence altogether.

Meacher v.
Blair-
Oliphant.

Lord Kinnear.

Therefore, in my view, we may take the title upon the ordinary construction which would be applied to its words as if there were no such limitation as the parish boundaries of Blairgowrie. In that view I think it is a perfectly good title to convey a joint right in the loch just as effectually as if that were expressed in words.

If that be so, then the only question is whether the pursuer has proved exclusive possession of the whole loch. There was some question raised in the case as to whether it was necessary that there should be proof of exclusive possession. I confess I do not see how that question can be raised with due regard to the conclusion in the pursuer's summons. What she seeks to have declared is that she has "the sole and exclusive right to Fingask Loch, including the solum thereof." That is the right she has got to prove. How she can prove that right without showing that she has had the sole and exclusive possession—if it depends on possession at all—for the prescriptive period I am unable to understand. It is necessary then that the pursuer's enjoyment of the right should be shown to be exclusive of any use and enjoyment by the defender or by anybody else. For this reason you have to consider the nature of the right which she possesses. It is very clearly stated in Lord Selborne's opinion in the case of Mackenzie v. Bankes.² I think it is of great importance to keep in view what the nature of the right really is. His Lordship, at p. 202, says this: "Under titles such as those by which both the competitors in the present case hold (and when nothing turns upon any evidence of exclusive possession) the entire lake if surrounded by the land of a single proprietor, belongs to that proprietor as a 'pertinent' of his land. If there are more riparian proprietors than one it belongs 'rateably' to them all." Then he comes to the point to which I am referring: "So far as relates to the solum or fundus of the lake it is considered to belong in severalty to the several riparian proprietors if more than one. . . . But for reasons which may be pronounced to be founded in part, if not wholly, on the irregularity of configuration, frequent in lakes, this ex adverso rule is not extended by the law of Scotland to these rights (such as boating, fishing, and fowling), which are exercised in or upon the surface of lake waters. These are to be enjoyed over the whole water's face by all the riparian proprietors in common, subject (if need be) to judicial regulation."

Now, that being the nature of the right, it appears to me that the pursuer proves nothing of the character of exclusive right by proving merely that she and her predecessors had exercised upon the surface of the waters those rights which are common to all the proprietors. The question is not whether she has a right to use the surface of the water of this loch for boating, fishing, and fowling—nobody disputes that—but the question is whether she has a right to the whole loch or the whole solum. There—Dec. 17, 1912.

¹ 7 Macph. 394.

² 5 R. 278; (H. L.) 192.

fore she has not advanced a single step in her case by merely showing ^{Meacher v.} that she has enjoyed those rights in the loch which belong to all Blair-riparian proprietors. She cannot establish her right, therefore, without ^{Oliphant.}
showing one of two things, either that she has effectively excluded the Lord Kinnear.
defender and his authors from the common uses and enjoyments of the surface of the water, and this on the ground that they belonged exclusively to herself, or that she has encroached upon what would otherwise have been the defender's separate property in the solum. If she had so encroached it would be a very strong piece of evidence to show that her right extends beyond her natural share of the loch. If she has not done that she can only show that she has exercised an exclusive right in the whole loch and not a joint right with others in the surface of the loch, by proving that she has not only used the surface herself but has excluded everybody else. It is for her to prove exclusion; her own use which excludes nobody proves nothing.

Therefore I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary. The Lord Ordinary says she has proved that she used the loch, that nobody else has used the loch, and that, therefore, she is exclusive proprietor. That appears to me to be altogether unsound. There is not a scintilla of evidence tending to establish exclusive right, because she did nothing which could not be supported by the common right which was admittedly vested in her and her neighbours. In all cases of prescription exclusive possession has only been held to exist where the person alleging a prescriptive right has done something which the person against whom prescription is supposed to be running could have prevented if it were an infringement of his rights.
That is the test. The pursuer must say:—"I, in the exercise of my sole right, encroached upon what you allege to be your joint right, and you did not prevent me." I ask how could the defender in this case and his predecessors have interfered to prevent the pursuer from doing any single one of the things she alleges that she did? He was bound to submit to them, not because she had a sole and exclusive right to the loch, but because she had a joint right along with him, which would have been in itself sufficient to maintain her possession. The only point in this view of the case is that which is made by the pursuer where she claims to have worked marl on the defender's side of the loch. If that were proved I should, with your Lordships, have thought that to be a very material consideration. I do not say that it would be conclusive. One cannot lay down any general rule with reference to a hypothetical fact, which, if it were proved, must be taken into account along with the whole other facts of the case. But I think it is not proved. All that is proved is that there is a hole on the defender's side of the loch, which might have been caused by people working marl; but whether it was the defender or whether it was the pursuer who made it there is no evidence. Therefore I think that point completely fails.

Then the question comes to be whether the pursuer has shown that she has prevented the defender from making any such use of the loch as he would be entitled to make if he had the ordinary right of a riparian proprietor. If she had, that again would have been a very strong point in favour of her claim to an exclusive right. There again I think she has

Dec. 17, 1912. completely failed. The defender and his predecessors have exercised exactly the same kind of right, although, no doubt, to a very inconsiderable extent; that is to say they have used the surface of the loch by their tenants for boating, fishing, and fowling. They have also made an exceptional use of the loch, which involves a direct encroachment upon the right of the pursuer to the entire solum, if she has such a right. They have for more than the prescriptive period watered their cattle, and, for the purpose of enabling them to water their cattle, have driven piles into the solum. Now, if they had no right in the loch, it was for the pursuer and her predecessors to interfere to prevent that encroachment if they were to maintain afterwards that they themselves had an exclusive right. It is said that use for watering cattle is to be referred to a right of servitude. I apprehend that is an altogether untenable position. There is nothing in the process to show any right of servitude. The only known right to which the defender's use and possession of the loch can be referred is the undoubted right of property which the defender holds by virtue of his titles. He has a perfectly good property title—and I think that is not disputed—which would support this use of the loch, in like manner as it would support his use of the loch in other ways. Why is his use of it not to be referred to that undoubted title rather than to an entirely imaginary or, to say the least, a purely hypothetical right of servitude? There is evidence of property: there is no evidence of servitude right apart from property. The vital importance of the point becomes evident when it is considered for what purpose this practice of watering cattle is employed by the defender. He does not require to show a use of the loch; he has a perfectly good title without possession at all. The value of his use of the loch is that he can show that he was not interfered with by the pursuer. That is the point to be explained. If the pursuer could have shown that she did not object to the defender's practice of watering cattle because he had established or alleged a servitude right there might have been something in the point; but otherwise, it appears to me untenable. Now there is nothing to suggest that the practice was ever challenged or that the defender ever maintained it on the ground of a servitude over the property which he admitted to be the pursuer's. If the right were allowed only because it was a servitude, the pursuer would, I think, be required to show that she and her predecessors knew of the servitude, and did not interfere because there was a servitude known to exist and upon no other ground. The whole theory of the pursuer is that she was excluding the defender; and, therefore, it lies upon her to establish that the encroachment upon her alleged exclusive possession can be accounted for by showing that she allowed it upon a ground in law consistent with the existence of her exclusive right. It appears to me, therefore, upon the whole case, without going into a further examination of the actual facts which have already been explained, that there is no evidence of such possession as would establish a prescriptive right.

The pursuer's counsel founded upon a passage in Lord Watson's opinion in the case of Lord Advocate v. Wemyss,¹ for the purpose of showing that she might succeed upon some more slender evidence of possession than is Dec. 17, 1912. ordinarily necessary to establish an adverse right. But Lord Watson ^{Meacher v.} makes it perfectly plain that this is exactly the kind of case to which his Blair-Oliphant. observation does not apply. What his Lordship says is that, in the case of a grant of a particular kind of right, the grantee's right as against the Lord Kinnear. grantor may be explained by a possession falling short of that which would be necessary to establish a prescriptive right against an adverse claim. The particular right which he was considering was a right of foreshore; and for a fuller exposition of what his Lordship means he refers to Lord Blackburn's judgment in the case of Lord Advocates and Clyde Trustees v. Lord Blantyre.¹ In that case what was found was that, if the holder of a property under a barony title had had such uses as the nature of the subject permitted in parts of the foreshore where his land adjoined the river, he might be held to have established as against the Crown a right to the entire foreshore. The only question was whether partial possession would do, and whether possession of such limited nature as possession of the foreshore must necessarily be would be effectual. I think all that Lord Watson means is that such partial possession is good as against the grantor, but his own statement clearly shows that he did not mean to say that it was of any avail for the purpose of establishing an adverse right against a stranger to the grant founding upon a competing title.

¹ 2 F. (H. L.) 1, at pp. 9 and 10.

On the whole matter, therefore, I agree with your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be recalled and the defender assolizied.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and found that the defender in virtue of his titles had a joint right of property along with the pursuer to the Fingask Loch, and that the pursuer had failed to prove the sole and exclusive right thereto, and assolizied the defender from the conclusions of the summons.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—LINDSAY, HOWE, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

IAN THEODORE NELSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—Blackburn, K.C.— No. 60.
Black.

WILLIAM CHALMERS & COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).— Dec. 17, 1912.
Sandeman, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Sale—Disconformity to contract—Rejection—Transference of property—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), secs. 11 (2), 17, and 18, Rule 5 (1)—Contract for building yacht—Passing of property on payment of first instalment—Right to reject completed yacht as disconform to contract. ^{Nelson v. William Chalmers & Co., Limited.}

A firm of shipbuilders contracted to build a yacht to the satisfaction of the designer (who was to superintend the work), the builders undertaking to put right within the time stipulated for the vessel's completion anything considered by him to be unsatisfactory. A clause in the contract provided that "the right of property in the yacht will pass from the contractors to the owner on payment of the first instalment of the price."

The first instalment was paid; but repeatedly, during the progress of

¹ (1879) 6 R. (H. L.) 72, at p. 85.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

construction, complaints were made of defects in the workmanship. These the builders undertook to put right, but they failed to do so; and, when the yacht was completed, it was, on account of these defects, disconform to contract. The purchaser thereupon rejected the yacht and brought an action against the builders for repayment of the instalment paid and for damages. The builders maintained that as, by the terms of the contract and the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, the property had passed on payment of the first instalment the purchaser was barred from rejecting the yacht.

Held, in the circumstances, that the purchaser had never accepted the yacht or any part of it as conform to contract, and, accordingly, was not barred from rejecting it.

Observed that the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act with regard to the passing of property in goods sold did not destroy in any way the existing right under Scots law of rejection for disconformity to contract, which was preserved unimpaired by sec. 11 (2).

Observed further that property might pass consistently with the existence of a right of rejection before final acceptance.

EXTRA DIVISION.
Lord Dewar.

ON 25th April 1911 A. Mylne, naval architect, Glasgow, acting on behalf of Ian Theodore Nelson of Glenetive, entered into a contract with William Chalmers & Company, Limited, shipbuilders and engineers, Rutherglen, for the construction of a 42 feet screw motor yacht.

The material portions of the contract were as follows:—

"1. The contractors on the one hand agree to have built and equipped a motor yacht to the approximate dimensions given. The yacht to be built in first-class style to plans and specifications got out by the designer [Mr Mylne], a copy of the specification being appended and signed as relative hereto, and while in course of construction to be superintended by the said designer or his inspectors. The contractors agree to put right within the time stipulated for the construction of the yacht, any part of the work considered unsuitable either in material or workmanship by the said designer. . . .

"4. The contractors bind and oblige themselves to have the yacht completed in accordance with the specification, and to the satisfaction of the said designer, not later than twelve weeks from receipt of first building plans (unless prevented by strikes or other causes outside the control of the contractors, in which case they shall be allowed such extra time as may be considered reasonable). . . .

"5. The price to be paid by the designers to the contractors (exclusive of extras) shall be £525 (Five hundred and twenty-five pounds stg.), payable in instalments, as provided in the specification.

"6. The right of property in the yacht will pass from the contractors to the owner on payment of the first instalment of the price, subject to the contractors' lien for the balance of the price, and extras. . . .

"SPECIFICATION

"General.—To be built as per accompanying plan, scantlings as herein specified.

"Material.—All material used in the construction to be of the very best quality. Inferior quality of material will be cut out no matter at what stage the work is.

"Workmanship.—Workmanship to be of the highest class. Hull, sheer, &c., to be perfectly fair, all to designer's or owner's satisfaction, and all details not particularly specified, to be at least equal in quality to any other first-class yacht. . . .

"Payments.—Will be made in four instalments: One-fourth when in frame, one-fourth when plated, one-fourth when decks laid and caulked, and one-fourth when vessel is handed over complete according to plans and specification. . . .

Dec. 17, 1912.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

"Finally.—Notwithstanding any omissions in this specification and accompanying sketch plans, it is to be clearly understood the vessel is to be finished and ready for sea, with everything complete and as fitted in first-class motor yachts, and all to owner's satisfaction."

On 24th August 1911 Nelson rejected the yacht tendered by the builders as being disconform to contract, and on 7th November 1911 he brought an action against them for (1) payment of a sum of £131, 5s., being the amount of the first instalment of the price which he had paid on 27th June 1911; (2) delivery of an engine and other articles supplied by him for the yacht, or alternatively payment of a sum of £525, 6s. 9d. representing their value; (3) payment of a sum of £150 of damages.

The pursuer (besides averring that the defenders were in breach of their contract in respect that the yacht was not completed timeously) averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 6) "Further, the defenders were in breach of their contract in respect that the workmanship of the yacht was not in accordance with the terms of the contract and specification. In particular, the whole shell plating of the yacht was of very inferior workmanship, and was not fair. On the contrary, it was uneven, and was faired up with cement in a manner and to an extent which was quite inconsistent with good workmanship. It is believed and averred that the said plating would not have been watertight. These defects were repeatedly pointed out to the defenders by Mr Mylne, and by his assistant, Mr James. The defenders from time to time promised to have the said defects remedied, and induced Mr Mylne and Mr James to give them time to do so. Had it not been for the defenders' promises aforesaid, the pursuer's representatives would not have allowed the defenders to proceed with the work. They, however, failed to implement their said promises, with the result that on 24th August 1911, being satisfied after inspection of the yacht that the defenders had not fulfilled the promises which they had made, and that the said promises were then impossible of fulfilment, the pursuer was compelled to reject the yacht as disconform to contract. The pursuer at the same time informed the defenders that they were not to put the engine, &c., into the yacht. The said yacht was not built in first-class style; the workmanship was not of the highest class; nor was the yacht completed to the satisfaction of the designer or the owner, both of whom, on the contrary, were and are highly dissatisfied with the boat."

The defenders' case on record was, with regard to the alleged delay, that such delay as there had been was due to Mr Mylne's failure to furnish plans, and also to the dilatoriness of the makers of the engine, and a strike in their own yard; with regard to the alleged disconformity of the yacht to contract, that she was in fact conform to contract, but that, at any rate, no complaints had been made either by the pursuer or his designer during the progress of the work at a time when under the contract these complaints should have been made, and when the alleged defects could still have been remedied in terms of the contract. What, however, ultimately proved to be the main contention of the defenders did not appear on their record, and was only made at the hearing upon evidence. It was to the effect

Dec. 17, 1912.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

that the pursuer was barred from rejecting the yacht at any time after payment of the first instalment of the price, because she then became irrevocably his property, and no man could reject that which had become his own.

A proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence will be found set forth in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, infra.

On 1st April 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defenders (1) to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £131, 5s. sterling, with interest thereon as concluded for; (2) to deliver to the pursuer within the next thirty days the following articles, viz.:— . . . and failing their doing so decree will be pronounced for the value of the foresaid articles; and (3) to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £75 sterling in full of the conclusion of the summons for damages."*

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the parties' averments and the terms of the contract]—Parties appear to have had two questions prominently before them, viz.:—(1) What was to be the quality of the work? and (2) within what period was the yacht to be delivered? And they came to a definite agreement on both points. I think the true meaning of the contract is shortly this:—The defenders agreed to build the yacht in first-class style with workmanship of the highest class, and to deliver it within twelve weeks; and they further agreed that the question whether the workmanship was satisfactory or not should be finally decided by the pursuer or the designer. And I think it follows that if the vessel was not delivered within the stipulated time, or if the pursuer or the designer were dissatisfied with the workmanship, the conditions of the contract have not been fulfilled; unless it can be shown that the delay in delivery was due to causes outside the control of the defenders, and that the decision as to the quality of the workmanship is corrupt.

"The portion of the workmanship to which the pursuer takes exception is the shell plating. The plates it appears in a yacht of this kind are very thin, and it is difficult and delicate work to rivet them in such a manner as to prevent bulging and irregularities. Parties evidently had this in view when they entered into the contract, for it is specially referred to in the specification—'Hull, sheer, &c., to be perfectly fair, all to designer's or owner's satisfaction.' The difficulty in getting this perfect fairness began to appear at an early stage of the construction. When some of the plates had been riveted, Mr Mylne on the 28th of June pointed out to the defenders that they were not fair, and he was informed by Mr Douglas Eadie that the irregularities would be faired out before the work was completed. Sometime afterwards Mr Mylne had occasion to leave Glasgow, and did not return until the middle of August. In his absence Mr James—his principal assistant—superintended the work, and he also complained on several occasions of the unfairness of the plates, and he got the same answer as Mr Mylne. And Mr Nelson, who occasionally visited the yard during the construction, also mentioned the unfairness, and was told that it would be put all right.

"When Mr Mylne returned to Glasgow in the middle of August he was informed by Mr James that the work was not in a satisfactory condition, so he telegraphed to the pursuer, and on the 16th of August they went to inspect the yacht. Mr Mylne states that he found the plating on the whole hull was so unfair that he was exceedingly doubtful whether the plating was watertight, and he at once advised the pursuer not to take delivery of the vessel. He states: 'I communicated to Mr Douglas Eadie my view as to the unfairness of the plating. I said it was a shocking job. He said he did not think it was so bad. I walked round with Mr Eadie and the pursuer, and said pretty well what I thought about it—that it was really

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Extra Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Dundas, and Lord Mackenzie) on 6th, 7th, and 8th November 1912.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The pursuer was not entitled to reject the yacht. If he had a grievance, he had mistaken his remedy, the only remedy open to him being an action of damages for a sum representing the difference in value between the yacht which he had ordered and the yacht which had been delivered to him. Doubtless under the law prior to the passing of the Sale of Goods Act, the pursuer could have rejected the yacht, seeing that under that law the right of property could not pass until delivery, and the yacht had not been delivered. But by sections 17 and 18 of the Sale so very bad that we could not think of taking delivery of the boat.' Mr Nelson does not pretend to have expert knowledge, but he agrees that the plates were unfair; he states: 'I was very much disappointed with it; it was exceedingly bad. I don't think it was so good as it had been on the former occasion when I complained about it. In my view Mr Eadie had not implemented the promise he had made that it would be put all right.' Now the defenders specially agreed that this particular piece of work must satisfy the owner or designer, and both are very much dissatisfied. That appears to me to be conclusive. It is not suggested that they are actuated by any corrupt motive; it is admitted that both are honestly of opinion that the work is unsatisfactory, and it is further admitted that Mr Mylne is an experienced and competent naval architect. The defenders' case is that the designer's and pursuer's opinions are not well founded. I do not think that is a good defence in view of the terms of the contract, but in any case I am satisfied on the evidence that the plating was not in a satisfactory condition, and that the pursuer was justified in refusing to take delivery. [His Lordship then examined the expert evidence as to the condition of the plating.]

"But the defenders maintain that, even if the plating were not conform to contract on the 24th of August, the pursuer was not entitled to reject the yacht, because it was the duty of the designer to superintend the construction and point out defects as the work proceeded, and if the plating was not to Mr Mylne's satisfaction he ought to have insisted on its removal at an earlier stage. But, as I have said, I think it is proved that the defects were pointed out, and the defenders gave the assurance that they would be put right. I am aware that Mr Douglas Eadie denies this, but I was not favourably impressed with the manner in which he gave his evidence, and I regret that I cannot put any reliance upon what he says. If the vessel was disconform to contract on 24th August, and I am of opinion that it was, I do not think that the pursuer was bound to give the defenders further opportunity of putting it right; indeed, they never asked him to do so. They knew that it was required for the shooting season, and that time was an essential element in the contract. They admit that they received the contract because they agreed to deliver within twelve weeks. It is true that pursuer was prepared to accept delivery on 24th August if the workmanship had been satisfactory; but he was not bound to wait indefinitely. He had, I think, been very reasonable throughout—he gave them every opportunity, and they failed to give satisfaction, and I formed the impression that the real cause of their failure was that they had not sufficient experience for delicate work of this kind.

"The defenders further founded on clause 6 of the contract, which provides that 'the right of property in the yacht will pass from the contractors to the owner on payment of the first instalment of the price,' and argued that, as the first instalment had been paid, the yacht was now the property of the pursuer, and he was not entitled to refuse delivery and sue for repay-

Dec. 17, 1912. of Goods Act, 1893,* the right of property could pass at any time intended by the parties to the contract, and after that time the purchaser could not reject. The case accordingly turned upon the 6th section of the contract. Under that section the right of property in the yacht passed to the owner after he had paid the first instal-

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

ment of the instalment. This appears to me to be an argument on relevancy, and if the defenders intended to insist on it, they ought to have taken it at an earlier stage. They gave no indication of it until the proof was closed and pursuer's counsel had been heard on the evidence. But in the view I take, of the contract the argument is unsound. The contract is for a completed yacht to be built in terms of a specification to the satisfaction of the pursuer. Clause 6 is intended merely as a security. Under such a contract I do not think that the pursuer is bound to accept delivery unless the vessel is completed conform to the contract. The defenders contracted to make and deliver a specified article within a definite time. They have not done so, and I see no reason why the pursuer should not be entitled to demand repayment of the instalment of the price he paid in advance for an article he has not received.

"If I am right in thinking that the workmanship was not conform to contract, I do not think that it is necessary to examine in detail the question as to the cause of the delay; but I think the defenders have failed on this part of the case also. On record (answer 5) they aver that the delay in delivery was due to three causes—(1) Mr Mylne's failure to furnish the plans; (2) the dilatoriness of the engineers; and (3) a strike of ironworkers in defenders' yard—[His Lordship examined the evidence on the question of delay]. I am satisfied on the evidence that they have failed to prove that it was due to any of the causes which they allege on record.

"On the question of damages the defenders did not, I think, dispute that if there was a breach of contract some damages were due. I have carefully considered the evidence, and I think the pursuer's loss may be fairly estimated at £75. On the whole matter I am of opinion that the defenders are in breach of their contract, and that the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first and second conclusions, and to decree for £75 in terms of the third conclusion of the summons, with expenses."

* The Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), enacts:—

Sec. 11. "(2) In Scotland failure by the seller to perform any material part of a contract of sale is a breach of contract which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages."

Sec. 17. "(1) Where there is a contract for the sale of specific or ascertained goods the property in them is transferred to the buyer at such time as the parties to the contract intend it to be transferred. (2) For the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties regard shall be had to the terms of the contract, the conduct of the parties, and the circumstances of the case."

Sec. 18. "Unless a different intention appears, the following are rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties as to the time at which the property in the goods is to pass to the buyer."

Rule 5. "(1) Where there is a contract for the sale of ascertained or future goods by description, and goods of that description and in a deliverable state are unconditionally appropriated to the contract, either by the seller with the assent of the buyer, or by the buyer with the assent of the seller, the property in the goods thereupon passes to the buyer. Such assent may be express or implied, and may be given either before or after the appropriation is made."

ment, and the yacht being thereafter his own, he could not reject his own property. Even, however, if payment of the first instalment did not involve the passing of property in the yacht as a whole it at any rate involved the passing of property in, and the acceptance of, that portion of the yacht which had been completed at its date, and work done on the yacht thereafter was work done on the owner's own property and became accessory to the principal.¹ His only remedy was to examine from time to time the new portions of the work as they were added to the old and reject them timeously, for the doing of which ample opportunity was given him by the contract, which allowed him the amplest powers of inspection. The object of section 6 of the contract was to protect the purchaser against the creditors of the builders, and he must be prepared to take the incommodum along with the commodum of his contract. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856,² had given security to the buyer against the seller's creditors without passing the property. The Sale of Goods Act, 1893,³ effected the same result by making it possible to pass the property without delivery of the goods. The flaw in the pursuer's argument was that he failed to recognise that the payment of the instalment was equivalent to acceptance of the yacht, at any rate so far as then in existence, and there was no case extant in which it had been held that a person was entitled afterwards to reject goods which he had already accepted. The cases cited for the pursuer were all distinguishable. In *Spencer & Company*⁴ the question was not as to the right of rejection, but as to whether the purchaser could keep the ship and claim damages. In Aird & Coghill,⁵ and in Vigers Brothers,⁶ there had been no acceptance of the goods. The proof clearly showed that the pursuer had deliberately allowed the defenders to proceed from stage to stage in the building operations, and therefore he was now barred from coming forward and saying he rejected the whole work ab initio. Accordingly the pursuer could not reject the vessel, and there were no materials in the present action for dealing with a claim of damages. As regarded machinery supplied by the pursuer, the bulk of it had been incorporated in the yacht, and the defenders had a right of lien over the yacht for the unpaid price; in so far as it had not been built into the yacht they were entitled to exercise a right of retention.⁷

Argued for the respondent;—The judgment of the Lord Ordinary was right and should be sustained. The contract was a perfectly simple one. It was a contract for a complete yacht, not for a part or portion of a yacht. The yacht was to be built to a certain specification, and to the satisfaction of the designer, and within a certain time. The completed yacht was not according to specification, did not satisfy the designer, and had not been completed in time. It was accord-

¹ M'Bain v. Wallace & Co., (1881) 8 R. 360; Seath & Co. v. Moore, (1886) 13 R. (H. L.) 57; Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, v. Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, 1908 S. C. 82, (H. L.) 1; Bell's Com. (7th ed.) vol. i. 189.

² 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60.

³ 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71, secs. 17, 18.

⁴ (1879) 7 R. 396.

⁵ (1904) 7 F. 258.

⁶ [1901] 1 K. B. 608.

⁷ Moore's Carving Machine Co. v. Austin, (1896) 33 S. L. R. 613; Maikle v. Wilson & Pollard, (1880) 8 R. 69; Glendinning v. Hope & Co., 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 73, Lord Kinnear, at p. 78. Bell's Com. (7th ed.) vol. i., pp. 176, 181, and 275, was also referred to.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

ingly disconform to contract, and the purchaser was entitled, under the ordinary rules of the law of sale, to reject the yacht within a reasonable time.¹ The proof showed that the pursuer had in no way been to blame for the delay which had occurred, and also that he had timeously pointed out the defects for which he ultimately rejected the yacht, and that he had given the defenders ample opportunity of rectifying them as provided for by the contract. It was said, however, that he was deprived of the statutory right of rejection by clause 6 of the contract and by the new law as to the passing of property introduced by the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It was argued that, the right of property having passed, the pursuer could no longer reject that which was his own, the idea of rejection being, it was said, only compatible with the property still remaining in the other party. That argument, however, was fallacious. There was nothing incongruous in the idea of property passing to the purchaser and thereafter repassing to the seller on rejection for nonconformity to contract. The purchaser might well be the owner, although his right of property was defeasible at his own option. The possibility of the rejection of an article, although the property in it had already passed, had been recognised in a number of cases.² Here, however, no property had passed, because, under the contract, property could only pass in a yacht conform to contract, and until her completion such portions of her as were built were "unascertained" goods in which, under section 16 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, no property passed. Even, however, if property had passed, there had been no final acceptance of the yacht, or any portion of her, as conform to contract, and until final acceptance had taken place, rejection was always open. The defenders were confusing two different kinds of contract, the contract of sale and the contract of locatio operis.³ This was an ordinary contract of sale for a completed yacht to be accepted or rejected on completion in the ordinary way, with a subordinate clause adjoined, temporarily regulating the ownership of the vessel in questions with third parties during the operation of the building.⁴

At advising on 17th December 1912,—

LORD KINNEAR.—I have some difficulty in construing the contract in this case, in which we have to consider the scope and operation of an unfamiliar legal conception, introduced into our system for the first time by the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Nevertheless, I think the vital question between the parties is one of fact; and upon the facts, I not only agree with the Lord Ordinary, but, I may add, that inasmuch as the controversy turns upon a balance of conflicting testimony, I should be prepared to accept as final the decision of the Judge who saw the witnesses and heard their evidence.

The question is whether the pursuer is entitled to reject a motor yacht built for him by the defenders as disconform to contract; and to recover damages. The contract was made between A. Mylne, Glasgow, the designer

¹ Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), secs. 11 (2), 53 (5).

² Spencer & Co. v. Dobie & Co., 7 R. 396; Aird & Coghill v. Pullan & Adams, 7 F. 258; Vigers Brothers v. Sanderson Brothers, [1901] 1 K. B. 608.

³ Bell's Com. (7th ed.) i. 485.

⁴ Orr's Trustees v. Tullis, (1870) 8 Macph. 936, was also referred to.

of the yacht, acting on behalf of the owner, and Chalmers & Company, Dec. 17, 1912. the defenders; and the material terms are that the defenders engage to build and equip for the pursuer a motor yacht of given dimensions, to be built in first-class style to plans and specifications got out by the designer, and while in course of construction to be superintended by the designer or his inspectors; that the contractors agree to put right within the time stipulated for the construction any part of the work considered unsuitable either in material or workmanship by the designer; that the price is to be paid by instalments; and that the right of property is to pass from the contractors to the owner on payment of the first instalment. It is further stipulated in the specification which is embodied in the contract that the workmanship is to be of the highest class. Hull, sheer, &c., to be perfectly fair, all to designer's or owner's satisfaction, and all details not particularly specified to be at least equal in quality to any other first-class yacht. The first instalment of the price was paid on the 27th of June when the boat was in frame, and the defenders say she was finished on the 16th of August 1911. On the last-mentioned day she was inspected by the pursuer and Mr Mylne, a naval architect who had designed the yacht and who is referred to in the contract as the designer. Mr Mylne advised the pursuer not to take delivery. The yacht was inspected again by Mr Mylne and a second naval architect on the 24th August and was then definitely rejected on the ground that the plating of the whole hull was defective. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that their objection was well founded in fact. It was stipulated that the workmanship should be of the highest class, "to the designer's or owner's satisfaction." They were both dissatisfied; and there is no good ground for suggesting that their dissatisfaction was capricious or unreasonable. If we accept the evidence for the pursuer as the Lord Ordinary does—and I see no reason to differ from him—the workmanship was so bad that no naval architect could have passed it. The boat as tendered was not the yacht for which the pursuer had bargained, and was indeed unfit for the purpose for which he had ordered it.

In these circumstances I do not think it doubtful that according to the former law the pursuer would have been entitled to reject the vessel, rescind the contract, and claim damages. But it is said that this right of rejection rested upon the rule that no right of property could pass without delivery, actual or constructive, and that a buyer can have no such remedy in a case where under the new law, the property is transferred by the contract itself. This was argued, in the first place, on the ground—although I do not think this first point was very confidently maintained—that for a purchaser to reject what has actually become his own is a legal impossibility, or contradiction in terms. I cannot say that the Lord Ordinary's answer seems to me satisfactory when he says that the clause as to the transference of the property was intended merely as a security. How far a right in security may be effectually created under colour of a sale it is unnecessary in this case to inquire. I do not think it doubtful that the transaction in question was a true sale intended to pass to the purchaser the absolute ownership of the yacht. But the alteration of the law as to the transference of property seems to me to make no difference in the buyer's right to reject goods that are not conform to contract. He is not bound to accept something different

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.
Lord Kinnear.

Dec. 17, 1912. from what he bargained for. The property of the yacht to be built in terms of the contract passes by force of the contract. But if the vessel tendered is not the yacht for which the pursuer bargained it is not the yacht of which the property is transferred. On that hypothesis there was no purchase or sale of the vessel tendered, and no property passed. The case is exactly in the same position as if under the former law the vessel had been delivered and then rejected without undue delay. The property would have been effectually transferred if she were conform to contract but not otherwise. Accordingly, the cases are numerous in which goods delivered in the alleged performance of a contract of purchase and sale have been rejected after delivery ; and the question considered in such cases has not been whether rejection is barred by delivery, but whether the goods have been accepted either expressly or by the failure of the purchaser to intimate his dissatisfaction in due time—and the right to reject in such circumstances is expressly confirmed by section 11, subsection 2, of the Act, and is further supported by the provisions of section 35.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

Lord Kinneer.

The law of Scotland, as the learned annotator of the Sale of Goods Act justly remarks, does not accept the English distinction between conditions and warranties, which forms the subject of the first part of the 11th section ; and accordingly the right of rejection has been much larger in Scotland than in England. It thus became necessary in passing the Act either to abrogate or maintain this distinction between the two laws ; and to this end, the statutory rules as to warranties are confined to England, and the Scottish right of rejection as it was before the Act is expressly preserved by the Act. I am therefore unable to doubt that unless the pursuer can be shown to have accepted the yacht as tendered, or to be barred from now insisting in his right to object, he is exactly in the position contemplated by the 11th section, and by reason of the seller's failure to perform a material part of the contract, he is entitled to reject the boat and to repudiate the contract.

But assuming that rejection may not be in general irreconcilable with a previous transference of the right of property by contract, the defenders' counsel presented a much more formidable argument on the particular terms of the contract in question. They maintained that the effect of the 6th clause is to pass the property in the frame at the time of payment of the first instalment of the price, and that the actual payment of that instalment imports acceptance of the work so far as then completed. Therefore the contract was completely executed so far as regards that part of the boat by transference of the property and payment of the price ; and it follows that all subsequent work was work done on a boat which was really the property of the purchaser and not of the shipbuilder, and so became part of that property by accession. I have some difficulty in taking that view of the contract, because what the pursuer bargained for was a complete yacht and not a part only ; and the property which the contract purports to pass is of the whole and not of successive parts. But the argument was very forcibly urged on the authority of Lord Watson's judgment in Seath & Company v. Moore.¹ The learned lord says that when it is the agreement of the parties to a contract for the construction of a ship that at a particular stage of its construction the vessel, so far as then finished, shall be appropriated to the contract of Dec. 17, 1912. sale, the property of the vessel, as soon as it has reached that stage of completion, will pass to the purchaser, and subsequent additions made to the chattel thus vested in the purchaser will, accessione, become his property. He adds that an agreement to this effect is to be inferred from a provision that an instalment of the price shall be paid at a particular stage coupled with the fact that the instalment has been duly paid, and that until the vessel reached that stage the execution of the work was regularly inspected by the purchaser. This makes it evident that an agreement to the effect described is perfectly possible in law, but it leaves the question in each case to depend on the true construction of the particular contract. I am not satisfied that the pursuer agreed to accept work already executed except as part of the completed subject which was to be delivered to him when the work was finished, and I do not see that he is prohibited from saying, when the completed ship is tendered to him, that as a whole it is disconform to contract, unless it can be said that he has already accepted it in each and all of its successive stages of completion. But the point which seems to me to create the most real difficulty is not so much dependent upon the particular moment at which the property passes as upon the special stipulations for inspection on behalf of the purchaser. If the yacht had been already accepted, the pursuer had lost his remedy at the time when he intimated his final rejection. It is said with undeniable force that the whole contract must be taken together. The stipulations as to the transfer of the property on the one hand and as to the inspection of the work on the other are interdependent. It is just because the property passes by the contract that it is of importance for the purchaser to stipulate that while in course of construction the vessel shall be superintended by the designer or his inspectors, and further that the contractors agree to put right any part of the work which the designer considers unsuitable either in material or workmanship. I do not doubt that these stipulations impose a duty upon the purchaser. According to all the authorities it is for the purchaser of goods to satisfy himself whether the contract has been fulfilled, and to reject the goods unreservedly if they are not conform to contract.

¹ 13 R. (H. L.) 57. .

Now the pursuer not only had sufficient opportunity to satisfy himself that the contract was being fulfilled, but by an express stipulation he undertook to do so. If he had neglected this duty or if, on inspection, he was satisfied, or had concealed his dissatisfaction so as to allow the contractors to go on with the work on the understanding that so far as already seen it was sufficient, he would in my opinion have lost his right to object to the vessel on the ground of disconformity to contract. But this duty was in fact performed by his designer or his inspector; and the work which is now challenged as deficient was not passed by the designer. On the contrary, it is proved that Mr Mylne and his inspector complained in due time of the plating of the hull, and if they did not insist on the plates being replaced it was because the defenders undertook that the unfairness would be put right before the completion of the work. It follows that on the defenders' own argument they are in breach of contract, because the stipulation for inspection could serve no purpose if, notwithstanding their failure to do what they undertook to do in order to obviate the inspector's objection,

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.
Lord Kinnear.

Dec. 17, 1912. they are still entitled to say that the contract has been duly performed. I do not think they improve their position by alleging that their promise to put things right could not in fact be performed. It was nevertheless the condition on which they were allowed to complete the work; and if they failed to perform it, they cannot turn the pursuer's incautious belief in their promise, if so be that it was incautious, into an acceptance of bad workmanship which his designer had required them, and they had undertaken, to put right. The condition which Lord Watson considers is material to determine the acceptance of the work at subsequent stages has not been satisfied because none of the stipulated instalments except the first have been paid; and the pursuer declined to pay the balance in August on the ground that he had rescinded the contract and rejected the yacht.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

Lord Kinnear.

In this view of the case the question whether the yacht was completed in time does not arise. On the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary and am for adhering to his interlocutor.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion.

The defenders found upon clause 6 of the contract, which provides that "the right of property in the yacht will pass from the contractors to the owner on payment of the first instalment of the price, subject to the contractors' lien for the balance of the price, and extras." One must consider at the outset the meaning and effect of this clause. Since the passing of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, it appears to be, in the words of Lord Dunedin (*Barclay, Curle, & Company, Limited*¹), "quite clear that, by the law of Scotland, if people choose so to contract, they can pass the property of a thing which is being sold without delivery. . . . There is not the slightest difficulty in so framing a contract, if it is wished, . . . that the property in a gradually constructed ship shall be held to pass at certain stages." The Lord Ordinary observes that "clause 6 is intended merely as a security." This is an inaccurate mode of expression; but I do not consider that (as the defenders argued) it necessarily indicates any confusion of thought or erroneous view in law on the part of his Lordship. I should think he would agree in holding—as I should hold, and as I understood both parties to concede—that the object of clause 6 was to enable the pursuer, in the event of the defenders' sequestration, to vindicate his right to the yacht, though unfinished, in a question with their trustee. The clause is not happily framed, for the right of property in "the yacht," which prima facie should mean the completed vessel, could not, in the nature of things, pass at a time when ex concessis its construction was only at an early stage. But I rather think the defenders are so far right that the intention of clause 6 was to pass to the pursuer the property of the vessel as she stood when the first instalment was paid. The defenders' counsel urged that, if that be conceded, they must win the case. The pursuer cannot, they said, be entitled to the commodum of the clause and yet immune from its incommodum; and he is plainly debarred from rejecting the yacht at any time after payment of the first instalment of the price, because she then became irrevocably his property, all subsequent work upon her following by way of accessory to the thing as it stood at the date of that payment; and no man can reject his own property. I observe in passing that the Lord Ordinary points out that this view is not specifically raised upon the record—as it ought to have been, for it is truly a preliminary plea to the competency of the action as laid—but was only advanced in the speech of the defenders' counsel after the proof, and after his opponent had concluded his address. But the argument has been presented, and must be dealt with on its merits, whatever bearing the lateness of its appearance might have upon expenses.

¹ 1908 S. C. 82, at p. 89.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.
Lord Dundas.

It is prima facie rather a formidable contention; but I have come to the conclusion that it is fallacious. I think it confuses passing of property with acceptance on delivery. Now, a buyer's right at common law to reject goods on the ground of disconformity to contract at any time before he has duly accepted delivery does not seem to have been altered or impaired by the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act (see sections 11 (2), 35, and 53 (5)). Section 11 (2) affirms in terms that "in Scotland, failure by the seller to perform any material part of a contract of sale is a breach of contract, which entitles the buyer . . . within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated. . . ." In this case there has been no delivery to the pursuer or "voluntary transfer of possession" (section 62 (1)) of the yacht or any part of it. Assuming, therefore, that the parties intended and agreed that the property of the yacht—"property" in the sense of section 62 (1) of the Act, plenum dominium—should pass to the pursuer as the defenders contend, and that it did so pass, it does not, in my judgment, follow that his right to reject the vessel at a subsequent stage, when she was tendered for delivery, was thereby cut off, if he had otherwise good grounds for rejection. There is nothing, I think, necessarily incongruous in the idea that property may pass consistently with the existence of a right of subsequent rejection before acceptance following on delivery. Such a position may, it seems to me, well arise where property in the, as yet, uncompleted subject of a contract of sale has passed to the buyer. He is the owner; but his right of property may be defeasible at his option. This seems to be assumed in the decision of The Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand.¹ An instance by way of illustration has been suggested. If a purchaser should subscribe for a complete book to be published in separate parts to be paid for as delivered, the property in the parts delivered would pass to him, but it seems reasonably clear in principle that he might nevertheless, under given circumstances, be entitled to return them and recover their price, if the seller made default in completing the book, or if the book, when it professed to be completed, was materially disconform to the contract. I think the Lord Ordinary is substantially correct in saying that "the contract is for a completed yacht to be built in terms of a specification to the satisfaction of the pursuer. . . . Under such a contract, I do not think that the pursuer is bound to accept delivery unless the vessel is completed conform to the contract."

If the views I have expressed are sound, the matter is reduced to questions of fact—whether or not, upon the evidence, the work was so completed; and if not, whether the vessel was accepted by the pursuer as con-

¹ (1886) 12 App. Cas. 128, see p. 140.

Dec. 17, 1912. form to contract and to his satisfaction. On both these points the Lord Ordinary's decision is adverse to the defenders. . I do not propose to analyse or comment upon the evidence. The case, so far as dependent on fact, seems to me to be one peculiarly within the scope of many recent observations in the House of Lords (e.g., *Kinloch v. Young*¹) as to the exceptional value of the opinion of the Judge of first instance, who hears and observes the witnesses; and the less favourable position of appellate Judges, who have only printed evidence before them, in deciding matters of oral testimony, especially where (as here) credibility is involved. I am not, however, in the least inclined to differ from the Lord Ordinary's view of the facts. On the contrary, I agree with it; and I should have reached the conclusion he has arrived at upon my consideration of the printed proof. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor reclaimed against ought in substance to be adhered to.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.
Lord Dundas.

LORD MACKENZIE.—[After narrating the circumstances]—The argument for the defenders is that when the first instalment was paid the property in the yacht, so far as the work had proceeded, then passed by force of the contract to the pursuer; that all the subsequent work was accessory to that property which had passed to and been accepted by the pursuer; and that accordingly, whatever his right might be to recover damages, he never could reject, because if he did, he would be rejecting his own property, which would be a contradiction in terms. According to the defenders' view of the contract, what the pursuer desired was to be protected against the builder's creditors by obtaining, upon payment being made of the first instalment, the full dominium over the yacht so far as constructed. This, they say, was made possible without delivery by the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act had given security to the buyer against the seller's creditors without passing the property. The Sale of Goods Act made it possible to pass the property without delivery, as is pointed out by the Lord President in Barclay, Curle, & Company v. Laing.² The defenders say the effect of article 6 of this contract was to pass not a "special property," as that term is used in the law of England, but the "general property" as defined in section 62 of the Sale of Goods Act. The defenders further point to article 1 as supplementary to article 6, and as giving the buyer complete protection. The yacht was to be built under the superintendence of the pursuer's designer, and, by the last clause, the builders undertook to put right, within the time stipulated for the construction of the yacht, any work considered unsuitable. It was admitted that not only must the property of the article sold have passed, but that the article must have been accepted, before it could be said that the buyer was barred from rejecting. The contention, however, was that it was not open to the pursuer to deny that he accepted the frame when he paid the first instalment due in respect of it.

The fallacy in this argument, as it appears to me, lies in the effect which is sought to be given to the terms of article 6. As I construe the contract, what the pursuer bought was a yacht completed according to contract. The goods sold were not ascertained in the sense of section 16 of the Act when Dec. 17, 1912, the first instalment was paid. Until the buyer saw and inspected the finished whole he could not tell whether the yacht was according to contract or not, and accordingly could not either accept or reject her. As Lord Watson points out in Seath & Company v. Moore,¹ by the law of England (to which that of Scotland is now assimilated by the Sale of Goods Act) "in order to pass the property as sold there must always be facts proved or admitted sufficient to warrant the inference that the purchaser has agreed to accept the corpus so far as completed as in part implement of the contract of sale." The defenders' view of the meaning of the contract involves this, that after paying the first instalment the buyer was bound to take, and could not reject, the frame of the yacht, even though, owing to causes for which the builder was solely responsible, no further work was done to the yacht. This does not seem to me a reasonable construction to put upon article 6. No doubt it might be that during the course of construction the buyer or those representing him might act in such a manner as to bar him from rejecting the yacht. The contract provides that nothing is to be incorporated in the yacht that the designer does not consider good enough. If the designer or his subordinate had stood by and said nothing during the progress of the work, the buyer might have been barred from saying at the end of the day he was not satisfied. I am unable to regard the evidence as sufficient to make a case of that kind here. During the plating of the yacht there were complaints by the pursuer Mr Nelson, by his naval architect Mr Mylne, and by the latter's representative, Mr James. These were made to Mr Eadie, of the defenders' firm, and the point sought to be made against the pursuer is that Mr James, who saw the plating in progress, did not insist on plates which he, as an expert, must have known could never be straightened by hammering, being taken out and replaced by others. The defenders' counsel urged that there are certain plates that an expert should have known could never be put right, and others that could be faired out; and that it was the duty of Mr James to see that new plates were put in where necessary, as the defenders' undertaking only extended to fairing out. The answer to this, however, is that Mr Eadie continually promised, during the time the plates were being riveted, including a considerable period after 8th July, that the unevenness could and would be put right by hammering. The result of this was that it was only when the plating was completed in the middle of August that the badness of the work became fully apparent. To turn this point against Mr James now is to say that he should never have given the defenders the opportunity they asked to put their work right. Such a case as that cannot be made upon the evidence here. It was admitted that the defenders had not asked for an opportunity to put matters right after the yacht was rejected on 24th August.

¹ 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 1.

² 1908 S. C. 82.

Upon the question of law therefore I am against the contention of the defenders. None of the cases cited appear to me to lead necessarily to an opposite conclusion. If a buyer has accepted goods as his own in fulfilment of a contract he will be barred thereafter from rejecting them. The question

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

¹ 13 R. (H. L.) 57, at p. 66.

Dec. 17, 1912. whether he has accepted them is a question of fact, and it is upon this question of fact that the defenders' contention fails.

Nelson v.
William
Chalmers &
Co., Limited.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

In this view of the case the question of who was to blame for the delay after 20th July does not arise. The record as regards the main cause of delay alleged, viz., that Mr Mylne did not furnish the defenders with the line of keelson and height of floors till 12th May, is quite at variance with the point sought to be made on the evidence, and the entry in the diary under date 29th May.

No objection was taken to the amount of damages, £75, allowed by the Lord Ordinary. I am of opinion that the interlocutor reclaimed against should be affirmed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . .

Adhere to said interlocutor in so far as it (heads 1 and 3 thereof) decerns against the defenders for payment of the sums of £131, 5s. and £75 respectively, with interest thereon as concluded for in the summons, and to this extent refuse the reclaiming note, and decern; recall the second head of said interlocutor, and in place thereof ordain the defenders to deliver to the pursuer within thirty days from this date the articles specified in said second head, and decern; with certification that if the defenders fail to deliver said articles as aforesaid decree will be pronounced against them for the value thereof, with interest as concluded for in the summons."

W. & F. HALDANE, W.S.—CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 61.

ROBERT A. MUNRO & COMPANY, LIMITED, Petitioners.—

Hon. W. Watson.

Dec. 18, 1912.

Robert A.
Munro & Co.,
Limited.

Company—Reorganisation of share capital—Process—Petition—Advertisement—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 69), sec. 45.

In a petition, under section 45 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, for confirmation by the Court of a special resolution passed by a limited company for reorganisation of its share capital, the Court ordered intimation of the petition without advertisement.

2D DIVISION. ROBERT A. MUNRO & COMPANY, LIMITED, Glasgow, presented a petition to the Court for an order in terms of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908,¹ section 45, confirming a special resolution of the Company to the effect that 10,000 preference shares in the Company should be converted into ordinary shares. In the prayer of the petition the petitioners craved the Court "to appoint intimation of this petition to be made on the walls and in the minute-book, and in such other manner, if any, as your Lordships shall think necessary."

When the case appeared in the Single Bills of the Second Division on 18th December 1912, counsel for the petitioners cited In re Ashanti Development, Limited,² and submitted that, the matter being merely a domestic one, intimation on the walls and in the minute-book was sufficient, and that advertisement of the petition was not required.

¹ 8 Edw. VII. cap. 69.

² 1911 W. N. 144.

THE COURT (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, Dec. 18, 1912. Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie), without delivering opinions, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Appoint the petitioner to be intimated as craved, and answers, if any, to be lodged within eight days thereafter."

WEBSTER, WILL, & Co., W.S., Agents.

THOMAS PRYDE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Moncrieff, K.C.—Dykes.
A. G. MOORE & COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—Horne, K.C.
—Lippe.

No. 62.
Dec. 21, 1912.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Second Schedule Pryde v. Moore & Co.
(9)—Recording of memorandum—Genuineness—Written agreement—Terms of memorandum differing from terms of agreement.

A workman, who had been totally incapacitated by an accident, received weekly payments of 10s. from his employers, for which he granted receipts bearing that the payments were accepted "as the weekly compensation payable during the period of total incapacity for work as the result of the accident." He subsequently applied for warrant to record a memorandum which bore that the parties had agreed "that compensation be paid by" the employers to the workman "in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, at the rate of 10s. per week from" the date of the accident.

Held that the memorandum was not genuine, in respect of the omission of the qualification "during the period of total incapacity."

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule
(3)—Amount of compensation—Partial recovery—Review of weekly payments—Arbitrator's discretion.

When a workman, who has been totally incapacitated and has been receiving full compensation in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, partially recovers and is earning a wage, a prima facie case arises for reducing his compensation: but it is open to him to prove circumstances which will warrant the arbitrator, in the exercise of his discretion, in refusing to diminish the compensation. The circumstance that the compensation he has been receiving together with the wage he is earning does not equal his average weekly earnings before the accident does not by itself justify a refusal to diminish.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, between Thomas Pryde, labourer, Dalkeith, and A. G. Moore & Company, coalmasters, Glasgow, the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) granted warrant to record a memorandum of agreement, refused to diminish a weekly payment of compensation, and, at the request of the employers, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"On or about 14th February 1912 the respondent lodged with the Sheriff-clerk of the county of Edinburgh, to be recorded in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, a memorandum of an agreement in the following terms:—

"The claimant claimed compensation from the respondents in respect of injury to his left haunch caused by accident in the employment of the respondents at Dalkeith Colliery, Smeaton, on the 26th day of September 1911.

"On or about the 10th day of October 1911 the parties agreed as follows, viz.: That compensation be paid by the respondents to the

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

Dec. 21, 1912. claimant in terms of the said Act at the rate of ten shillings per week from said 26th day of September 1911.

Pryde v.
Moore & Co.

“ It is requested that this memorandum be recorded in the Special Register of the Sheriff Court of Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh.

“ R. HANDYSIDE,

“ Law-agent, Dalkeith, for Claimant.

“ 14th February 1912.

“ To the Sheriff-clerk,

“ Court House, Edinburgh.’

“ Due intimation of this application having been given by the Sheriff-clerk to the appellants, and they having objected to the recording of the said memorandum of agreement, the Sheriff-clerk thereupon intimated to the respondent that the said memorandum had been objected to, and would not be recorded without a special warrant from the Sheriff. Accordingly, in terms of section 12 of the Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907, the memorandum fell to be dealt with as if it were an application to the Sheriff for settlement by arbitration of the questions raised by the objections to the recording of the memorandum.

“ Thereafter the appellants having lodged a minute objecting to the recording of said memorandum on the ground that it was not genuine in respect (1) that the period during which compensation at said rate was to be paid was limited by agreement to the period of the respondent's total incapacity for work, and that this was a material term of the agreement entered into between the parties; and (2) that the agreement sought to be recorded had been superseded by another, whereby, on 30th December 1911, the respondent agreed to accept, and the appellants agreed to pay, partial compensation at the rate of 5s. 6d. per week. In said minute the appellants tendered payment of compensation at the said rate of 5s. 6d. per week; averred that the incapacity of the respondent for work in respect of which he had been paid compensation became greatly lessened on 25th December 1911, and that he was not entitled to full compensation as from that date, and craved the Court to diminish the claimant's compensation as at that date or at such subsequent date as the Court might think fit.

“ To the said minute answers were lodged by the respondent, in which he admitted that on or about 20th December 1911 he started light work at the picking tables at the appellants' Dalkeith Colliery, and averred that the appellants then offered the respondent compensation of 5s. 6d. per week, which he agreed to accept on the condition that the wage to be paid him for light work and the partial compensation of 5s. 6d. per week would be equal to his wage of 20s. per week before the accident, and that owing to the respondent's condition as the result of his injuries, his earning capacity did not warrant any reduction in his former compensation of 10s. per week as and from 25th December 1911.

“ Thereafter a proof was allowed and led before me on 29th April 1912, when the following facts were admitted or proved:—

“ (1) That the respondent sustained personal injury to his left haunch by accident while in the employment of the appellants at Dalkeith Colliery, Smeaton, on 26th September 1911, whereby he was totally incapacitated for work.

“ (2) That said accident arose out of and in the course of the respondent's said employment.

"(3) That the sum of 10s. per week was 50 per cent of the respondent's average weekly earnings prior to the accident. Dec. 21. 1912.

"(4) That on Saturday, 14th October 1911, the respondent asked his wife, Mrs Elizabeth Jackson or Pryde, to go to the appellants' office at Smeaton to get his compensation, as he was unable to go himself; that she had no authority or express instructions from her husband to enter into any special agreement with the appellants; that she went to the appellants' office and saw their cashier, Mr William Crooks, to whom she stated that she had come for her husband's compensation; that he told her that that was not the day for getting compensation, and that Monday was the day, but that he would give it as she had come; that the said William Crooks informed Mrs Pryde that the compensation would be 10s. a week; that at that rate the sum payable was 25s. for the two and a half weeks which had elapsed since the accident; that he read over to her as a condition of payment of the compensation of 10s. per week the following words printed on the receipt-sheet which was tendered by him to Mrs Pryde for her signature, viz. :—'The undernoted sums are accepted under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, as the weekly compensation payable during the period of total incapacity for work as the result of the accident on the above date, my average weekly earnings having been 20s.'; that he asked her to sign the receipt-sheet, copy of which is appended hereto, and is held to form part of this case; that she stated to him that she could not write; that she, at his direction, signed the receipt-sheet by a cross; that he wrote her name before the cross and signed as a witness; that thereupon Mrs Pryde requested the cashier to make future payments to James Black, a neighbour who was working at the pit, which the cashier agreed to do; that for six weeks thereafter the sum of 10s. per week was paid on the receipt of the said James Black; that for the next three weeks the sum of 10s. per week was paid to the respondent himself, the last of these payments being made on 18th December 1911; that the words above quoted were not read over to the said James Black or to the respondent himself at any time.

"(5) That on 20th December 1911 the respondent had partially recovered capacity for work, and was employed by the appellants at light work, and paid wages at the rate of 1s. 6d. per shift, with eleven shifts in the fortnight, equivalent to 8s. 3d. per week.

"(6) That said sum of 8s. 3d. per week represented at that date and still represents the respondent's earning capacity, and said sum added to 10s. per week as compensation leaves the respondent with 1s. 9d. per week less than his average weekly earnings prior to the accident.

"(7) That the appellants from said 20th December 1911, in addition to paying the respondent wages at said rate, paid him for compensation as follows: On 25th December, for the week ending 22nd December, 9s. 6d., and for each of the three following weeks 5s. 6d. These payments were made to him along with the wages he was receiving for the light work that he was doing. The respondent accepted the payments under protest, and claimed that he was entitled, for his work and as compensation, to as much as his average weekly earnings before the accident had been.

"(8) That when on 30th December the respondent was for the first time paid compensation at the rate of 5s. 6d. per week, the cashier explained to him that that was all that he was authorised to pay him

Pryde v.
Moore & Co.

Dec. 21, 1912.

Pryde v.
Moore & Co.

as compensation, but the respondent did not then or at any subsequent time agree to accept said sum as the compensation to which he was entitled. The appellants' said cashier had no authority to enter into any agreement with the respondent as to his compensation, or to bind the appellants thereanent in any way, and he did not do so. When taking receipts from the respondent for said sums of 5s. 6d. he took same on the original form bearing that they were sums accepted as the weekly compensation payable during the period of total incapacity for work. The method by which the appellants calculated the said sum of 5s. 6d. was by treating the respondent as capable of earnings of 1s. 6d. per shift or 9s. per week, and then taking 50 per cent of the difference between said sum of 9s. and 20s., his average weekly earnings prior to the accident.

"On these facts I found that the appellants had admitted liability to pay compensation to the respondent under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of said accident and injury, and had agreed to pay him the sum of 10s. per week in name of compensation from said 26th September 1911, which the respondent agreed to accept; that the memorandum of agreement now sought to be recorded by the respondent is genuine; that the parties did not agree upon said sum of 5s. 6d. per week as the amount of compensation payable to the respondent, and entered into no agreement with one another modifying their first agreement before referred to; and that the appellants had failed to prove that the earning capacity of the respondent was sufficient to entitle them as a matter of right to have the respondent's compensation diminished, and I accordingly granted warrant to the Sheriff-clerk of the county of Edinburgh to record the foresaid memorandum of agreement sought to be recorded by the respondent in the Special Register kept by him for the purpose, and, in the circumstances of the case, refused to diminish the compensation payable to the respondent, and found the appellants liable to the respondent in expenses."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Upon the facts stated, is the memorandum of agreement lodged for the respondent genuine within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, was I on the facts stated bound to hold that said memorandum of agreement had been superseded by an agreement to diminish the weekly compensation payable to the respondent from 10s. to 5s. 6d.? (3) Upon the facts set forth above, was I entitled to grant warrant to record the memorandum of agreement lodged by the respondent? (4) On the facts stated (a) were the appellants entitled, as a matter of right, to have the respondent's compensation diminished; or (b) was I entitled in the circumstances of the case to refuse to diminish the respondent's compensation?"

An answer to the second question of law was not asked for on appeal.

The case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Guthrie, and Lord Hunter) on 9th and 16th November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The memorandum was not genuine, because no agreement had ever been concluded in the terms there set forth.¹ The conditions of the actual agreement between the parties were contained in the receipts granted by the workman, and included a condition limiting the agreement to the period of total incapacity, which was omitted from the memorandum proposed by the respondent. When an agreement was in writing the Sheriff was bound to refuse warrant to record any memorandum which was not in the precise terms of the agreement.¹ (2) When total incapacity changed to partial incapacity a prima facie case arose for reducing compensation.² In special circumstances—such as were present in Geary v. William Dixon, Limited,³ and Parker v. William Dixon, Limited,⁴—a workman might continue to get full compensation even though he had partially recovered. But no such circumstances had been proved—or at anyrate stated—in the present case. It was not enough that the compensation in respect of total incapacity, together with the wages the workman was now earning, was not equal to his average weekly earnings before the accident. There was no general rule, and the arbitrator in each case must exercise his discretion.⁵ This was even more emphatically provided under the Act of 1906⁶ than under the Act of 1897.⁷ There was no indication in the case that the arbitrator had applied his mind to this question, and the matter should therefore be remitted to him for reconsideration.

¹ Phillips v. Vickers, Sons, & Maxim, [1912] 1 K. B. 16; Hartshorne v. Coppice Colliery Co., (1912) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 358.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) There was no doubt that an agreement had been come to between the parties, whereas in *Hartshorne*⁸ the question was whether there was an agreement at all. The memorandum correctly expressed that agreement. The omission of the reference to the period of total incapacity was immaterial, for that qualification expressed no more than the statute implied. Even if the agreement fell to be ascertained from the terms of the receipt, it was clear that the agreement was not—as maintained by the appellants—limited to the period of total incapacity, for after that period was over the appellants continued to make payments of reduced compensation and to take receipts in precisely the same terms. The appellants could suffer no hardship, for they had met the application to record with a simultaneous application for review.⁹ (2) The arbitrator had refused to diminish the compensation, and no reason had been shown for interfering with his determination. The circumstances were the same as those in other cases where the arbitrator's award had been allowed to stand.¹⁰ That he had applied his mind and exercised his discretion was clear from the statement that he refused to diminish “in the circumstances of the case.” It was an unheard-of thing that any Judge should be obliged to give reasons for an

¹ McLean v. Allan Line Steamship Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 256.

² Carlin v. Stephen & Sons, Limited, 1911 S. C. 901, per Lord Salvesen, at p. 908.

³ (1902) 4 F. 1143.

⁴ (1902) 4 F. 1147.

⁵ Webster v. Sharp & Co., Limited [1904] 1 K. B. 218, aff. [1905] A. C. 284; Bevan v. Energlyn Colliery Co., [1912] 1 K. B. 63.

⁶ Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule, (3), quoted by Lord Guthrie, infra, at p. 463.

⁷ Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Schedule (2), quoted by Lord Guthrie, infra, at p. 464.

⁸ 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 358.

⁹ McEwan v. Baird & Co., 1910 S. C. 436.

¹⁰ Bryson v. Dunn & Stephen, Limited, (1905) 8 F. 226; Geary v. William Dixon, Limited, 4 F. 1143; Parker v. William Dixon, Limited, 4 F. 1147.

Dec. 21, 1912.

Pryde v.
Moore & Co.

as compensation, but the respondent did not then or at any subsequent time agree to accept said sum as the compensation to which he was entitled. The appellants' said cashier had no authority to enter into any agreement with the respondent as to his compensation, or to bind the appellants thereanent in any way, and he did not do so. When taking receipts from the respondent for said sums of 5s. 6d. he took same on the original form bearing that they were sums accepted as the weekly compensation payable during the period of total incapacity for work. The method by which the appellants calculated the said sum of 5s. 6d. was by treating the respondent as capable of earning 1s. 6d. per shift or 9s. per week, and then taking 50 per cent of the difference between said sum of 9s. and 20s., his average weekly earnings prior to the accident.

"On these facts I found that the appellants had admitted liability to pay compensation to the respondent under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of said accident and injury, and had agreed to pay him the sum of 10s. per week in name of compensation from said 26th September 1911, which the respondent agreed to accept; that the memorandum of agreement now sought to be recorded by the respondent is genuine; that the parties did not agree upon said sum of 5s. 6d. per week as the amount of compensation payable to the respondent, and entered into no agreement with one another modifying their first agreement before referred to; and that the appellants had failed to prove that the earning capacity of the respondent was sufficient to entitle them as a matter of right to have the respondent's compensation diminished, and I accordingly granted warrant to the Sheriff-clerk of the county of Edinburgh to record the foreshaid memorandum of agreement sought to be recorded by the respondent in the Special Register kept by him for the purpose, and, in the circumstances of the case, refused to diminish the compensation payable to the respondent, and found the appellants liable to the respondent in expenses."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Upon the facts stated, is the memorandum of agreement lodged for the respondent genuine within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, was I on the facts stated bound to hold that said memorandum of agreement had been superseded by an agreement to diminish the weekly compensation payable to the respondent from 10s. to 5s. 6d.? (3) Upon the facts set forth above, was I entitled to grant warrant to record the memorandum of agreement lodged by the respondent? (4) On the facts stated (a) were the appellants entitled, as a matter of right, to have the respondent's compensation diminished; or (b) was I entitled in the circumstances of the case to refuse to diminish the respondent's compensation?"

An answer to the second question of law was not asked for on appeal.

The case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Guthrie, and Lord Hunter) on 9th and 16th November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The memorandum was not genuine, because no agreement had ever been concluded in the terms there set forth.¹ The conditions of the actual agreement between the parties were contained in the receipts granted by the workman, and included a condition limiting the agreement to the period of total incapacity, which was omitted from the memorandum proposed by the respondent. When an agreement was in writing the Sheriff was bound to refuse warrant to record any memorandum which was not in the precise terms of the agreement.¹ (2) When total incapacity changed to partial incapacity a prima facie case arose for reducing compensation.² In special circumstances—such as were present in Geary v. William Dixon, Limited,³ and Parker v. William Dixon, Limited,⁴—a workman might continue to get full compensation even though he had partially recovered. But no such circumstances had been proved—or at anyrate stated—in the present case. It was not enough that the compensation in respect of total incapacity, together with the wages the workman was now earning, was not equal to his average weekly earnings before the accident. There was no general rule, and the arbitrator in each case must exercise his discretion.⁵ This was even more emphatically provided under the Act of 1906⁶ than under the Act of 1897.⁷ There was no indication in the case that the arbitrator had applied his mind to this question, and the matter should therefore be remitted to him for reconsideration.

¹ Phillips v. Vickers, Sons, & Maxim, [1912] 1 K. B. 16; Hartshorne v. Coppice Colliery Co., (1912) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 358.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) There was no doubt that an agreement had been come to between the parties, whereas in *Hartshorne*⁸ the question was whether there was an agreement at all. The memorandum correctly expressed that agreement. The omission of the reference to the period of total incapacity was immaterial, for that qualification expressed no more than the statute implied. Even if the agreement fell to be ascertained from the terms of the receipt, it was clear that the agreement was not—as maintained by the appellants—limited to the period of total incapacity, for after that period was over the appellants continued to make payments of reduced compensation and to take receipts in precisely the same terms. The appellants could suffer no hardship, for they had met the application to record with a simultaneous application for review.⁹ (2) The arbitrator had refused to diminish the compensation, and no reason had been shown for interfering with his determination. The circumstances were the same as those in other cases where the arbitrator's award had been allowed to stand.¹⁰ That he had applied his mind and exercised his discretion was clear from the statement that he refused to diminish “in the circumstances of the case.” It was an unheard-of thing that any Judge should be obliged to give reasons for an

¹ McLean v. Allan Line Steamship Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 256.

² Carlin v. Stephen & Sons, Limited, 1911 S. C. 901, per Lord Salvesen, at p. 908.

³ (1902) 4 F. 1143.

⁴ (1902) 4 F. 1147.

⁵ Webster v. Sharp & Co., Limited [1904] 1 K. B. 218, aff. [1905] A. C. 284; Bevan v. Energlyn Colliery Co., [1912] 1 K. B. 63.

⁶ Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule, (3), quoted by Lord Guthrie, infra, at p. 463.

⁷ Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Schedule (2), quoted by Lord Guthrie, infra, at p. 464.

⁸ 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 358.

⁹ McEwan v. Baird & Co., 1910 S. C. 436.

¹⁰ Bryson v. Dunn & Stephen, Limited, (1905) 8 F. 226; Geary v. William Dixon, Limited, 4 F. 1143; Parker v. William Dixon, Limited, 4 F. 1147.

Dec. 21, 1912. exercise of discretionary power. The award did not exceed the amount permitted by the statute, and it was not suggested that the arbitrator had failed to consider any relevant facts, or had considered any facts which were irrelevant.

Pryde v.
Moore & Co.

At advising on 21st December 1912,—

LORD GUTHRIE.—In this stated case the appellants maintain, first, that the arbitrator was wrong in holding the memorandum of agreement (relating to the compensation payable by them to the respondent, Thomas Pryde, in respect of an injury to his left haunch caused by accident in the appellants' employment at Dalkeith Colliery, Smeaton, on 26th September 1911) genuine within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906; and second, that he was wrong in refusing their crave to have the compensation, paid to him at the rate of 10s. from 26th September 1911, reduced as at and from 25th December 1911. The first of these questions is raised in the first and third questions of law, and the second in the fourth question of law, subsection (b.) The appellants did not insist on the point to which the second question of law relates.

1. Was the memorandum genuine, and therefore capable of being recorded? It was suggested by the respondent that the agreement was verbal, and was either arrived at antecedent to Saturday, 14th October 1911, the date founded on by the appellants, or that on that date there was a verbal agreement for a weekly payment of a sum of money, namely, 10s., which must be taken as the agreement of parties, irrespective of any conditions which might be annexed in the written receipt to the payment of that sum. I cannot agree with either view. The case does not suggest any communings between the parties prior to 14th October, and the facts stated make it clear that the agreement, if there was any agreement, embodied in the receipt of that date printed in the appendix to the stated case, must be taken as a whole.

The receipt bore these words:—"The undernoted sums are accepted under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, as the weekly compensation payable during the period of total incapacity for work as the result of the accident on the above date (26th September 1911), my average weekly earnings having been 20 shillings." On a receipt in these terms, signed for the first payment by the respondent's wife (by mark) and for subsequent payments by James Black, a friend of the respondent, and then latterly by the respondent himself, payments were regularly made at the rate of 10s. down to the week ending 15th December 1911. If the respondent had been willing to record a memorandum of an agreement in the terms of the receipt, including the words "during the period of total incapacity for work," there would have been no question between the parties. But the respondent insisted on a memorandum of agreement in the following terms:—"That compensation be paid by the respondents to the claimant in terms of the said Act at the rate of 10s. per week from said 26th day of September 1911." The employers insisted on the insertion of the words "during the period of total incapacity for work." Hence the present dispute.

A preliminary question was mooted, rather than argued, namely, whether, in view of the fact stated in the case that the respondent's wife, with whom Dec. 21, 1912. the appellants allege an agreement, had no authority to enter into any Pryde v. special agreement with the appellants, there was an agreement at all which Moore & Co. could be recorded. But this question is not raised by any of the questions, Lord Guthrie. and it must therefore be assumed that, if otherwise unobjectionable, the agreement contained in the receipt might have been recorded.

The question is, Could the agreement embodied in the memorandum of agreement, not containing the words "during the period of total incapacity for work," be recorded as genuine? A similar question was considered in Scotland in the case of *M'Lean*¹ and in England in the case of Phillips.² These cases decided that, if there be a variation, not trivial, between the memorandum of agreement proposed to be recorded and the agreement actually entered into, it is not for the arbitrator to decide whether the difference is so substantial as to prevent the agreement in the memorandum being considered genuine. It is sufficient that there is a difference, on the face of it not trivial, which is objected to on the ground that it is material. In this case the appellants maintain that the insertion of the words founded on by them would put them in a more advantageous position in relation to the duration and termination of the payments to an injured workman than if the words were omitted. If the views expressed in the cases above cited be well founded, it is not for the arbitrator to decide whether the appellants would or would not obtain any such advantage. It is significant that, although the respondent maintained that the words in question, even if introduced, would in no way alter the rights of parties, he has always refused, and still refuses, to record a memorandum which includes these words.

I therefore think that the first question should be answered in the negative, and if it be necessary to answer the third question, that it also should be answered in the negative.

2. Ought the arbitrator to have refused to diminish the respondent's compensation? There is no question that the original sum of compensation, 10s. a week, being 50 per cent of the respondent's average weekly earnings prior to the accident, was properly fixed for the period of total incapacity. But it appears from the case that, on and after 20th December 1911, he had partially recovered capacity for work, and was employed by the appellants at light work, and was paid by them 8s. 3d. a week. This sum added to the respondent's compensation amounted to 18s. 3d., being 1s. 9d. per week less than his average weekly earnings prior to the accident. The question turns on the interpretation of the First Schedule (3) to the 1906 Act, which runs as follows:—“(3) In fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to any payment, allowance, or benefit which the workman may receive from the employer during the period of his incapacity, and in the case of partial incapacity the weekly payment shall in no case exceed the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident, but shall bear such relation to the amount of

¹ 1912 S. C. 256.

² [1912] 1 K. R. 16.

Dec. 21, 1912. that difference as under the circumstances of the case may appear proper."

Pryde v.

Moore & Co.

Lord Guthrie.

This section may be compared with the corresponding section of the Act of 1897: "(2) In fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident, and to any payment not being wages which he may receive from the employer in respect of his injury during the period of his incapacity."

The cases of Geary,¹ Parker,² and *Bryson*³ arose under the previous Act of 1897, and the case of *Carlin*⁴ was decided under the existing Act of 1906. The result of these cases is that circumstances like the present raise a prima facie case for reduction, but that it is open to the workman to prove circumstances which will warrant the arbitrator (he being the judge of their sufficiency) to refuse to diminish the compensation. Both in Parker's case² and in Geary's case¹ there were permanent injuries; in the first case the workman's hands were burned so as to produce permanent injury, and in the other case the man had lost an eye. In both cases his value in the labour market was permanently lessened. Now, the stated case does not disclose any special circumstances relevant to displace the prima facie case made by the employers. The only circumstance stated by the arbitrator is that the compensation money plus the respondent's earnings did not equal his average weekly earnings before the accident. So far as the case shows, this was the only ground on which the respondent claimed that his compensation should not be reduced. Holding as I do that this circumstance by itself cannot justify a refusal to diminish, I am of opinion that if it had been necessary to determine this question now, the proper course would have been to answer the fourth question in its second branch in the negative. But in view of the way in which the case is stated, it might not be fair, without a remit, to assume the absence of the relevant circumstances. If we answer the first and third questions in the negative, it seems unnecessary to answer the other questions.

LORD HUNTER.—The first question raised in this stated case is whether on the facts stated a memorandum of agreement lodged for the respondent was genuine within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The memorandum of agreement bears, inter alia, an unqualified statement that compensation was agreed to be paid by the appellants to the respondent at the rate of 10s. per week from 26th September 1911.

From the facts stated by the Sheriff-substitute it appears that the respondent's wife, on 14th October 1911, received 25s., being compensation for two and a half weeks, and granted a receipt which bore, as was explained to her, that the undernoted sums were accepted under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, as the weekly compensation payable "during the period of total incapacity for work, as the result of the accident." Subsequent payments were made to a friend of the respondent and to the respondent himself on receipts which were similarly qualified. It is said that these

¹ 4 F. 1143.

² 4 F. 1147.

³ 8 F. 226.

⁴ 1911 S. C. 901.

receipts were not read over or explained either to the respondent's friend or Dec. 21, 1912. to himself. I do not think this is of any importance, as there was no evidence, except in terms of the receipt, of the appellants having agreed to any payment. Pryde v.
Moore & Co.
Lord Hunter.

On 12th February 1912 the respondent, who had partially recovered, and had for three or four weeks received less than the full compensation from the appellants, lodged a memorandum of an agreement with the Sheriff-clerk to the genuineness of which the appellants objected, and the question came to be dealt with by the Sheriff as if it were an application for settlement by arbitration of the questions raised by the objections to the recording of the memorandum. The principal objection was that the memorandum was not genuine, as it did not contain any qualification to the effect that compensation at the agreed-on rate was limited by agreement to the period of the respondent's total incapacity for work. The Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection, and we are asked to sustain his view, upon the ground that the memorandum of agreement was in statutory terms, and that the qualifying words "during total incapacity," which it was proposed to insert, were an implied statutory qualification of payment of the maximum weekly compensation under the Act. It appears to me, however, to be quite clearly decided by the cases to which we were referred, Phillips,¹ M'Lean,² and Hartshorne,³ that the Sheriff-substitute took a wrong course. In M'Lean's case² the Lord President, speaking of an agreement which was evidenced by a receipt signed by the workman, said (at p. 260) "that where an agreement which has been come to between the parties is admittedly in writing, the Sheriff must record that agreement as it stands and nothing else." Lord Kinnear added in the same case (at p. 260): "Either party is quite entitled to say that, in so far as it departs from the express terms of this document, the agreement proposed is not what he has consented to." The recent case of *Hartshorne*³ raised exactly the same point as is raised in the present case, because there, as here, what the employers sought was to prevent a memorandum of agreement being recorded that did not contain the same qualifying words as the appellants maintained should be introduced in this case.

Another question was argued to us. It arises from the following circumstances. At the time when the respondent presented his application to the Sheriff-clerk to have the memorandum of agreement recorded, he was earning 8s. 3d. a week, and the Sheriff finds that that figure represents his present earning capacity. The 8s. 3d. added to 10s. as compensation leaves the respondent with 1s. 9d. less than his average weekly earnings prior to the accident. The appellants maintained that the respondent was only entitled to 5s. 6d. The Sheriff-substitute found that "the appellants had failed to prove that the earning capacity of the respondent was sufficient to entitle them as a matter of right to have the respondent's compensation diminished." I do not think that is a correct way of considering the question which arises upon an application to reduce compensation where there has been partial recovery of earning capacity by a disabled workman. The provision under the Act of 1906 is somewhat different from the provision under the

¹ [1912] 1 K. B. 16.

² 1912 S. C. 256.

³ 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 358.

Dec. 21, 1912. Act of 1897, which was considered by the Court of Session in the three cases of Geary,¹ Parker,² and Bryson.³ It is now provided⁴: "In fixing Pryde v. the amount of the weekly payment . . . in the case of partial incapacity the weekly payment shall in no case exceed the difference between the Moore & Co. amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident, but shall bear such Lord Hunter. relation to the amount of that difference as under the circumstances of the case may appear proper."

The last words quoted were not used in the Act of 1897. They appear to me to make it clear that the Sheriff-substitute must not proceed upon any hard and fast rule that compensation is not to be altered unless the amount added to his present earnings is equal to or exceeds the former earnings of the workman. I do not say, although his findings rather suggest it, that the Sheriff-substitute took this view; but there is nothing to show that he exercised his discretion with reference to the facts of the case, which I think he was bound to do. The fourth question is not, however, so framed that either branch of it could be answered either in the affirmative or the negative without a remit being made to the Sheriff-substitute. But if the first and third questions are answered in the negative, I do not think that it is necessary to answer the other questions put.

Lord Guthrie intimated that the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, who was absent at the advising, had considered the opinions which had been delivered and concurred in them.

LORD DUNDAS and LORD SALVESEN were present at the advising.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first and third questions of law in the negative: Find it unnecessary to answer the other questions: Find and declare accordingly: Therefore recall the determination of the arbitrator, and remit to him to proceed as accords."

GRAY & HANDYSIDE, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 4 F. 1143.

² 4 F. 1147.

³ 8 F. 226.

⁴ 6 Edw. VII. cap. 58, First Schedule (3).

ALEXANDER W. SCOTT AND OTHERS (James Scott's Trustees), First Parties.—Chree, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

No. 63.

MRS B. S. DAWSON OR SCOTT, Second Party.—Clyde, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

Dec. 21, 1912.

JAMES E. D. SCOTT, Third Party.—Morison, K.C.—R. C. Henderson.

Scott v.
Graham.

JAMES ALEXANDER GRAHAM AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—Chree, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Succession—Bequest in lieu of conventional provision—Marriage-contract provision to children—Bequest to children with conditional institution of their issue—Deduction of marriage-contract provision from share falling to issue.

A testator by his settlement bequeathed the residue of his estate to his children equally, "the issue of any of them predeceasing taking the parent's place and share," vesting being postponed till the occurrence of a particular event. This bequest was declared to be in satisfaction of a provision to the children already made in the testator's marriage-contract.

A son of the testator survived him, and thus became entitled to claim a share of the marriage-contract provision, but died before the term of vesting of the residuary bequest, leaving issue. On his death his share of the marriage-contract provision was claimed by his executor; his share of the residuary bequest, on the other hand, passed to his issue.

Held that the amount of the marriage-contract provision payable to the son's executor fell to be charged exclusively against the share of the residue falling to his issue, and not against the whole residuary estate.

JAMES SCOTT, manufacturer, Dundee, died on 26th January 1908, ^{2D DIVISION.} leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. He was twice married. There was no marriage-contract with reference to the first marriage, but on the occasion of his second marriage a marriage-contract was entered into between him and his spouse.

By this marriage-contract he bound himself to provide one-tenth part of his free personal estate as at the day of his death to the children of the marriage, and this provision was declared to be in full satisfaction of their legal claims.

By his trust-disposition and settlement Mr Scott conveyed to trustees the whole estate belonging to him at the date of his death, and after directing his trustees in the first place to pay his debts, provided as follows:—"On my youngest child attaining the age of twenty-one years, I direct and appoint my trustees, with all convenient speed, and as and when they are in a position to do so, to divide the rest, remainder, and residue of my means and estates, both heritable and moveable, into three equal shares, which my trustees shall dispose of as follows:—They shall pay and convey one of said shares to and among the children of my first marriage and the survivors and survivor of them equally between and among them, the lawful issue of any of them predeceasing taking the parent's place and share; and with regard to the other two shares, I direct my trustees to pay and convey the same to and among the children of my second marriage and the survivors and survivor of them equally between and among them, the lawful issue of any of them predeceasing taking the parent's place and share." It was also declared in the

Dec. 21, 1912. trust-disposition and settlement that "the provisions hereinbefore conceived in favour of my children are, and shall be accepted of by them respectively, in full satisfaction to them of all legitim, and bairns' part of gear, and also of all conventional provisions whatsoever made by me in and under any marriage-contract or otherwise, and of every other claim or provision whatever competent to them in any manner of way by or through or in the event of my death."

Scott v.
Graham.

Of the testator's first marriage five children were born, of whom one daughter predeceased him, leaving a child, and the other four survived him. There were ten children of the second marriage, who all survived the testator. The eldest of these ten children, Alfred T. Scott, died on 16th February 1908, while the youngest child (who attained majority on 30th November 1911) was still in minority. Alfred T. Scott was survived by his wife and by an only child, James E. D. Scott, and left a settlement by which he appointed his wife as his sole executrix and made over to her his whole estate as her absolute property.

A question having arisen in regard to the share of the residue of the testator's estate to which Alfred T. Scott would have been entitled had he survived the date when the youngest of the testator's children attained majority, a special case was presented to which the testator's testamentary trustees were the first parties; Alfred T. Scott's widow the second party; his child the third party; and the testator's surviving thirteen children and the child of the daughter who predeceased him the fourth parties.

In this case the Court found, in answer to the first two questions therein submitted, that the vesting of the residuary bequest to the testator's children in his trust-disposition and settlement was suspended till his youngest child attained majority; that Alfred T. Scott therefore did not acquire a vested right in any portion thereof; that his child, the third party, was entitled to the share which he would have taken had he survived; and that his widow, the second party, was entitled, as his executrix, to his one-tenth share of the provision made by the testator in his marriage-contract to the children of his second marriage.

The third question of law in the case (with which alone this report deals) was:—"Does the said Alfred Thomas Scott's tenth share of the marriage provision in question fall to be paid exclusively from the share of residue to which the third party is entitled; or, is the same payable from the general estate of the said James Scott?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 12th December 1912.

Argued for the third party;—The amount of the share of the marriage-contract provision payable to the second party fell to be charged against the whole of the residue and not against the share to which the third party was entitled. This was the result on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement, for the trustees were directed to pay the testator's debts in the first place. The marriage-contract provision was a debt and was included in this direction. What was bequeathed to the children was the remainder of the estate after meeting all these debts; and two-thirds of the estate so remaining fell to be paid in equal shares to the surviving children of the second marriage and the third party. It was admitted that if the third party's father had acquired a vested right in a share of the residue, he could not have claimed that share and also a share of the marriage-contract provision. But this was so only because the principle of approbate and reprobate would then have applied. That principle was, however, not applicable to the present circumstances, for the condition of its application was that two or more rights or claims were vested in one person so that he had power to choose which he would enforce.¹ Here neither the second nor the third party could make more than one claim and they could exercise no option. The second party claimed as representing her husband. The third party on the other hand was a conditional institute. His right was quite independent of his father's right under the trust-disposition and settlement, and there was no ground in law or equity for holding that conditions annexed to the bequest to the father were by implication attached to the bequest to the third party.² The case of *Fisher v. Dixon*³ was discussed in McLaren on Wills and Succession (3rd ed.), vol. i., p. 258.

Argued for the fourth parties;—The case fell to be decided on the terms of the trust-disposition and settlement and involved no question of election. By the trust-disposition and settlement it was provided that the issue of a predeceasing child of the testator should take "the parent's place and share." These words meant that the conditions imposed on the parent were also imposed on his or her issue, and one of these conditions was that the share of residue was given in lieu of the marriage-contract provision. If, therefore, the second party's father had acquired a vested interest in a share of the residue and had also claimed his portion of the marriage-contract provision, he would have been compelled to contribute from his share of the residue the sum necessary to compensate the other residuary legatees who suffered from his claiming under the marriage-contract,⁴ and the second party was placed under the same obligation by the terms of the trust-disposition and settlement. The case of *Rose*⁵ was distinguishable, for the question there arose in regard to a debt. Nor was *Fisher v. Dixon*³ in point, for there (1) the words "parent's place and share" did not occur in the settlement, and (2) separate estates were given to the parent and his issue, the former being given only the life interest while the issue were entitled to the fee; while here the same estate, a fee, was given to both parent and issue.⁶

At advising on 21st December 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—[After dealing with the first and second questions]—The third question is whether Alfred Scott's share of the marriage-contract fund, of which his executrix stands in right, falls to be paid exclusively from the share of residue to which his child is entitled, or from the

¹ Hewitt's Trustees v. Lawson, (1891) 18 R. 793, at pp. 798 and 804; Douglas's Trustees v. Douglas, (1862) 24 D. 1191, at pp. 1205 and 1207; Story's Equity Jurisprudence (2nd ed.), sec. 1075.

² Rose v. Rogers, (1870) 39 L. J. (Ch.) 791; Hewitt v. Jardine, (1872) L. R. 14 Eq. 58.

³ (1833) 6 W. & S. 431.

⁴ Gray's Trustees v. Gray, 1907 S. C. 54.

⁵ 39 L. J. (Ch.) 791.

⁶ Reference was also made to Jack v. Marshall, (1879) 6 R. 543; Snody's Trustees v. Gibson's Trustees, (1883) 10 R. 599; Sinclair's Trustees v. Borison, (1852) 15 D. 212, at p. 216.

Dec. 21, 1912. general estate of Mr James Scott. A point is thus raised which requires more careful consideration. I am not aware of any decision bearing directly upon it, but my opinion is that the view presented in the first alternative branch of the question is the correct one. Alfred Scott, having survived his father, might have claimed his share of the marriage-contract funds; but he could not, if he had survived the period of vesting, have claimed, in addition to that, the full amount of his conventional provisions under the settlement. I think we must hold, as matter of construction, that Mr Scott did not intend or contemplate that the share of the marriage-contract fund effeiring to any one of his children should be paid, and that the issue of such child should, over and above, receive the full share of residue destined to his father under this settlement. The issue of a child predeceasing the period of vesting is to take "the parent's place and share." It was argued that the "debts" which form a first charge upon the trustor's estate before "residue" can be ascertained must be taken to include any share of the marriage-contract fund which was claimed and had to be paid; and therefore any share paid to Alfred Scott, or to anyone in his right, must be deducted from the general estate before shares of residue are struck. I do not think this argument can avail the grandchild. Alfred Scott's share of the marriage-contract fund cannot form a proper debt of the trustor's estate, consistently with a claim by him (or by his child, as taking his place) to his full share in the residue. The only condition on which the child can claim this share of residue is that his father's share of the marriage-contract provision should be paid from some other source than the trustor's general estate—that is, it must be paid out of the child's own share of residue. The child has no separate and independent right apart from his own father, but merely a right of representation to take his "parent's place and share." I am therefore for answering the first branch of question three in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

LORD SALVESSEN.—[After dealing with the first and second questions]—The third question raises a more difficult and to some extent a novel point, namely, whether the share of the testator's estate which is payable to the executrix of Alfred Thomas Scott falls to be met out of the general estate or from the share of residue to which the third party is entitled. The argument for the third party was that this was a debt which fell to be deducted from the general estate before the residue was ascertained, with the result that the executrix and child of Alfred Thomas Scott would together receive a larger share of the testator's estate than any of the other children of the second marriage.

It may be conceded that the testator did not contemplate such a result, but this by itself is not conclusive. In the case of Fisher v. Dixon,¹ where a father had bequeathed a provision to his daughter in life and to her children in fee, declaring that the provision should be in full of all that his daughter could claim from the estate, it was decided that the right of the children to the fee was not affected by the daughter repudiating the provision and betaking herself to her legal claims. The ground of the Dec. 21, 1912. decision as expressed by Lord Fullerton was that the deed created two distinct and independent rights, and that the fee in favour of the children could not be affected by the act of their mother the liferenter. In the present case there is only one right conferred by the settlement on the testator's children, to wit, a right to share in the residue of his estate contingently on the child surviving the period of distribution. Each child had, however, a vested right under the marriage-contract in a smaller share of the testator's estate; but this right would have merged in the larger provision which each child would take who survived the period of distribution. If, therefore, Alfred Thomas Scott had deliberately elected to take the marriage-contract provision, he could only have claimed the benefit conferred upon him by the testator if he survived the period of vesting, on the footing of equitably compensating the estate for the loss it had thereby suffered—Gray's Trustees.¹ In my opinion the other residuary legatees cannot be put in a worse position by Alfred Thomas Scott's executrix claiming the provision which had vested in him than they would be if the same provision had actually been paid to himself. This, I think, sufficiently appears from the language of the settlement. In the first place, I reject the argument that the claims of children under the marriage-contract are to be included in the "just and lawful debts," &c., which fall to be deducted before the residue is ascertained. The children of the second marriage are under the contract no doubt, as it has often been expressed, "creditors amongst heirs," but they are not creditors in the ordinary sense; and I think it may safely be inferred that a testator who gave his children by his settlement much larger provisions than they were entitled to under the marriage-contract did not contemplate that their possible claims under the marriage-contract were to be provided for under the first purpose of his settlement. But, further, the residue clause expressly provides that the lawful issue of a child who predeceases is to take his parent's place and share. Now, the third party here would be getting more than his parent's share if his contention were well founded, because the parent himself could not claim his full share of the residue in addition to his share of the marriage-contract provision. On these grounds I am for answering the first alternative of the third question in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

¹ 6 W. & S. 431.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT answered the first alternative of the third question in the affirmative and the second alternative in the negative.

MORTON, SMART, MACDONALD, & PROSSER, W.S.—M. J. BROWN, SON, & Co., S.S.C.— DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 1907 S. C. 54.

No. 64. MRS ANNIE CORNER TAIT OR CUMMING, Complainer (Reclaiming).—
J. R. Christie.

Jan. 7, 1913.

JOHN MITCHELL HENDRY AND ANOTHER, Respondents (Respondents).—Lippe.

Cumming v.
Hendry.

Process—Reclaiming note—Competency—Note of suspension—Offer of caution—Note passed on caution—Appeal on contention that note should be passed without caution—Personal bar.

The complainer in a note of suspension pleaded that the note should be passed without caution or consignment, but subsequently amended the note by adding an offer to find caution "if your Lordships shall so appoint." The Lord Ordinary then passed the note "on caution as offered." Held that the complainer was not barred by the offer of caution from reclaiming for the purpose of maintaining that the note should have been passed without caution.

Bill-Chamber. MRS ANNIE CORNER TAIT OR CUMMING brought a note of suspension 2d Division. against John Mitchell Hendry and Andrew Hendry junior, for the Lord Hunter. suspension of a charge upon an extract registered bond and disposition in security.

In the note it was stated, inter alia;—"That the complainer considers that in the whole circumstances of the case she is entitled to have this note passed without caution or consignment."

At the hearing in the Bill Chamber the complainer asked leave to amend this part of the note by adding the words printed in italics, so that it should read:—"That the complainer is prepared, if your Lordships shall so appoint, to find caution, but she considers that in the whole circumstances of the case she is entitled to have this note passed without caution or consignment."

On 18th December 1912 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Hunter) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows the note to be amended to the effect of offering caution; and this having been done, on caution as offered, passes the note."

The complainer reclaimed against this interlocutor in so far as it ordained her to find caution. On the case appearing in the Single Bills of the Second Division on 7th January 1913, the respondents objected to the competency of the reclaiming note.

Argued for the respondents;—The complainer had withdrawn her original objection to finding caution by amending the note so as to offer caution. The note had been passed on her motion in respect of that offer, and she was not entitled to reopen the question by means of a reclaiming note.

Argued for the complainer;—By the amendment the complainer had not abandoned the contention that the note should be passed without caution, and she was entitled to maintain that contention on a reclaiming note.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this reclaiming note cannot be held incompetent. Although the complainer amended her note of suspension to the effect of offering caution, she did not give up her contention that the note should be passed without caution, so as to preclude her from bringing that question before this Court by a reclaiming note.

¹ Mackay's Manual of Practice, p. 429.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur.

Jan. 7, 1913.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I am of the same opinion. The complainer's offer of caution was a conditional one. She maintained before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills that she was entitled to have the note passed without caution, and nothing took place in the course of the proceedings in the Bill Chamber, so far as was explained to us at the bar, to prevent her from now insisting in that contention before this Court.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT appointed the cause to be put to the Summar Roll.

GALBRAITH STEWART & REID, S.S.C.—COWAN & STEWART, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT MITCHELL SCORGIE BARCLAY, Pursuer (Appellant).—
A. M. Stuart.

No. 65.

T. S. SMITH & COMPANY AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—
R. S. Brown.

Jan. 11, 1913.

Barclay v.
Smith & Co.

Process—Removal to Court of Session for jury trial—Remit to Sheriff—Trifling nature of cause—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 30.

The pursuer, in a Sheriff Court action of damages at common law for £100 for personal injury, required the case, under section 30 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, to be remitted to the Court of Session for trial by jury. The Court refused the application and, under the powers conferred on them by that section, remitted the case back to the Sheriff, holding that it was unsuitable for jury trial in respect of the trifling nature of the injuries averred.

In October 1912 Robert Mitchell Scorgie Barclay, electrical engineer's apprentice, aged seventeen years, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against T. S. Smith & Company, motor car proprietors, and the individual partners of the firm, concluding for £100, in name of damages for personal injuries sustained through the fault of the defenders.

The pursuer averred that on 23rd September 1912, while bicycling, he was knocked down by a motor car which was being driven in a reckless manner by a servant of the defenders. (Cond. 4) "The pursuer was severely injured. He sustained numerous and severe bruises on the body, arms, and legs. The cycle, worth seven guineas, was completely destroyed, and his clothing was also destroyed. The cycle was hired from a hirer to whom the pursuer is liable for the value of said cycle, and who is insisting on his claim. He was for several weeks completely incapacitated from work, and has not yet fully recovered. The pursuer from the combined effect of his direct physical injuries, and of his being suddenly struck down in the dark by a car, the approach of which he did not hear, has sustained severe nervous shock. It is necessary for his efficiency as an engineer, and for his working at said trade with safety to himself and to his fellow-workmen, that his nervous system should be in good condition. The accident will probably have permanent effect on his nervous system and may result in his earning capacity being permanently diminished. In the course of his work as an engineer it is necessary, in order to allow him to get home for meals, to use a

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

Jan. 11, 1913. cycle and ride through congested traffic in Aberdeen. Owing to the said shock he will be unable to ride a cycle where there is traffic, and he will be handicapped in carrying on his said work."

Barclay v.
Smith & Co.

The defenders on record admitted fault and tendered £8 as compensation for the injuries, and £2, 2s. of expenses, and undertook to relieve the pursuer of any claim for damage to the bicycle.

On 11th December 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Laing) allowed a proof.

On 13th December 1912 the pursuer required the case to be remitted to the Court of Session for trial by jury.*

The case appeared in the Single Bills of the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 11th January 1913, when the defenders moved that the case be remitted to the Sheriff; and argued;—The only point at issue was the amount of damages. Upon the pursuer's own averments, his injuries were very slight, and it was quite unsuitable that the case should be tried before a jury merely for the purpose of assessing the trifling compensation to which he was entitled. In M'Nab v. Pyfe,¹ the averments of injury were stronger, and yet the appeal for jury trial was refused. It was further to be noted that at the date of that case the discretionary power of the Court to remit to the Sheriff, under section 40 of the Judicature Act, 1825,² and section 73 of the Court of Session Act, 1868,³ was less explicit than it was under the present law.⁴

Argued for the pursuer;—The application for a jury trial should be granted as it was in the case of Duffy v. Young.⁵ The power of the Court was neither diminished nor increased by section 30 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, which was merely declaratory of the prior law. The only change was that the standard of value was raised from £40 to £50. Otherwise the principles enunciated in *Sharples v. Yuill & Company*⁶ still held good. On an application of these principles the pursuer was entitled to trial by jury, for it was impossible to say that a jury could not reasonably award him £50 in name of damages.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Since 1907 the law has been that when a cause is removed from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session for jury trial, "the Court of Session shall, if it thinks the case unsuitable for jury trial, have power to remit the case back to the Sheriff, or to remit it to a Lord Ordinary, or to send it for proof before a Judge of the Division before whom the cause depends."⁴ I think the purpose is very plain, namely, to save

* The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), enacts:—Sec. 30. "In causes originating in the Sheriff Court . . . where the claim is in amount or value above fifty pounds, and an order has been pronounced allowing proof . . . it shall, within six days thereafter, be competent to either of the parties, who may conceive that the cause ought to be tried by jury, to require the cause to be remitted to the Court of Session for that purpose, where it shall be so tried: Provided, however, that the Court of Session shall, if it thinks the case unsuitable for jury trial, have power to remit the case back to the Sheriff, or to remit it to a Lord Ordinary, or to send it for proof before a Judge of the Division before whom the cause depends."

¹ (1904) 6 F. 925.

² 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120.

³ 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100.

⁴ Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 30.

⁵ (1904) 7 F. 30.

⁶ (1905) 7 F. 657.

the enormous expense incurred in the trial by jury of very small cases, Jan. 11, 1913. especially where witnesses have to be brought from a long distance. But ^{Barclay v. Smith & Co.} whatever was the intention of the Legislature, the statute gives us an absolute discretion in the matter. Even under the law as it stood prior to Lord Justice-1907, the Court was of opinion that it had such a discretion, but the Act of Olerk. 1907 has made this quite clear.

In the present case I think we should exercise our discretion by remitting the case back to the Sheriff. The circumstances in the case of M'Nab v. Fyfe,¹ where jury trial was refused, were very similar. In that case, as in this, the pursuer complained of severe bruises and of nervous shock. The Court, having only the power conferred on it by the law prior to 1907, refused the appeal, the Lord President saying,—“On the face of the record this is a small case, and more suitable for proof in the Sheriff Court than for jury trial in the Court of Session. Proceeding upon that view we have remitted other similar cases to the Sheriff Court for proof. I am of opinion that this would be the proper course to follow in the present case.” I do not think there is any substantial difference between that case and the one we are dealing with now. I think this is a typical case for remitting to the Sheriff, and I would have thought this apart from the case of M'Nab,¹ though that decision confirms me in my opinion. I have acted as counsel in and have tried hundreds of jury cases, and I have seen many cases where the expenses have been piled up and where the pursuer was a person of no substance, so that even though the defender was successful in obtaining a verdict, he was in the end an absolute loser. This leads to many defenders paying a substantial sum where there is no true case against them, rather than run the risk of being subjected to heavy loss, even if successful. I hold that in this case we should exercise our discretion under the Act of 1907, and remit it to the Sheriff for proof.

LORD DUNDAS.—I quite agree. The question to which the Court has to address itself is whether it thinks this case unsuitable for jury trial; and, looking to its general aspect as disclosed on the pursuer's record, I am of opinion that it is unsuitable. I understand that there has been no case decided under section 30 of the Act of 1907; but if authority were needed, I agree that the case of M'Nab,¹ decided at a time when the statutory power of the Court was less explicit than it is now, is a fortiori of the present.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. In this case there are four points which weigh with me. (1) There is no averment of any serious physical injury. (2) There is no averment of any permanent injury other than the very guarded statement in Cond. 4 that the accident will “probably” have a permanent effect on the pursuer's nervous system, and “may” result in his earning capacity being permanently diminished. (3) There is no averment that medical attendance was made necessary by the accident. (4) The witnesses are all in Aberdeen, and much additional expense would be incurred by bringing them here if the case were tried before a jury. I agree that the views expressed in *M'Nab*¹ are applicable in this case, and,

Jan. 11, 1913. indeed, in that case the averments of injury were even stronger than they are here.
 Barclay v.
 Smith & Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the pursuer's application for a remit, dated 13th December 1912, refuse the application, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed in the cause."

BALFOUR & MANSON, S.S.C.—ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 66.

DAVID MACBETH MOIR MILLIGAN AND OTHERS (John Hannay's Trustees), First Parties.—R. S. Brown.

Jan. 15, 1913.

PETER HANNAY, Second Party.—R. S. Brown.

Hannay's
 Trustees v.
 Graham.

MISS JEMIMA GRAHAM (Elizabeth Hannay's Executrix), Third Party.
 —C. H. Brown.

Succession — Destination to testator's "heirs in mobilibus" — Period at which heirs ascertained — Object of gift.

A testator by his testamentary settlement directed his trustees to hold a portion of the residue of his estate in equal shares for his son and daughter in liferent, and for their issue respectively in fee, vesting in the issue being suspended till their parent's death. It was declared that, if either child died without leaving issue, the share liferented by him or her should fall to the testator's "heirs in mobilibus," and that neither of the testator's children should "have any vested right in the capital." Both of the testator's children survived him, and thereafter the daughter died without issue, but leaving a will.

Held (diss. Lord Salvesen) that the testator's heirs in mobilibus fell to be ascertained at his death and not at the death of the daughter, and accordingly that the share liferented by the daughter fell to be divided equally between the son and the daughter's executor.

Muirhead's Trustees v. Torrie, supra, p. 85, distinguished.

2D DIVISION. JOHN HANNAY, sometime factor to the Earl of Fife, died in 1901 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. He was survived by his wife, who died in 1904; by a daughter, Elizabeth H. C. Hannay, who died unmarried in 1911, leaving a settlement in favour of Miss Jemima Graham as sole executrix; and by a son, Peter Hannay.

By his trust-disposition and settlement the testator conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and, as to the residue thereof, directed them to pay over one-half to his wife for her absolute use, and to hold the other half and pay her during her life the income to be derived from it. With reference to the latter half of the residue the testator (after giving certain directions as to his estate of Cairnhill and as to a sum of money specially destined) provided as to the "balance" as follows:—"My trustees, on the death of my wife, shall hold and invest in their own names one half of said balance and pay the revenue thereof to my son during his lifetime, and shall hold and invest the other half of said balance and pay the revenue thereof to my daughter during her lifetime: And neither of my children shall have any vested right in the capital of said balance." The half liferented by the son was to fall to his children on his death, vesting being postponed till that event, and if there were no issue alive at the period of vesting, the share was to fall to the testator's heirs in mobilibus. As to the half liferented by the daughter the testator directed as follows:—"And Jan. 15, 1913. the capital of said half of balance of residue to be liferented by my daughter shall on her death vest in, and be payable to, her issue in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as are provided with regard to the fee of Cairnhill, and if she die without issue, or if all her issue predecease the term of vesting, the fee of said one-half share of the balance of residue shall fall to my heirs in mobilibus." The directions as to Cairnhill were that the trustees, on the death of the testator's wife, were to hold it for his daughter in liferent, and that on her death, leaving issue, the fee was to "fall to her children equally among them, but in that event vesting shall not take place in such children unless and until they shall at or subsequent to their mother's death have attained the age of twenty-five years, or if females have attained that age or been married," with a destination-over to the issue of predeceasers, whom failing to the survivors. Hannay's Trustees v. Graham.

A question having arisen on the daughter's death, without issue, as to the disposal of the share of residue liferented by her, a special case was presented, to which the testator's testamentary trustees were the first parties; his son, Peter Hannay, the second party; and Miss Graham (Elizabeth Hannay's executrix), the third party.

The questions of law were, inter alia:—" (2) Do the testator's heirs in in mobilibus fall to be ascertained as at his own death? or (3) Do they fall to be ascertained as at the death of Miss Hannay?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 6th and 10th December 1912.

At the hearing counsel for the second party maintained that the testator's heirs were to be ascertained at the death of Elizabeth Hannay, and cited Young v. Robertson.¹ For the third party it was argued that these heirs were to be ascertained at the testator's death,² and that Elizabeth Hannay had a vested right as one of these heirs, subject only to defeasance in the event (which had not occurred) of her leaving issue who acquired a vested interest under the provision in their favour.³

At advising on 15th January 1913,—

LOD DUNDAS.—[After dealing with the first question]—The second and third questions relate to the disposal of the balance of the fee of the one-half share of the half of Mr Hannay's residue which was liferented by his daughter. The succession to it opened upon her death to the testator's heirs in in mobilibus. We have to decide whether these heirs are to be ascertained as at his own death, or as at that of his daughter.

This question is attended with considerable difficulty, and (though the sum here at stake seems to be a very small one) was, I think, worthy of a fuller and more careful argument than that to which we listened; but I have come to the conclusion that the former of the alternative views suggested is the correct one. The phrase "heirs in mobilibus," which in our

¹ (1862) 4 Macq. 314.

² Gregory's Trustees v. Alison, (1889) 16 R. (H. L.) 10, per Lord Watson, at p. 14.

³ Steel's Trustees v. Steel, (1888) 16 R. 204, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 208; Coulson's Trustees v. Coulson's Trustees, 1911 S. C. 881; Johnston's Trustees v. Dewar, 1911 S. C. 722.

Jan. 15, 1918. older law was equivalent to next of kin, has acquired a specific and different meaning since the passing of the Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855¹ (see *Young's Trustees v. James*²; *Gregory's Trustees v. Alison*³). It means the class of heirs who would be entitled under that Act to succeed to the moveable estate of one who died intestate. Now, in *Mortimore v. Mortimore*⁴ the House of Lords, following Bullock v. Downes,⁵ decided that where a will destined money to be paid on failure of certain issue to "such person or persons as will then be entitled to receive the same as my next of kin under the statute for the distribution of intestates' estates," the class of "next of kin" described the persons who filled that character at the time of the death of the testator. The Lord Chancellor (Cairns) said, in allusion to the words above quoted: "That is a class which, according to the statute, must be ascertained at the death of the testator; and, as I took the liberty to mention during the argument, it is not an artificial class of next of kin to be created. The only other words are 'that the same be paid to such person or persons as will then be entitled to receive the same.' Now, I am quite willing to look at the word 'then' as if it meant at the expiration of the preceding limitation, but then what does this amount to? Why, this. At the expiration of the preceding limitation you are to find out the hands into which you are to pay the money, but you must do that by first ascertaining who were his next of kin at the time of his death." In *Johnston's Trustees v. Dewar*⁶ the Court had to consider the period at which a testator's "nearest in kin" should be ascertained, and decided upon a construction of the will that his "nearest in kin" should be ascertained, not at his death, but at a later period. Lord Kinneir, in whose opinion Lord Mackenzie and I concurred, expressed the view that "There can be no presumption founded upon what is supposed to be the primary meaning of these words; because the words are descriptive of a class; they apply equally to the class of persons who answer the description of 'nearest in kin' at one time, and to those who answer that description at another time. The body of a man's nearest relations must necessarily vary from time to time with the birth of new relations and the death of old ones; and the mere words 'nearest of kin' to my mind convey no significance whatever except that of propinquity of blood at whatever time it is necessary to look for the persons who answer the description." But his Lordship went on to point out the distinction between the case before him and such cases as Mortimore,⁴ and said: "Now, if the words next of kin in our law implied any reference to a right of succession at all, I think the case of *Mortimore v. Mortimore*⁴ would be applicable; because, although the words are not qualified by an express reference to the statute, if the testator means that the people who are to take benefit by his will are the people who take under the law of intestate succession, they, according to the law, must be fixed at the date of his death when his right passed by inheritance to them. But the words 'nearest in kin' have no such significance at all; on the

¹ 18 Vict. cap. 23.

² 16 R. (H. L.) 10, per Lord Watson, at p. 13.

³ (1879) 4 App. Cas. 448, affg. 7 Ch. D. 322.

⁴ (1860) 9 H. L. C. 1.

⁵ (1880) 8 R. 242.

⁶ 1911 S. C. 722.

contrary, they are specially distinguished by the statute which regulates moveable succession in Scotland from heirs in mobilibus." It seems to me that the present question is precisely covered by the words just quoted. I think the heirs in mobilibus must be found as at the testator's own death, and not at any later period.

Jan. 15, 1913.
Hannay's
Trustees v.
Graham.

Lord Dundas.

The presumption to that effect is a very strong one. It may, of course, like other presumptions, be redargued, if a contrary intention is expressed or can be held upon sufficient grounds to be implied. If a testator appointed his heirs in mobilibus to be his ultimate destinees, and added words indicating that he meant those persons who would answer that description if his death had happened at the time when the ultimate destination should come into operation, the legal presumption would be overcome by the plain language of the instrument. And, short of such express declaration, a contrary intention might well be inferred, as matter of implication, from the tenor of the deed as a whole. A very recent example of this may be found in *Muirhead's Trustees v. Torrie*¹ where the First Division reversed the decision of the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington); but the case, in every way an extremely narrow and special one, is not, I think, likely to form a precedent in the future, and seems to me to have no application here. It is said that, in the present case, a contrary intention is sufficiently evidenced by the clause, already quoted, that "neither of my children shall have any vested right in the capital of said balance" of residue. I do not think this is so. I read these words of exclusion as importing no more than that the original gift by the testator to his children of the capital of the balance of this share of his residue was one of life interest merely, and not of fee, to the donees; and I cannot see how this should prevent the latter from coming to share as members of the class, or constituting the class—heirs in mobilibus—to whom the fee is destined on the failure of the prior purposes (see Bullock v. Downes,² per Lord Campbell, L. C., at p. 13, and Lord Cranworth, at p. 18). The anomaly, if anomaly there be, in the result I arrive at, would not be removed, if the contrary view were affirmed; for the testator's son, Peter Hannay, would, in that event, as I read the settlement, receive the whole of the share of residue in question. I can find in Mr Hannay's trust-disposition nothing to rebut the ordinary legal presumption as inferring a contrary intention. I do not proceed upon the theory suggested at the discussion that the fee in question vested a morte testatoris in his children, as his heirs in mobilibus at his death, subject to defeasance, further than to this extent that, as everyone knows, a man's heirs-at-law, in heritage or in moveables, must take by inheritance so far as they are not ousted or defeated by his testamentary provisions. I read Mr Hannay's settlement as meaning that, having made every provision he thought it necessary to make, he said, in effect, "If and when these fail, let the law distribute the property." It seems to me that he intended, if the expressed purposes of his settlement proved ineffectual, to leave the balance of residue to be dealt with as if he had made no further disposal of it. His children, though in form they take the balance under the provisions of the deed, take it truly in their capacity of heirs in intestacy.

¹ Supra, p. 85.

² 9 H. L. C. 1.

Jan. 15, 1913. I am therefore for answering the second question in the affirmative, and the third in the negative.

Hannay's
Trustees v.
Graham.

LORD SALVESSEN.—[After dealing with the first question]—The second question, while it is stated in general terms, has special reference to a one-half share of half the residue of John Hannay's estate. His trustees were directed to hold and invest this share, and to pay the revenue thereof to his daughter, Elizabeth Hannay, during her lifetime. In the event of her dying without issue the fee was to fall to the testator's heirs in mobilibus. At what point of time are these heirs to be ascertained? For the third party it was said that the residue must be ascertained as at the death of the testator, and that, as Miss Hannay was herself one of the heirs in mobilibus at that time, her estate falls to be enriched by one-half of the capital of the half share liferented by her. The other view maintained by the second party is that the heirs in mobilibus fall to be ascertained as at the death of Miss Hannay. I am of opinion that this latter view is the sound one. The testator expressly declared that neither of his children should have any vested right in the capital of the balance of his estate. Are we to find, notwithstanding this direction, that the fee vested in these children to the extent of one-half of the provision destined to each? I am unable to assent to this view. The leading case of *Young v. Robertson*¹ makes it clear that the presumption in favour of vesting a morte may be overcome by evidence of a contrary intention. I find such evidence here in the express declaration as to vesting already referred to. In the case of *Johnston's Trustees v. Dewar*² the Court decided in favour of the date of distribution as being the date of vesting although there was no declaration, as in the present case, that vesting should not take place in the person of the liferenter. No doubt the ultimate beneficiaries in that case were the testator's "nearest in kin" and not his heirs in mobilibus, but it is just as easy to ascertain the testator's heirs in mobilibus at some time subsequent to his death as it is to ascertain his nearest in kin.

The facts of the present case appear to me to be stronger than those which came under the consideration of the First Division in Muirhead's Trustees v. Torrie.³ In that case there was no express declaration that the fund was not to vest until the expiry of the liferent, although on other grounds it was held not to do so. In other respects the circumstances were not unlike the present, except that the ultimate destination was to the heirs and executors whomsoever of Mrs Muirhead, and that it occurred in a marriage-contract and not in a testamentary settlement. Both these differences appear to me to be immaterial. "Heirs and executors whomsoever" is just an equivalent expression for heirs in mobilibus when the estate happens to be wholly moveable. Lord Kinnear, who gave the leading opinion, held that the question was one of intention, and that the grantor did not intend in the event which happened, namely, that she had a child who predeceased the liferenter, that her money should go to the child's heirs because the child was her heir and executor at the time when she died, but that she intended it to go to her own heirs in the event of failure of children. It is plain that the testator here contemplated that the two children, to each of whom Jan. 15, 1913. he gave a half of the residue of his estate in liferent, would survive him, Hannay's and of course he must be taken to have known that at his death they would Trustees v. Graham. be his heirs in mobilibus. Suppose he had only one child and had given the whole residue in liferent to that one, and had directed that on the child's Lord Salvesen. death without issue the funds should go to his own heirs in mobilibus, and at the same time had excluded the child from taking any vested interest in the fund,—is it possible to hold that his intention was that the child nevertheless should take such an interest (subject only to defeasance in the event of his having issue) and might divert it to strangers by a mortis causa deed? I confess that I cannot understand such a view. There is here no question of intestacy, in which case it sometimes happens that the fund goes to a testator's heirs through the operation of law, although he had plainly indicated that he did not desire it to do so. That result only happens where the testator has failed to dispose of the fund. Here he has not failed to do so, but has provided for the very circumstance which has occurred. If then, as is shown by the cases of *Johnston*¹ and Muirhead,² words descriptive of a class usually ascertained at a testator's death may, in virtue of the presumed intention of the testator, be held to refer to a later period when the gift actually takes effect, I do not think that, apart from express declaration, any case is likely to occur where the intention could be more clearly inferred than in the present. I am accordingly of opinion that the second question falls to be answered in the negative and the third in the affirmative.

¹ 4 Macq. 314.

² 1911 S. C. 722.

³ Supra, p. 85.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur in the result arrived at by Lord Dundas. On the second point involved in the second and third questions my opinion has varied. I still feel that there is great force in the views expressed by Lord Salvesen founded on the clause "Neither of my said children shall have any vested right in the capital of said balance," but on the whole, although with hesitation, I am not prepared to differ from the result arrived at by Lord Dundas, in which I understand your Lordship in the chair concurs.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred with Lord Dundas.

THE COURT answered the second question in the affirmative and the third in the negative.

MARTIN, MILLIGAN, & MACDONALD, W.S.—MACKINTOSH & BOYD, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 1911 S. C. 722.

² Supra, p. 85.

No. 67.

DAVID MACBETH MOIR MILLIGAN AND ANOTHER (Mrs Hannay's Trustees), First Parties.—R. S. Brown.

Jan. 15, 1913.

MRS LAURA ESTHER PARKER OR KEITH AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—*A. M. Mackay.*Hannay's
Trustees v.
Keith.MISS JEMIMA GRAHAM (Miss Hannay's Executrix), Third Party.—*C. H. Brown.*PETER HANNAY, Fourth Party.—*A. R. Brown.*JOHN HENRY FITZPATRICK HANNAY AND OTHERS, Fifth Parties.—R. S. Brown.Succession—Testament—Re-execution of prior will—Effect on validity of intervening codicil.Succession—Testament—Clause of revocation—Prior testamentary writing—Proof—Competency of extrinsic evidence to negative revocation of prior writing.

A testatrix by her will, dated 13th January 1904, inter alia directed her trustees to pay the income of £5000 to her daughter, and on her daughter's death to pay £500 thereof to a granddaughter, "to pay a further sum of £1500 thereof in the manner to be afterwards directed by me in any writing or writings to be hereafter executed by me," and to pay the remainder, £3000, to certain grandchildren. The will contained a clause revoking "all previous testamentary writings." The testatrix left no writing dated after 13th January 1904 dealing with the sum of £1500, but there was found in her repositories after her death a holograph document dated 21st December 1903, by which she bequeathed the £1500 to certain beneficiaries. The will of 13th January 1904 was in its main provisions the same as a previous will executed by her on 16th December 1903, but contained certain alterations, one of them being the provision with regard to the sum of £1500 which was not contained in the previous will.

Circumstances in which held (1) that the will of 13th January was not a mere re-execution of the will of 16th December, (2) that extrinsic evidence (consisting chiefly of correspondence between the testatrix and her law-agents) was not competent for the purpose of establishing that she intended, notwithstanding the clause of revocation in the will of later date, that the document of 21st December should form part of her testamentary writings, and accordingly (3) that the document of 21st December, having been revoked by the will of 13th January, was inoperative as a testamentary writing.

Dalglisch's Trustees v. Crum, (1891) 19 R. 170, and Tait's Trustees v. Chiene, 1911 S. C. 743, distinguished.

2D DIVISION. MRS ELIZA FARQUHARSON MILNE OR HANNAY, who resided at Southville, Dollar, died on 26th October 1904, and on 23rd January 1912 a special case was presented to the Court to determine questions arising out of her testamentary writings.

Mrs Hannay left a trust-disposition and settlement of her whole estate, dated 13th January 1904. The fourth purpose thereof provided:—"I direct my trustees, as soon as convenient after my death, to set aside and invest in their own names the sum of Five thousand pounds sterling, and to pay to my daughter, the said Elizabeth Harriet Caroline Hannay, during her lifetime, the free annual income thereof for her alimentary support, declaring however that my daughter shall have no vested right in the fee of said Five thousand pounds, and in the event . . . of my daughter dying unmarried, . . . then I direct my trustees on my daughter's death, and out of said sum of Five thousand pounds, to pay a sum of Five hundred pounds thereof, as representing the amount of a legacy which I received from my great-grandfather, the Reverend Robert Farquharson of Allargue, to my granddaughter, Millicent Isabel Bruce Hannay, absolutely, and to pay a further sum of One thousand five hundred pounds thereof, in the manner to be afterwards directed by me in any writing or writings to be hereafter executed by me, and that, too, however informal said writings may be, so long as they are admittedly under my hand; and the remainder of said sum of £5000, videlicet, Three thousand pounds, I direct my trustees to pay to the children of my son Peter equally among them” The will also contained this clause:—“And I revoke all previous testamentary writings.”

Hannay's
Trustees v.
Keith.

Mrs Hannay was survived by her only son, Peter Hannay, and by her only daughter, Miss Elizabeth Harriet Caroline Hannay, who died unmarried in 1911. Mrs Hannay did not leave any writing dated after 13th January 1904 dealing with the sum of £1500 mentioned in the fourth purpose of her will, but in her repositories a holograph pencil document was found after her death in these terms:—“In the event of my daughter's leaving no descendant, £1500, Fifteen hundred pounds stg. I bequeath to the family of the late William Keith of Ceylon, £200 of which would be for his widow Mrs Laura Keith.

E. F. HANNAY,

“Southville, Dollar, Scotland,

“December 21st, 1903.”

After setting forth the foregoing facts, the special case further stated:—

“7. A draft of Mrs Hannay's trust-disposition and settlement was prepared by her law-agents in July 1903, and was then sent to her for consideration and approval. After correspondence as to its terms, an engrossment of the draft as then adjusted was executed by Mrs Hannay on 16th December 1903. In returning the signed engrossment to her agents on 16th December 1903 Mrs Hannay expressed her desire to make certain alterations on the settlement, and requested her agents to prepare a codicil for the purpose of giving effect to these. One of the alterations desired by her was a reservation of right to her to bequeath £1500 out of the sum of £5000 mentioned in the fourth purpose otherwise than to her son or his family. Mrs Hannay's agents advised her that it would be preferable that the settlement should be altered to give effect to her wishes and be re-executed by her. Said advice was given prior to 21st December 1903, but final instructions to the agents for a new settlement embodying said alterations were not given till 29th December 1903, and the settlement as so altered was executed by her on 13th January 1904. The trust-disposition and settlement as executed by Mrs Hannay on 16th December 1903 is not now available for production, having been either destroyed or mislaid, but the agents who prepared it are able to state that it contained a clause of revocation in the same terms as that quoted [from the will of 13th January].* There are printed in

* From the correspondence it appeared that the earlier settlement differed from the later in at least the following respects:—(1) The reservation of £1500 was omitted from the earlier settlement, £4500 being destined to Peter Hannay and his children instead of £3000; (2) the fee of a share of residue given by the earlier settlement to the issue of the present marriage of Peter Hannay was given by the later to his lawful children; and (3) the

Jan. 15, 1913. the appendix hereto certain letters passing between Mrs Hannay and her agents between the dates 4th December 1903 and 14th January 1904, which print is accepted by all the parties hereto as correct, and as giving a true and sufficient purview of the purport of the correspondence so far as bearing on the questions at issue, and is held to form part of this case.*

Hannay's
Trustees v.
Keith.

"8. After Mrs Hannay's decease there was also discovered in her said repositories a document, holograph of Mrs Hannay, in the form of a letter purporting to be addressed to her law-agent, and signed by her. The terms of the said document are set out in the appendix hereto, and held to form part of this case.† The facts stated in this and the two immediately preceding articles, and the letters printed in appendix referred to in the immediately preceding article, are admitted by the parties under reservation of all questions as to their relevancy and the competency of referring to them in determining the questions submitted in the case.

"10. The question has now arisen whether the said holograph writing by Mrs Hannay, dated 21st December 1903, and quoted above, is operative and effectual to dispose of the sum of £1500 mentioned in it as therein specified." The case then proceeded to deal with other questions with which this report is not concerned.

The first parties to the case were the trustees acting under Mrs Hannay's trust-disposition and settlement. The second parties were Mrs Laura Esther Parker or Keith and the children of her husband, the deceased William Keith, and were the whole of those who were designated in and would benefit under the holograph writing of 21st December 1903 if the same were operative and effectual. The third party was the executrix acting under the settlement of Miss Elizabeth later settlement attached two conditions to two annuities given by the earlier settlement, viz., that the annuitants should be unmarried, and should not have other sufficient means.

* A summary of this correspondence is contained in the opinion of Lord Dundas, infra, p. 491.

† The document was in these terms:—

"Southville, Dollar,
December 5th, 1903.

"D. M. M. Milligan, Esquire, &c., &c., &c., of Aberdeen.

"Dear Sir,—I am much obliged for your and Mr Nicolson's kind letters with which I am favoured to-day, and I once more beg to return many thanks for the kind consent of both to act as trustees.

"It is late this Saturday, and I do not expect to dispatch this until Monday, but it has come irresistibly on my mind that, in event of my daughter's remaining unmarried, or married, leaving no family, I would leave £1500—fifteen hundred pounds—to Mrs Laura Keith's family, Ceylon, i.e., herself, for benefit of her family.

"You will kindly observe from which part of the funds I am entitled to make this bequest. . . . E. F. HANNAY.

"Not sent. I intend adding as a private codicil, to be read after my death. E. F. H."

There was also found in Mrs Hannay's repositories a document, printed in the appendix, in these terms:—

"28. 5. 1904.—Of funds absolutely mine, I leave the sum of Fifty pounds Stg., £50 to Eliza Keith, Ceylon, whom failing to her mother, Mrs Laura Keith, widow of Mr William Keith—as also £250—the sum of Two hundred and fifty pounds to said Mrs Laura Keith. E. F. HANNAY."

Harriet Caroline Hannay, Mrs Hannay's daughter. The fourth party Jan. 15, 1913. was Peter Hannay, Mrs Hannay's son; and the fifth parties were his children. Hannay's Trustees v.
Keith.

With reference to the question with which this report is concerned, the first, third, fourth, and fifth parties contended (1) that the holograph writing by Mrs Hannay, dated 21st December 1903, was revoked by her trust-disposition and settlement; and (2) that it did not constitute an operative direction as to the disposal of the sum of £1500 in the sense of the fourth purpose thereof. The second parties contended that the holograph writing, dated 21st December 1903, was not, in the circumstances, revoked by Mrs Hannay's trust-disposition and settlement, and that it was operative and effectual as a testamentary writing of Mrs Hannay, and that it constituted a direction to pay the sum of £1500 in the manner expressed in the holograph writing, and that in the sense of the fourth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement.

The following question of law was, inter alia, submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—" (1) Is the holograph writing of the testatrix, dated 21st December 1903, operative and effectual as a part of her final testamentary writings?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 4th, 5th, and 6th December 1912.

Argued for the second parties;—The argument in favour of the validity of the holograph writing of 21st December could be presented in two ways. (1) The will of 13th January was a mere re-attestation or republication of the will of 16th December, and in consequence it left unaffected the writing of 21st December which was a codicil to, and part of, the will of 16th December.¹ The doctrine of republication was an English doctrine, but it had been adopted into Scots law.² That the testatrix in signing the will of 13th January intended merely to re-execute the will of 16th December appeared clearly from the correspondence and the surrounding circumstances. Her own suggestion was that she should add a codicil to the will of 16th December embodying the small alterations which she desired to make, and it was her law-agents who persuaded her that the will should be rewritten. (2) Alternatively, there was extrinsic evidence to show that the testatrix, notwithstanding the terms of the January will and the clause of revocation, intended the writing of 21st December to remain part of her testamentary writings and to receive effect as such. In particular, this appeared from the letter dated 5th December, which was found in her repositories, and in which she referred to her intention to make the very codicil in question. Proof was always competent for the purpose of ascertaining what were the testamentary papers of the deceased,³ and

¹ Williams on Executors, (10th ed.) pp. 140, 147; Wade v. Nazer, (1848) 1 Rob. E. 627; Green v. Tribe, (1878) 9 Ch. D. 231; In bonis Rawlins, (1879) 48 L. J., P. & D. 64; Uphill v. Marshall, (1843) 3 Curt. 636.

² Dalglish's Trustees v. Crum, (1891) 19 R. 170; Tait's Trustees v. Chiene, 1911 S. C. 743, per Lord Johnston, at p. 761.

³ Whyte v. Hamilton, (1881) 8 R. 949, aff. (1882), 9 R. (H. L.) 53; Forsyth's Trustees v. Forsyth, (1872) 10 Macph. 616; Sprot's Trustees v. Sprot, 1909 S. C. 272; Tait's Trustees v. Chiene, 1911 S. C. 743; Lowson v. Ford, (1866) 4 Macph. 631, per Lord Cowan, at p. 636; Greenough v. Martin, (1824) 2 Add. E. R. 239.

Jan. 15, 1913.

Hannay's
Trustees v.
Keith.

generally the circumstances under which his testamentary arrangements were made.¹ The present case raised a question of probate, as distinguished from one of construction, although in Scotland both questions were dealt with by the same Court, a circumstance which was apt to lead to their confusion.² It was evident from the facts that what happened between 16th December, when the first settlement was made, and 13th January, when the last deed was executed, was all "one act of testamentary disposition,"³ and that accordingly the deed of 21st December should receive effect, even though, on a strictly literal reading of the January will, it would be inoperative.

Argued for the first, third, fourth, and fifth parties;—The writing of 21st December was inoperative. It was not "the kind of writing to which the deceased has taken his trustees expressly bound to give effect,"⁴ since it was not a writing "to be hereafter executed," but was executed before the January will was signed. Moreover it was in terms struck at by the express clause of revocation. The terms of the January will were perfectly clear and unambiguous in favour of these parties, and the argument by which the second parties sought to evade the effect of the will was fallacious in both its aspects. (1) The January will was not a republication of the December will. It was a new will, differing in several material respects, and the second parties could not point to any case, either in English or Scots law, where the republished will was not identical with the original. Republication was an English doctrine and had only been applied in Scotland in one case—Dalglisch's Trustees.⁵ In that case, besides the fact that the two wills were identical, there was the further distinction that the later will did not, as here, contain an express clause of revocation. This was a material consideration.⁶ Even in English law there was no more than a presumption that a republished will confirmed a prior codicil,⁷ and this presumption was rebutted in the present case by the revocation clause. (2) If republication were negatived, there was no room for the admission of extrinsic evidence to set up the writing of 21st December. The circumstances did not raise a question of probate, but one of construction. Probate merely determined whether the writing was testamentary in nature and form, and as to that there was no doubt in the present case.⁸ What the second parties were attempting to do was to modify by extrinsic evidence the clear and unambiguous terms of the January will, and this was contrary to

¹ Forlong v. Taylor's Executors, (1838) 3 Shaw & M'L. 177, per Lord Chancellor Cottenham, at p. 210; Dickson on Evidence, sec. 1067.

² Scott v. Seales, (1864) 2 Macph. 613, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, at p. 619; Pattison's Trustees v. University of Edinburgh, (1888) 16 R. 73, per Lord M'Laren (Lord Ordinary), at p. 75.

³ Tait's Trustees v. Chiene, 1911 S. C. 743, per Lord Johnston, at p. 761.

⁴ Lowson v. Ford, 4 Macph. 631, per Lord Cowan, at p. 637.

⁵ 19 R. 170.

⁶ Turnbull's Trustees v. Robertson, 1911 S. C. 1288; Allan v. Glasgow, (1846) 5 Bell's App. 379.

⁷ In bonis Rawlins, 48 L. J., P. & D. 64, per Sir James Hannen, at p. 65.

⁸ Pattison's Trustees v. University of Edinburgh, 16 R. 73, per Lord M'Laren, at p. 75; Maitland's Trustees v. Maitland, (1871) 10 Macph. 79, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 88.

the cardinal rules of construction.¹ *Tait's Trustees v. Chiene*² was Jan. 15, 1913. very special, and in that case evidence was admitted only to determine to which of two possible deeds the phrase "my last will of even date" applied. Further, in that case the whole of the deeds were executed within forty-eight hours, and it was possible to regard them as idem negotium. The same principle could not be extended to a transaction where a month had elapsed between the execution of the first deed and the last. Even assuming the competency of the evidence, it was not conclusive in favour of the second parties, for the letter of 29th December, in which the testatrix referred to the £1500 as still undisposed of, was inconsistent with the view that she considered the codicil in favour of the second parties, which she had executed eight days previously, as still remaining in force. It was also an argument against the claim for the second parties that the testatrix had made a bequest in their favour by the codicil of 28th May 1904, for it was not to be presumed that she intended them to take a double benefit.

Hannay's
Trustees v.
Keith.

At advising on 15th January 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—[After narrating the facts]—The principal question in this case is whether or not this document (the deed of 21st December 1903) is operative and effectual as a part of Mrs Hannay's testamentary writings. It is admittedly holograph and, though in pencil, is ex facie a valid testamentary writing. But if its operative force and effect are to be judged of purely by the terms of Mrs Hannay's settlement, it is clear that, being prior in date, it must be held to be ineffectual, for it is not a writing thereafter executed; and even if otherwise effectual it would be cut down by the express clause of revocation in the settlement. But certain facts are stated in the case, under reservation of all questions as to their competency and relevancy, which the second parties (the Keith family) maintain are sufficient, if effect can legally be given to them, to warrant the Court in sustaining the writing of 21st December 1903. It appears that in July 1903, Mrs Hannay's law-agents prepared on her instructions a draft settlement of her affairs, which on 3rd December she returned to them as finally approved of, and on 16th December the engrossment was formally executed by her. In returning the document, Mrs Hannay expressed her desire to make certain alterations on her settlement, one of these being a reservation of right to herself to bequeath £1500 out of the sum of £5000, mentioned in the fourth purpose, otherwise than to her son Peter and his children; and she requested the agents to prepare a codicil giving effect to the alterations. The agents advised her that it would be preferable that the settlement should be altered to give effect to her wishes, and be then re-engrossed and re-executed by her. This was done, and the settlement was executed, as already stated, on 13th January 1904.

A question of considerable interest and importance is thus raised as to the extent to which extrinsic evidence is competent to set up as effectual a testamentary document which (like the writing of 21st December) must

¹ Jarman on Wills, (6th ed.) p. 2209, rule 8; Dickson on Evidence, secs. 1052, 1055.

² 1911 S. C. 743.

Jan. 15, 1918. otherwise, being prior in date to the settlement, admittedly be held to be ineffectual. Mr Mackay for the second parties maintained two points with ability and vigour—(1) that the settlement of 13th January 1904 was in fact and effect a mere re-attestation of that of 16th December 1903, and the intermediate writing of 21st December therefore remained good and effectual; (2) that the extrinsic evidence was competent and sufficient to establish Mrs Hannay's intention that the writing of 21st December should receive effect, notwithstanding its actual date prior to the settlement of January 1904.

Hannay's
Trustees v.
Keith.

Lord Dundas.

The first of these points was based largely upon the case of Dalglish's Trustees v. Crum,¹ decided by this Division. The rubric bears that "a lady left (1) a trust-disposition and settlement, partly signed by her and also executed notarially of date 8th March; (2) a codicil executed notarially on 14th March; and (3) a trust-disposition and settlement executed on 9th April in the ordinary way, all in the year 1890. (1) and (3) were both universal settlements, and were practically identical. There was no express revocation of prior settlements in (3). The codicil bequeathed a legacy to a person to whom a legacy was bequeathed in the first trust-disposition, and again in identical terms in the second trust-disposition, the codicil bearing that its provision was 'in addition to the provisions in my trust-disposition and settlement in favour of the' legatee. In a special case brought to determine whether the codicil was or was not recalled by the second trust-disposition, it was stated that the first trust-disposition of the 8th of March was executed notarially because from bodily weakness the testator had not been able to complete the execution of it in her own hand; that her man of business had explained to her that, if she recovered strength, 'it might be better to have the deed re-executed and signed by herself'; that accordingly, she having recovered, it was so 're-extended and re-executed,' this deed being the trust-disposition of 9th April; and that the notary who prepared and executed the codicil was not the same person who prepared the two trust-dispositions and took charge of their execution. Held that the codicil was not recalled, the trust-disposition of 9th April being merely a re-attestation of the will of 8th March." The Lord Justice-Clerk said the "question would be a very difficult one but for the authorities that have been cited to us"; these were English cases (Wade v. Nazer,² Green v. Tribe,³ and *Rawlins*⁴); and on the strength of these decisions, his Lordship stated that, the settlement of 9th April "being a mere re-execution or re-attestation, we are, I think, in a position to hold that it did not cancel the codicils. The expression of the will of Miss Dalglish on the 8th March was repeated on the 9th April, and as a mere repetition it had no effect as a cancellation of the codicils. They are not affected by it." Lord Young, the only other Judge who delivered an opinion, observed that the difficulty lay in reaching the fact that the deed of 9th April was only a re-attestation or re-execution of the deed of 8th March. Having overcome that difficulty, his Lordship said he had "no hesitation in acting on the principle of the case of Wade."² That principle

¹ 19 R. 170.

² 1 Rob. E. 627.

³ 9 Ch. D. 231.

⁴ 48 L. J., P. & D. 64.

was very distinctly expressed by Lord Hannen, in a subsequent case, when Jan. 15, 1913. he was President of the Probate Court. The principle is that a mere re-attestation of a deed, though that re-attestation be subsequent to a codicil, will have no effect in recalling that codicil. Indeed, it is an inaccurate use of language to speak of a re-attested will as a new will. The will remains the same, though evidenced by writing on a new piece of paper. The will of 9th April is the very will of 8th March." Lord Rutherford Clark and Lord Trayner concurred. *Dalglisch's case*¹ is, I think, the only Scots decision in which the "principle" of re-attestation is affirmed, for I do not consider that the judgment in *Tait's Trustees*² truly proceeded upon that ground. But, accepting *Dalglisch's Trustees*¹ as a sound decision, I do not think we could apply it to the present case without materially enlarging the scope and effect of the "principle" it affirms, which I am not disposed to do. The case before us does not comply with the postulates of Lord Young's opinion. Mrs Hannay's will of 13th January cannot be said to be "the very will" of 16th December. The two settlements were not identical (see M'Laren on Wills and Succession, 3rd ed., p. 413, note 2). We have not before us the settlement of 16th December; but we were informed that by its terms £4500 out of the sum of £5000 was destined to Peter Hannay and his children. By the settlement of 13th January only £3000 is so destined, the other £1500 being reserved for future disposal of the testatrix, as the deed bears. Other material alterations were intentionally and deliberately made by Mrs Hannay on the former settlement when she executed the later one. I am therefore of opinion that the principle of re-attestation affirmed in *Dalglisch's Trustees*¹ does not govern the present case. The first branch of Mr Mackay's argument, accordingly, in my judgment fails.

The other branch must also, I think, be rejected. It is important to bear in mind in a question of this sort that the Court of Session in Scotland has to perform two separate and distinct functions which, in some other countries, are entrusted to separate branches of the Court (see Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in *Scott v. Sceales*³). We have, in the first place, to ascertain and determine what are the testamentary writings of the deceased of which, in English phrase, probate should be granted as constituting his will. For this purpose, extrinsic evidence may be necessary; and in this case the few facts necessary to establish the testamentary character of the writing of 21st December are admitted. The next function of the Court is to determine, as matter of construction, the true meaning and effect of the testamentary writings of the deceased. Here again extrinsic evidence may be necessary; but the limits within which it can competently be resorted to are somewhat jealously guarded. The testator's intention must, of course, always be gathered from the language he has used, and no extrinsic proof is admissible to contradict or modify the plain meaning of that language. But the Court is entitled, in construing a testamentary (like any other) instrument, to have information as to the circumstances which surrounded the testator when he subscribed it. And extrinsic evidence may be resorted to; e.g., to explain words or phrases occurring in a will which are technical,

¹ 19 R. 170.² 1911 S. C. 743.³ 2 Macph. 613, at p. 619.

Jan. 15, 1913. scientific, or otherwise outside the range of common parlance; or when it is necessary for the identification of a particular legatee, or the subject of a legacy, or the like; or even where ambiguity arises from a reference in the instrument under construction to some fact beyond the scope of its immediate expression. Counsel for the second parties strenuously maintained that extrinsic evidence is here admissible (and available) to prove that the words in Mrs Hannay's will, "afterwards directed by me in any writing or writings to be hereafter executed by me," were intended by her to refer to and include the testamentary writing of 21st December, prior in date to the will, notwithstanding the clear and unambiguous import of the words themselves, and the express clause of revocation of "all previous testamentary writings." I cannot accept the contention. It was urged that the recent case of *Tait's Trustees*¹ is a direct authority in favour of the second parties upon the point. I do not think it is so. *Tait's case*¹ was, as appears from the opinions delivered, one of exceptional difficulty and of great specialty. A proof was then led "to enable the Court" (as Lord Dunedin put it, at p. 753), "as is proper, to be, so far as it could be, in possession of the circumstances of the moment, with regard to what was done." The question was as to the validity or the reverse of Mr Tait's holograph list of legacies, which was dated 28th October 1909 and signed by him "in terms of my last will of even date." The evidence satisfied the Court that this document was a testamentary writing of the testator. But the difficulty of the case arose from the words quoted; for, as Lord Johnston expressed it (at p. 758), "there was no will of 'even date,' if 'even date' meant 28th October 1909. There was a possible will of 27th, and an undoubted will of 29th. There was a possible will of yesterday, an actual will of to-morrow, but, literally at least, none of to-day. Yet to one or other of these two documents the docquet must refer. If it referred to the former, then, as the will of 27th October, so far as it can be regarded as a will, was revoked by that of 29th October, No. 8 of process went with it; if to the latter, it may be sustained. Literally and expressly it referred to neither." The learned Judges pointed out that, if the date 28th October were to be regarded alone and by itself, the list of legacies must necessarily be held to be invalid, seeing that Mr Tait's final settlement was only executed on the 29th. But they sustained its validity; and the Lord President expressed his ground of judgment (p. 755) to be that Mr Tait did not look on the two documents of 27th and 29th October as different things. "He looked on them as idem negotium, and I think, therefore, when he says, 'in terms of my last will of even date,' he really has in contemplation not the one document of the 27th, but both documents." I think Lord Johnston proceeded on precisely the same ground. He uses the word "republishing" more than once in the course of his opinion; but the basis of his decision (p. 761) was that "what Mr Tait did between the evening of 27th and the afternoon of 29th October 1909 was truly one act of testamentary disposition." In these circumstances the case of *Tait's Trustees*¹ does not appear to me to afford a sufficient basis for the contention of the second parties. It would, I think, be a strong thing to extend the doctrine of idem negotium, applied in *Tait's case*¹ with difficulty to a period of Jan. 15, 1913. hours rather than of days, to a period of weeks as we are here asked to do. It is not easy to see what such an extension might lead to; it might be prayed in aid to cover a period of months or of years, the continuity and identity of the "negotium" or "act of testamentary disposition" being sought to be established by correspondence or other extraneous evidence during the period. I am not prepared to strain a theory which was held to suit the facts in *Tait's case*¹ so as to make it cover the quite different and much less favourable state of circumstances now before us. In my judgment we ought not to admit the correspondence in evidence. It is not, I consider, competent to contradict by extrinsic proof the express and unambiguous terms of Mrs Hannay's final settlement; and that, I think, is in effect what we are here asked to do. The writing of 21st December is therefore, in my judgment, inoperative and ineffectual; and I am for answering the first question put to us in the negative.

¹ 1911 S. C. 743.

I should like, however, to add that the conclusion I have reached as matter of law does not, in my opinion, result in any miscarriage of justice; for if the extrinsic evidence could competently be regarded, it would not, in my opinion, be relevant or sufficient to show an intention on Mrs Hannay's part other than that to which effect will be given, if your Lordships agree with my conclusion. The draft of Mrs Hannay's settlement was sent to her on 4th December. Next day she wrote a letter addressed to her agents, which shows that she had it in her mind to leave the £1500 to the Keith family if her daughter died unmarried. But this letter was never sent; it was docketed and retained by Mrs Hannay. She executed her settlement on 16th December; it contained no such provision as she had contemplated for the Keith family, but in returning it to her agents she says she would like added to the will a codicil to the effect that, if her daughter died childless, she left the £1500 otherwise than to her son and his heirs; and on 17th December she refers to the "probability under certain contingencies of bequeathing £1500 to others than my son's family." The agents on 17th and 19th December advised that instead of a codicil or codicils the settlement should be rewritten. On 21st December Mrs Hannay put on paper the writing in question, reverting apparently to her idea of a codicil. But on the 29th, eight days later, she writes to her agents: "In the event of my daughter's leaving no direct heirs, I might not leave the whole of the £5000 five thousand pounds to go to my son or family. I reserve the right of bequest, otherwise, for a portion, and without meantime specifying amount or direction." It is exceedingly difficult to reconcile this passage with the view that Mrs Hannay believed and intended when she wrote it that she had already validly bequeathed the £1500 to the Keiths. When the new settlement was sent to her, containing the colourless clause already quoted, she executed it without comment on 13th January. In these circumstances I confess I see no reason to suppose that Mrs Hannay regarded the writing of 21st December as a valid and subsisting provision; and the contrary view is further supported by the fact that on 28th May 1912 she made a bequest to the Keith family,

¹ 1911 S. C. 743.

Jan. 15, 1913. as to the validity of which no doubt is suggested. [His Lordship then proceeded to deal with questions in the case with which this report is not concerned.]
 Hannay's
 Trustees v.
 Keith.

LORD SALVESEN.—I have had an opportunity of reading Lord Dundas's opinion, and I entirely concur with the result at which he has arrived.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That is my opinion also.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the negative.

MARTIN, MILLIGAN, & MACDONALD, W.S.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—
 MACKINTOSH & BOYD, W.S.—COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 68.

MISS ELIZABETH BIRNIE COUPER, Pursuer (Respondent).—

Cooper, K.C.—Wilton.

Jan. 15, 1913.

RIGHT HONOURABLE ALEXANDER HUGH BRUCE, BARON BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, Defender (Reclaimer).—Clyde, K.C.—J. H. Millar.

Couper v.
 Lord Balfour
 of Burleigh.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Sufficiency of averments of malice—Complaint by ratepayer to Local Authority—Refusal to withdraw statement.

The matron of a hospital belonging to certain local authorities brought an action of damages against a ratepayer within the hospital district for defamatory statements contained in two letters. The first of these letters was sent by him to the clerk of one of the local authorities, reporting certain information received by him as to the pursuer's conduct as matron (which he stated, if true, pointed, in his opinion, to criminal conduct), and demanding an inquiry. An inquiry was accordingly held by the hospital authorities, and thereafter, on the instigation of the defender, a second inquiry was held by the Local Government Board. In both of these inquiries the pursuer was absolved of blame. The second letter was then sent by the defender to the Local Government Board, in which he expressed dissatisfaction with the result of these inquiries, and made another charge, based on fresh information, against the pursuer, and craved a further inquiry. A third inquiry was held in which the pursuer was again absolved. The defender, however, refused to apologise or withdraw the charges.

The defender's letters were admittedly privileged, but the pursuer maintained that malice sufficiently appeared from (1) the violent terms in which the statements in the letters were couched; (2) the fact that they were made without prior inquiry; (3) the reiteration of them; and (4) the defender's adherence to them and refusal to apologise.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Dewar) that these facts and circumstances were not sufficient to infer malice; and action dismissed as irrelevant.

Observed that the defender as a ratepayer was entitled to lay the facts reported to him before the proper authorities for investigation, and was under no duty to inquire into them before doing so; and that, although the facts were disproved, he was not bound to apologise or to withdraw the statements made to the authorities, although a duty of future reticence might be imposed on him.

2D DIVISION. ON 26th July 1912 Miss Elizabeth Birnie Couper, matron of the Lord Dewar. Clackmannan Combination Infectious Diseases Hospital, Alloa, brought an action of damages for defamation against Lord Balfour of Burleigh, residing at Kennet, Alloa.

The pursuer averred :—(Cond. 2) "On 15th July 1911 two children, Jan. 15, 1913.
Rose and Carlos Forbes, aged respectively six and three years, were admitted to the hospital, being notified by Dr Robertson, Clackmannan, Couper v.
their family medical attendant, as suffering from scarlet fever, and Lord Balfour were placed in the scarlet fever ward. On 31st July a Mrs Comrie of Burleigh. was admitted to the hospital suffering from scarlet fever, and died next day in the hospital. Carlos Forbes died in the hospital on 21st August 1911." (Cond. 3) "On or about 1st September 1911 the defender addressed the following letter to James Whitehead Moir, solicitor, Alloa, clerk to the County Council of Clackmannanshire, namely :—

" ' Kennet, Alloa, Sept. 1, 1911.

"Dear Mr Moir,—I desire to lay before you the following statement of facts, and beg the favour that a stringent inquiry will be made into the whole circumstances, which seem to me to reflect very seriously on the management of the County Fever Hospital.

"On Saturday, July 15th, two children of my overseer, Mr R. Forbes (Rose and Carlos being the Christian names), were taken to the hospital. They were both suffering from scarlet fever of a very mild type. Both were out of bed and progressing to a favourable recovery when seen by their parents on August 5. On August 11th Rose was sent home said to be cured, but on the following day or on the 13th she developed serious fever, and had to be again taken to the hospital. This time the fever was most severe. I understand it was of the type known as "Septic." The little boy also developed the severe type of fever about the same or an earlier date.

"The serious part of the case is this, that on or about July 30th, a woman from Sauchie with the most malignant type of fever was put into a bed in close proximity to the children, almost the next bed to one of them. This woman died within a few hours. The dates would seem to show that both children were infected from this poor woman with the malignant fever: and as I have said the little boy died. I am told that a lad Norval from Clackmannan who entered the hospital about May 22nd suffering from the same mild form of fever as these two children also got the serious type of fever in the hospital, but recovered. So far the facts are not, I think, susceptible of contradiction. I am told, but this is hearsay, that the matron was responsible for putting the Sauchie woman into the close proximity to the two Forbes children, and that she did it in spite of remonstrances from at least one other member of the staff. If this is the case it points, in my opinion, to criminal conduct.

"In any case the whole circumstances should, in my opinion, be made the subject for a most rigid and circumstantial inquiry. I am confident you will agree with me, and that the County Council will see that such an inquiry is made.

"I add that I reserve my right to carry the matter further by appeal to the Local Government Board, or otherwise as may seem right.—I am, faithfully yours,

BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH.

"J. W. Moir, Esq."

(Cond. 4) "The statements in the said letter, namely :—[The portion of the letter from 'the serious part' to 'criminal conduct' was here quoted]—are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false, calumnious, and malicious. These statements were intended to represent and convey, and did represent and convey, the meaning that the pursuer was responsible for the death of Carlos Forbes mentioned in the letter

Jan. 15, 1913.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.

by reason of her criminal conduct as matron in putting a patient suffering from the most malignant type of fever, in spite of remonstrances from at least one other member of the hospital staff, into close proximity to the said Carlos Forbes. There was absolutely no foundation for any such imputation upon the pursuer." (Cond. 5) "The defender had no right or duty to make the said statements complained of. The said James Whitehead Moir was not an official of the hospital, nor concerned in its management. The defender made the statements complained of recklessly, without any cause and without having any grounds therefor, and without making the slightest inquiry into the truth thereof. Had he made the slightest effort to test the truth thereof, he would have at once discovered that the charges made by him against the pursuer were false, and that the charge made by him in particular against her in respect of mere hearsay was completely devoid of any foundation." (Cond. 6) "The said letter of 1st September 1911 was transmitted by the said James Whitehead Moir to the committee of management of the hospital, and after inquiry the said committee found that the allegations of the defender against the management of the hospital were not supported by any evidence, and in particular with regard to the said statements complained of by the pursuer as affecting her the said committee found that they were groundless. The said committee further recorded their opinion that the defender should either substantiate his said complaint in regard to her by evidence or withdraw it. The members of the nursing staff on duty at the time in question repudiated the statement to the effect that any remonstrance had been made by them, and of this repudiation the defender was formally made aware. The clerk to the hospital, by letter dated 5th October 1911, intimated to the said James Whitehead Moir the decision of the said committee of management, and reference is made to this letter for its terms." (Cond. 7) "On 12th October 1911 the decision of the said committee of management was communicated to the defender. Copies of signed statements from the medical superintendent, the pursuer, and the nurses of the hospital, together with a copy of the said letter of 5th October 1911, were also transmitted to the defender. Although invited by the committee of management to withdraw his said charges against the pursuer, he declined to do so. On the contrary, the defender openly expressed his dissatisfaction with the conclusions of the said committee, and in spite of his knowledge that there were no grounds in fact for imputing criminal conduct to the pursuer, he declined to withdraw this charge, and determined to press for further inquiry. The defender intimated this resolution upon his part by letter dated 17th October 1911 to the said James Whitehead Moir." (Cond. 8) "On or about 18th October 1911, notwithstanding that the said committee of management had exonerated the pursuer from the said charge of criminal conduct, and that the defender had been made aware of their decision as aforesaid, the defender addressed a letter to the Local Government Board for Scotland, or to the Secretary thereof, in which he demanded that the Board should cause an inquiry to be made with reference to the whole allegations made by him in the said letter of 1st September 1911. In his said letter of the 18th October 1911 the defender again re-asserted and repeated the said charges he had made in his said letter of 1st September 1911." (Cond. 9) "The Local Government Board appointed their medical inspector, Dr Frederick Dittmar, to inquire into the allegations made by the defender, and after making his investigations he reported to the said Board that in his opinion it was impossible to say from whom the said Carlos Forbes obtained his infection after admission to the hospital, but that it was not likely that he was infected by the said woman patient. In connection with the discharge of her duties by the pursuer, no blame was in any way attached to the pursuer by Dr Dittmar." (Cond. 10) "On or about 27th December 1911 the said Local Government Board communicated to the defender the report of Dr Dittmar. The defender was displeased with the result of this inquiry, and attributed such result to the partisanship of the said medical inspector. He refused to accept the inquiry held by Dr Dittmar as final." (Cond. 11) "On or about 11th January 1912 the defender addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Local Government Board, containing a passage in the following terms :—' All along I have been afraid that a much worse state of things existed than has been revealed. I understand now that events have occurred since I left home some days ago which throw a lurid light on the whole matter under discussion. I understand from a source on which I think I can rely, that two or three of the hospital nurses have resigned their places, and that the matron has also gone, and that they realise the grave responsibility of their position and some of the things that have occurred. A further inquiry would throw a good deal more light upon the actual state of matters, and upon what happened. I understand these nurses went to a medical man in Alloa and informed him that the original charts and registers in the case of the Forbes boy had been wilfully destroyed, either with the knowledge or under the direction of the matron, and that those submitted to Dr Dittmar were fabricated for the purpose.* In this letter the defender ascribed the conclusions of Dr Dittmar to partisanship without the slightest ground for any such imputation." (Cond. 12) "The statements quoted from the said letter of 11th January 1912 are in part of and concerning the pursuer, and are false, calumnious, and malicious. They were made recklessly and without any cause and without making any inquiry, and in gross disregard for the interests of the pursuer. The slightest inquiry by the defender into these statements would have disclosed the entire want of any justification for them." (Cond. 13) "The said statements complained of in the said letter of 11th January 1912 were intended to represent and convey, and did represent and convey, that the pursuer had wilfully destroyed, or caused to be destroyed, original charts and registers in the case of the said Carlos Forbes, had fabricated, or caused to be fabricated, other charts and registers in their place, had uttered and submitted these fabricated charts and registers to the said Dr Frederick Dittmar as true and genuine documents and to defeat the ends of justice, and further, they represented that the pursuer, realising her guilt, had deserted her said post as matron, and that the pursuer was not fit to be matron of the said hospital, or of any hospital." (Cond. 14) "The purpose of the defender in writing the said letter to the said Local Government Board of 11th January 1912 was to force a fresh inquiry because of

Jan. 15, 1913.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.

* With this letter was enclosed a letter to the defender from Dr Robertson, dated 9th January 1912, in which the latter reported a statement, which he alleged had been made to him by a nurse on that date, as to the fabrication of the charts.

Jan. 15, 1913.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.

his displeasure and disappointment with the result of the said two previous inquiries. Moved by the defender's said groundless allegations, the said Local Government Board appointed James A. Fleming, K.C., Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway, as their commissioner to hold another inquiry on their behalf." (Cond. 15) "The result of the inquiry held on three days in February 1912 by the said commissioner was that he reported to the said Local Government Board that the charges made against the pursuer of fabricating evidence in view of Dr Dittmar's inquiry and of deliberately concealing relevant facts from him were without foundation, and he found no fault proved against the pursuer. The said commissioner stated regarding her:— 'On the other hand, the matron impressed me very favourably. I think she is a woman anxious to do her work, truthful in her whole account of what she has done, even of the faults she had committed, and full of zeal and desire to have the hospital work done as smoothly as possible.' The said commissioner found that the statements reflecting on the pursuer and the said hospital were made by the defender to the said Local Government Board on the authority of Dr Robertson; that these statements were based on 'mere spiteful tittle-tattle'; that his informant (Dr Robertson) had 'carefully noted the charges of grave misconduct against the hospital staff (meaning thereby, inter alios, the pursuer) by a dismissed probationer and her tool'; that the said Dr Robertson had 'deliberately refrained from testing' the accuracy of the said statements by any questions or by any communications with the hospital committee or anyone else." (Cond. 16) "On or about 29th June 1912 the said Local Government, by its Secretary, formally informed the clerk to the said committee of management that they concurred in the findings of the said commissioner. A copy of the report of the said commissioner was sent to the defender, and he was apprised by the said Local Government Board of their said concurrence therein." (Cond. 17) "The statements complained of by the pursuer in the said letters of the defender of 1st September 1911, 17th and 18th October 1911, and 11th January 1912 reflected upon the pursuer both in her professional capacity and in her personal character, and they were to her serious loss, injury, and damage. She was deeply wounded in her feelings by the unjust and cruel aspersions made by the defender upon her as a professional nurse and as the matron of an important hospital, and by the imputations cast by him upon her private character, and her health was also seriously affected thereby. Further, these statements put her to considerable expense in employing legal assistance for the purpose of protecting herself and her interests in the inquiries into her alleged misconduct ordered by the said Local Government Board. The loss, injury, and damage which the pursuer has sustained and may sustain by reason of the defender's actings cannot be stated at less than £2000, being the sum sued for." (Cond. 18) "On or about 13th May 1912 the pursuer by her agents requested the defender to withdraw the said charges and insinuations which he had made against her in the said letters complained of, and to make such reparation to her as he might consider right and proper in the circumstances. Again, on 22nd May 1912, failing to obtain a satisfactory reply from the defender, the pursuer's agents urged the defender to accept the findings of Sheriff Fleming and to grant the pursuer the fitting reparation of a full apology. The pursuer would then have been satisfied with such an apology, and offered by her agents in their letter to the defender of 22nd May 1912 that the whole matter, in so far as regards herself, might be honourably closed by the compliance of the defender with her request for such retraction. So far from acquiescing in this reasonable proposal, the defender has intimated by letter from his agents that he declines to withdraw any of his allegations against the pursuer or to give any apology to the pursuer, and that he considers his actings have been meritorious in that they have given the pursuer, by means of the successive inquiries instigated by him as aforesaid, an opportunity of clearing herself from the stigma thrown upon her conduct as matron. In these circumstances the pursuer is under the necessity of raising this action in order that she may vindicate herself from the said charges and accusations."

Jan. 15, 1913.
Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (3) In respect that the letters of the defender libelled and the statements therein contained and complained of by the pursuer were privileged, the action should be dismissed.

On 27th November 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) approved of two issues, the first being based on the letter quoted in cond. 3, the second on the passage quoted in cond. 11.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The defender objects to both issues on the grounds (1) that the words complained of are not defamatory, and (2) assuming that they are defamatory, they were used on a privileged occasion, and the pursuer, he maintains, has not set forth on record facts and circumstances from which malice can reasonably be inferred.

"Counsel for defender did not offer much argument on the first point, and I do not think that it can be seriously disputed that to accuse the matron of a hospital of criminal conduct in the discharge of her duties, and of having fabricated documents to deceive a commissioner appointed to inquire into her conduct, is calculated to injure her in her character and reputation. If she had been found guilty of these offences she would have been unfit to hold the post of matron in this or any other hospital. I am, therefore, of opinion that the statements complained of are actionable. But I think that the occasions on which both letters were written were privileged. It is clear from the pursuer's record, and from the correspondence to which both parties referred me, that the defender in writing to the authorities was acting in what he believed to be the discharge of a public duty. The child who had died was the son of his overseer. It is not disputed that information had been placed before the defender that there had been mismanagement in the hospital. But it is said that he had no right or duty to communicate this information. I cannot agree with that. If the defender had reasonable cause to believe that the information he received was true, and that the mismanagement was calculated to spread infection and endanger the public health, I think he was privileged in communicating such information to the proper authority. Although the first letter should, perhaps, have been addressed to the clerk of the Combination Hospital and not to the clerk to the County Council, still the County Council, as the public health authority for the county of Clackmannan, are at least partly responsible for the management of the hospital, and I do not think that there is anything in the point that the communication was not addressed to the proper authority. Indeed the pursuer did not appear to press this point. Her case, as I understand it, is—not that the defender fell into a technical error—but that he persistently, recklessly, and maliciously accused her of offences which she had not committed, and persists

Jan. 15, 1913.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh,

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 18th December 1912.

Argued for the reclamer;—The pursuer's averments were irrelevant. There was admittedly privilege, and there were no facts averred sufficient to infer malice. The Lord Ordinary had proceeded on four grounds—(a) the strength of the reclamer's language; (b) the absence of inquiry by the reclamer; (c) his repetition of the statements; and (d) his refusal to retract. As to (a), whether language was too violent depended on the occasion and circumstances to which it was applied,¹ and if the reclamer "stated no more than what he believed and what he might reasonably believe," he would not be liable.¹ Here the reclamer did believe in what he stated, and his language was not disproportionate to the incident to which it was directed, viz., the death of a child through supposed careless management of the hospital. As to (b), the case on which the Lord in accusing her, or at all events refuses to withdraw the accusation, although she has, after three official inquiries, been found to be innocent.

"If I am right in thinking that the occasion was privileged, the next question is whether there is a sufficient averment of malice on record. A bare averment that the defender acted maliciously is not enough. If the occasion was privileged, the statements complained of, although untrue in fact, nevertheless must be presumed to have been communicated in good faith, in the exercise of a right, or the performance of a duty—unless there is on record some averment which will displace that presumption. And the pursuer will not be entitled to an issue unless she has set forth on record facts and circumstances from which, if proved, a jury might reasonably infer malice. But I think she has done so, and that she is entitled to have her case submitted to a jury. Although, as I have said, the defender was privileged in placing facts as to mismanagement before the hospital authorities, he appears to have gone beyond what was necessary for that purpose in suggesting that the pursuer was guilty of 'criminal conduct' and of 'fabricating' documents. In the case of Gall v. Slessor, 1907 S. C. 708, it was held that 'to charge the pursuer deliberately, after ample time for consideration, with having obtained money on false pretences, and to threaten him that unless the money was refunded and an apology made the matter would be put into the hands of the police, was . . . so extravagant and indicated such recklessness on the defender's part as to infer malice.' Following that authority I think it possible that the jury might, if they thought proper, reasonably reach the conclusion that the statements made in the present case were so extravagant and reckless as to be inconsistent with the bona fide discharge of a public duty and to infer malice. Then the pursuer makes the averment that the statements were made without any grounds therefor, and without the slightest inquiry, and that after the first official inquiry had been held and the defender was invited by the committee to withdraw the charges he not only declined to do so, but repeated them 'in spite of his knowledge that there were no grounds in fact for imputing criminal conduct to the pursuer.' These averments may not, of course, be true, but at present I must assume that they can be proved, and on that assumption I think they require explanation. If it be true for example, that the defender knew after the first inquiry that there were no grounds in fact for imputing criminal conduct to the pursuer, it is difficult to see what legitimate purpose could be served in repeating the charge and continuing to press it against her. And it has been decided that to accuse a person of a crime without having made any inquiry is a circumstance from which a jury would be entitled to infer malice—(Dinnie v. Hengler, 1910

¹ Spill v. Maule, (1869) L. R., 4 Ex. 232, per Cockburn, C.-J., at p. 237.

Ordinary relied¹ was not in point. In that case it was the relation-ship of master and servant between the parties that gave a sinister aspect to the absence of inquiry. Here the reclamer had taken the proper method of securing inquiry, viz., by laying the matter before the responsible authorities, and he was under no obligation to conduct a private inquiry. (c) There was no repetition of the slander, in the true sense of that term; the statements were based on different information and were made to different bodies. *Douglas v. Main*² was an instance of repetition such as to infer malice. (d) There was no ground for requiring an apology. It was the reclamer's duty to report what he had learned to the body controlling the hospital, and in doing so he was bound to express his opinion of the matter, and if after investigation the information or opinion was found to be erroneous, he was not bound to retract, for he had committed no wrong. In any case, while prior malice might be inferred from malice existing after the utterance of the slander, this was possible only where the circumstances made that inference irresistible.³ Here the inference had very slender support, if any.

Argued for the respondent;—Malice sufficiently appeared from the averments made. The statements complained of were made without inquiry,¹ and without any regard for the respondent's position,⁴ and were couched in the most extravagant terms.⁵ The subsequent actings of the reclamer, which might be founded on as proving the existence of a malicious motive prompting the slander,⁶ his repetition of the slander, and his refusal to retract,⁷ all sufficiently inferred malice. The undernoted authorities were also referred to.⁸

At advising on 15th January 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—This is an action of damages for slander. The statements complained of are contained in two letters written by the defender

S. C. 4). And the fact that a defendant refused to withdraw a plea of justification yet did not attempt to prove it, has been held evidence of malice in England—(Simpson v. Robinson, 12 Q. B. (Ad. & Ell.) 511). Of course the defender may have quite a good explanation to offer, and the pursuer may be entirely wrong in thinking that he was actuated by any malicious motive. I express no opinion on that. All I decide is that she is, in the circumstances, entitled to have her case laid before a jury. I accordingly approve both issues, with the addition of the word 'malicious' inserted in each.

"The defender argued that the words 'without probable cause' should also be put in the issues. But these words do not appear to be appropriate to a case of this kind—(See the Lord President's opinion in Webster v. Paterson & Sons, 1910 S. C. 459)."

¹ Dinnie v. Hengler, 1910 S. C. 4.

² (1893) 20 R. 793.

³ Reid v. Coyle, (1892) 30 S. L. R. 335, per Lord Trayner, at p. 338.

⁴ Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society v. Parkinson, [1892] 1 Q. B. 431; Smith v. Green, (1853) 15 D. 549, per Lord Fullerton, at p. 552.

⁵ Gall v. Slessor, 1907 S. C. 708.

⁶ Pearson v. Lemaitre, (1843) 5 Man. & G. 700.

⁷ Simpson v. Robinson, (1848) 12 Q. B. (Ad. & Ell.) 511; Folkard on Slander and Libel, (7th ed.) 212.

⁸ Ingram v. Russell, (1893) 20 R. 771; Currie v. Weir, (1900) 2 F. 522; Cassidy v. Connachie, 1907 S. C. 1112; Craig v. Jex-Blake, (1871)

9 Macph. 973; Jenouire v. Delmege, [1891] A. C. 73; Odgers on Libel and Slander, (5th ed.) 144; Cooper on Defamation, (1st ed.) 30, 200.

Jan. 15, 1913.
Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.

Jan. 15, 1913. on 1st September 1911 and 11th January 1912 respectively. It is admitted on the one hand that the statements are prima facie libellous, and on the other that the occasions were privileged. The sole question is whether or not the pursuer has relevantly averred malice. The Lord Ordinary decided in the affirmative, and allowed issues. His carefully expressed opinion proceeds upon the cumulative effect of four elements, viz., (1) undue strength of the language used; (2) that the statements were tenaciously adhered to and repeated; (3) that the defender made no inquiry into the truth or otherwise of the statements; and (4) that he declined, and declines, to withdraw them or to apologise. I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant, because they do not disclose any issuable matter on the head of malice. It seems to me that the synthesis of the Lord Ordinary's reasoning is destroyed if a fair amount of analysis is applied to it. The pursuer's record must be reasonably construed along with the letters themselves and such other letters as are imported into her condescendence, but no others. It is important, having regard to some portions of the arguments of the pursuer's counsel, to emphasise at the outset that the statements complained of were made by the defender to public authorities in the alleged discharge of a public duty, and that the presumption is that they were so made in bona fide, and not from any oblique motive. In *Jenoure v. Delmege*¹—a case bearing considerable resemblance to the present in several respects—Lord Macnaghten, who delivered the opinion of the Privy Council, said: "There is no reason why any greater protection should be given to a communication made in answer to an inquiry with reference to a servant's character than to any other communication made from a sense of duty, legal, moral, or social. The privilege would be worth very little if a person making a communication on a privileged occasion were to be required, in the first place, and as a condition of immunity, to prove affirmatively that he honestly believed the statement to be true. In such a case bona fides is always to be presumed."

By the first letter, that of 1st September 1911, the defender laid before the county clerk a statement of facts, and begged that a strict inquiry should be made into the whole circumstances which seemed to him to reflect very seriously on the management of the County Fever Hospital. He reserved his right to carry the matter further by an appeal to the Local Government Board, or otherwise as might seem right. The paragraph chiefly complained of is that in which he said: "I am told, but this is hearsay, that the matron was responsible for putting the Sauchie woman into the close proximity to the two Forbes children, and that she did it in spite of remonstrances from at least one other member of the staff. If this is the case, it points in my opinion to criminal conduct." I should be disposed to read this as meaning that if the reported hearsay should prove to be true in fact the matron would, in the defender's opinion, be criminally responsible for the child's death; but the word "criminal" may have been used, as it sometimes is, only in the sense of "highly reprehensible." Even upon the former of these constructions, I do not think it could be legitimately inferred from the language used that the defender went beyond what was proper for his purpose, and was inspired by malice. The pursuer avers Jan. 15, 1913. (Cond. 5) that "the defender had no right or duty to make the said statements complained of." I think that he had the right and duty of any citizen who bona fide believes that wrong has been done to lay the alleged facts before the proper authority for investigation; and that in doing so he was entitled to formulate his own view of what ought to follow if the facts reported on hearsay should be established as true. The pursuer goes on to aver that the defender made the statements recklessly, "and without making the slightest inquiry into the truth thereof." Her counsel could not suggest, and I cannot imagine, what form of independent inquiry it was the defender's duty at that stage to undertake. He asked that the proper authority should inquire. The case of Dinnie v. Hengler,¹ referred to by the Lord Ordinary, has no application. There, a master, without making any inquiry at all, charged his servant with dishonesty in presence of other persons, and an oblique motive was alleged pointing to actual malice. It seems to me, therefore, that from the letter of 1st September 1911 and its surrounding circumstances as disclosed by the pursuer's record, no legitimate inference of malice could possibly be drawn.

¹ [1891] A. C. 73.

A domestic inquiry having been conducted by the hospital authorities, its result was on 5th October 1911 communicated by their clerk to the county clerk, and afterwards to the defender. The pursuer avers (Cond. 7) that "although invited by the committee of management to withdraw his said charges against the pursuer, he declined to do so. On the contrary the defender openly expressed his dissatisfaction with the conclusions of the said committee, and in spite of his knowledge that there were no grounds in fact for imputing criminal conduct to the pursuer, he declined to withdraw this charge, and determined to press for further inquiry"; and (Cond. 8) that he demanded that the Local Government Board should cause such inquiry to be made. I think the defender was quite entitled to ask (as he had originally stated his intention to ask) for this further and independent investigation, and that no inference of malice could be reasonably drawn from his so doing. If, under analogous circumstances, a procurator-fiscal to whose notice a citizen had brought certain alleged facts, should decline to act, or, after making some inquiry, should express the view that the facts did not disclose any ground for proceedings, I apprehend that the citizen might, without any room for a suggestion that he was actuated by malice in doing so, approach the Crown Office with a request for further investigation. Nor do I think that the defender was bound to act upon the "invitation" of the hospital committee that "the statement should either be substantiated by his Lordship or withdrawn by him." It was not, in my judgment, for the defender either to substantiate or to withdraw; it was for the Local Government Board, if they thought fit, to inquire into the facts, as he desired them to do.

The Local Government Board did think fit to order an inquiry, which was accordingly conducted by Dr Dittmar; and his report was communicated to the defender about 27th December 1911. On 11th January 1912 the defender wrote to the Local Government Board the letter, part of which

¹ 1910 S. C. 4.

Jan. 15, 1913. is scheduled to the second issue, and the whole of which is printed in Appendix B. Enclosed with it was a letter, dated 9th January, which he had received from Dr Robertson. The pursuer (Conds. 12, 13, 14) alleges that the statements in the defender's letter were malicious, made recklessly and without any inquiry, and in gross disregard of the interests of the pursuer; and that his purpose was "to force a fresh inquiry because of his displeasure and disappointment with the result of the said two previous inquiries." Now it is clear from the letter itself (and its enclosure), and from the pursuer's averments, that since the date of Dr Dittmar's investigation new information, involving fresh matter for inquiry, had been brought to the defender's notice by Dr Robertson. The demand for renewed investigation was not a mere iteration of what had gone before. I cannot understand why the defender should not have been entitled to ask for further inquiry, or how malice could be inferred from his having done so; nor, so far as I see, is there anything violent, or possibly suggestive of malice, in the language of this letter, any more than in that of the letter of 1st September 1911. There is not here, in my opinion, any ground for applying the doctrine laid down, e.g., in Gall v. Slessor,¹ to which the Lord Ordinary alludes.

An inquiry was in fact held by Sheriff Fleming; and the pursuer avers (Cond. 15) that his report bore that "the charges made against the pursuer of fabricating evidence in view of Dr Dittmar's inquiry, and of deliberately concealing relevant facts from him, were without foundation, and he found no fault proved against the pursuer." Thereafter, the pursuer's law-agents wrote certain letters to the defender, and a correspondence was continued between his law-agents and them. The pursuer (Cond. 18) summarises this correspondence, which must be looked at in considering the relevancy of this part of the pursuer's record. Her agents requested the defender to withdraw the false and libellous charges, allegations, and insinuations which they maintained he had made against her, or to apologise for them. The defender (through his solicitors) declined to do either. His attitude is expressed in their last letter to be that "while, as the result of these inquiries, he is now satisfied that the matron was not so much to blame as she seemed at first sight to be, he does not see anything in his action which calls for either apology or compensation." I do not think that a member of the public who has, in the bona fide discharge of a duty, submitted matters to a public authority for their investigation is legally bound, if the result of such investigation is to absolve some person from injurious implication in the subject-matter inquired into, to apologise to that person, or to withdraw any statement he may have made about him or her in his bona fide disclosure to the authority. A duty of future reticence may be imposed upon him; but I do not think he is legally bound even to recant his original belief; it might be impossible for him conscientiously to do so. But the pursuer's counsel urged that, whether or not the defender is bound in law to apologise or to withdraw, his persistent refusal to do either is a ground from which a jury might legitimately infer that he was actuated by a malicious intent when he wrote the first (or, at all events, the second) of the letters complained of. I am not aware of any authority for this view, Jan. 15, 1913. and I think it is unsound. The English case of Simpson,¹ referred to by the Lord Ordinary, is a long way off the point attempted to be made. The Court there declined to say that a Judge had misdirected the jury when he told them that, with reference to the question of malice, they might consider the whole of the defendant's conduct, one feature of which was that while his record pleaded, inter alia, the truth of the alleged verbal slander, he gave no evidence at the trial in support of that plea, and refused to admit that the words were false, though the plaintiff offered, on his doing so, to accept an apology and nominal damages. It may be that the present defender could, in the circumstances, without any sacrifice of principle or of dignity, have expressed some measure of regret that statements made by him in the bona fide discharge of a duty, upon information which had turned out to be in part, at least, erroneous, should have cast unmerited reflection upon the pursuer's character and caused her pain and inconvenience. It may be that such an expression would have been a kind and a handsome act on his part. But I think these considerations are matters outside the proper province and contemplation of a Court of law. I know of no authority, and none was cited to us, for holding that the mere obstinate retention of a personal belief or view is by itself a ground upon which malice may be inferred; and that is, I think, what the pursuer's argument upon this head of the case must amount to.

¹ 1907 S. C. 708.

On the whole matter, we ought, in my judgment, to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustain the defender's first plea in law, and dismiss the action. The case, in my opinion, ought not, according to our established law and practice, to go to a jury, because the pursuer's record does not contain any issuable matter on the essential element of malice.

LORD SALVESSEN.—The only point in controversy in this case is whether the pursuer has sufficiently averred facts and circumstances from which malice can be inferred. The Lord Ordinary's reasoning is plausible and at first impressed me, but after further consideration I have come to be of opinion with your Lordships that his judgment cannot be supported. Malice in the sense of animosity or ill-will is here out of the question. It is not alleged that the defender had any acquaintance with the pursuer or had even come in contact with her; nor is it suggested that he had any object to serve by her dismissal or by her conduct being made the subject of censure. His relation to the pursuer was merely that of the recipient of complaints regarding her from the father and medical attendant of two children, one of whom had died in the hospital from an infectious disease contracted there. It is not averred that he added to or embellished the information that had been conveyed to him by the interested parties in the communications which he made to the hospital authorities or to the Local Government Board. There is therefore nothing to detract from the prima facie view that the defender in making these communications was actuated solely by a sense of public duty. It is no doubt true, as the Lord Ordinary has pointed out, that the character of the statements made and the mode of

¹ 12 Q. B. (Ad. & Ell.) 511.

Jan. 15, 1918. making them may sometimes be such as to justify a tribunal in inferring malice or, in other words, drawing the conclusion that the person making Couper v. them, while professing to act in the discharge of a public duty, was not Lord Balfour of Burleigh. really doing so but was actuated by motives of hostility towards the subject Lord Salvesen. of the complaint. Such hostility may even be engendered at the very time that the accusations are made, and may be consistent with there being no previous acquaintance between the parties ; but it must be carefully distinguished from the indignation which a public-spirited person may well feel when facts are brought to his notice which suggest to his mind that there has been culpable mismanagement of a public institution resulting in the sacrifice of life.

Is there anything, then, in the pursuer's averments from which malice on the part of the defender can legally be inferred ? Let me examine them in detail as summarised by the Lord Ordinary. First it is said that the defender acted recklessly and without inquiry. That he did not make inquiry is true, but so far from this being evidence of recklessness in the circumstances here disclosed I think it is proof of discretion. Had the defender constituted himself a private detective he could scarcely have failed to reveal the suspicions which he harboured and might easily have exposed himself to an action of slander. The course he took was to lay the facts that had been brought under his notice before the proper authorities and leave to them the duty of investigation. In so doing he exercised an undoubted privilege which it is not in the public interest to penalise.

Again, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the defender went beyond what was necessary for his purpose in suggesting in the letter of 1st September that the pursuer had been guilty of criminal conduct ; but this was a mere comment on the facts narrated, and it is obvious from the rest of the letter that the defender was under the belief (now ascertained to be erroneous) that the woman who infected the two children was suffering from a different type of fever from scarlet fever ; that the pursuer had been made aware of this at the time and had nevertheless persisted in putting this woman into a bed in close proximity to the children. If she had done so the word "criminal" would perhaps not be too strong to characterise her conduct.

The next point made is that after receiving the report of the committee of management the defender nevertheless determined to press for a further inquiry. A less resolute person might have been content to let the matter drop ; but it does not follow because the report failed to carry conviction to the defender's mind that his demand for an independent investigation was actuated by malice. Indeed, the report of the committee contained passages which were calculated to induce the defender to take the further action he had indicated in his first letter. The opinion expressed by them that the statements made by the defender should either be substantiated by evidence or withdrawn by him was, to say the least of it, injudicious. At all events, the defender acted within his legal right in bringing the whole matter under the notice of the Local Government Board, and throwing upon them the responsibility of making further investigation if they thought fit. At first sight it seems to savour of persecution that the defender after this second inquiry had resulted in the complete exoneration of the pursuer should have made an application for a third inquiry ; but this demand was, in my opinion, justified by the additional information he Jan. 15, 1913. had received from what prima facie he was entitled to regard as a reliable source. It is to be regretted that the defender should have lent such a credulous ear to the statements of the doctor whose mistaken diagnosis, if the view of the hospital authorities was well founded, was at the root of the whole trouble. But, if he honestly believed these statements, he had a right to communicate them and to ask for a further inquiry. The fact that the Local Government Board did order a new inquiry shows that the additional facts weighed with them as they did with the defender. I fail to find any trace of malice in the letters of the defender founded on, or anything inconsistent with the view that he acted throughout from a genuine desire to secure proper management of the hospital. The pursuer makes a formal averment in Cond. 7 that the defender knew that there were no grounds in fact for imputing criminal conduct to the pursuer; but this statement must be read along with the context, from which it appears that his so-called knowledge depended upon his unreserved acceptance of the views expressed by the hospital committee. Other knowledge it is not maintained that he had, for his original informant had plainly not withdrawn the imputations of which he induced the defender to be the mouthpiece.

The last matter from which malice is sought to be inferred is that the defender, after the result of the third inquiry had been made known to him, declined to withdraw the imputations he had made against the pursuer, or to grant her the fitting reparation of a full apology. I agree with Lord Dundas that an expression of regret might well have been made that the pursuer had been subjected to so much anxiety and distress as the result of the defender's communications, but neither an apology nor a withdrawal could be legally demanded. The defamatory information was expressly transmitted on the footing that it depended on hearsay, and none of it was made on the defender's own authority. I can well understand that he takes up the position even now that, believing the source of his information to be reliable, he was justified in acting as he did. To have apologised for having believed the information would be to reflect upon the source from which it came; and, as the pursuer at first sought reparation as well as an apology, the defender's caution is all the more intelligible. On the whole I do not think there is anything in the terms of his agent's letters—assuming, as I do, that they were written by the defender's instructions and with his full approval—to justify an inference of malice. The result is that this action falls to be dismissed, but I desire to add, in case our judgment might be misconstrued, that I assume throughout that there were no grounds for any reflection on the pursuer's conduct as matron of the Alloa Hospital, and that she has succeeded in completely vindicating her character as the result of the three searching inquiries to which it has been subjected.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The case made by the pursuer raises no question of law, and the parties are agreed on all the essential facts, except as to the existence of malice on the part of the defender in writing the letters of 1st September 1911 and 11th January 1912, which are the foundation of the pursuer's case. On the one hand, it is admitted that the defender, writing these letters about matters of public importance,

Jan. 15, 1913. in which he had a legitimate interest, to the public bodies whose duty it was to investigate these matters, occupies a position of privilege, which will bar all action against him at the instance of the pursuer unless she makes such averments as will be reasonably relevant, if proved, to establish malice on his part in writing the letters. On the other hand, it is admitted that, without direct averment of antecedent acts and causes, there may be such averments of extravagant words or conduct as will be sufficient foundation for a reasonable inference of malice.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.

Lord Guthrie.

The pursuer does not suggest any antecedent reason why the defender should have entertained malice towards her. She founds on statements passed on by him to the proper authorities as hearsay requiring investigation, but she does not suggest that he in any way originated these statements, or even altered them. Nor does she aver any communication, verbal or written, of these statements to persons who had no duty of inquiry into their accuracy or inaccuracy.

It is impossible not to feel sympathy for a person like the pursuer, who has been subjected to the anxiety, pain, and expense of three inquiries into charges which these inquiries have proved unfounded, and to regret that these charges should ever have been made. Such sympathy and regret might, perhaps unduly, weigh with a Court dealing with the authors of these baseless charges. The case is very different where, as here, the action is brought, not against the authors of the charges but against a citizen who, in the exercise of what seems to me to have been a public duty, transmitted the derogatory allegations to the proper authority, not as well founded but as requiring investigation. Any regret that we may have that the defender did not, through his agents in their concluding letters, express the sympathy and regret to which I have above referred is, however, in the region of moral, not of legal obligations.

I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the pursuer's four points, taken not singly but together, as she is entitled to have them taken, cannot reasonably lead to the inference of malice on the part of the defender when he wrote the letters complained of. These points are:—(1) Failure to make inquiry before writing the letters; (2) extravagance of language in the letters themselves; (3) refusal to rest satisfied with the first (the hospital) inquiry, or with the second (Dr Dittmar's) inquiry, and persistence in demanding the third (Sheriff Fleming's) inquiry; and (4) refusal, after the favourable result of all three inquiries, to withdraw the statements passed on by him, and apologise and make reparation for having passed them on. Your Lordships have dealt fully with all these points, and I have nothing to add. The argument of the pursuer seems to me to ignore the nature and result of the legal doctrine of privilege. For instance, it was urged that the defender fell under the rule that he who passes on a slanderous statement is as responsible as he who originates such a statement, a rule which can obviously have no application where, as here, the defender, if he had not a duty, certainly had a right, to pass on the statements in question so long as he left them unaltered and communicated them only to the responsible authorities.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the issues should be disallowed and the action dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinions which have been Jan. 15, 1913. expressed, to the effect that the averments in the record are not relevant to entitle the pursuer to have issues approved of for trial. The defender, who Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh. was legitimately interested in a family whose head was an employee on his estate, proceeding upon information given to him as to the circumstances in which a child of that family died of scarlet fever—information which, if true, seemed to him to imply that irregularities had taken place in regard to that child when it was in the infirmary in Alloa—wrote the first letter complained of. That letter was written to a public body—those in charge of the infirmary. It set forth what he had been told by the parent and the medical man, and asked that an inquiry should be held into the circumstances. The statements in the letter were, on the face of them, slanderous if they were not correct as to fact; and, as they are not maintained by the defender to be statements he can substantiate, the pursuer would be entitled to an issue in ordinary form unless the defender can maintain that there is privilege, and that therefore no issue can be allowed unless malice be competently averred so as to be put in issue. Upon the question whether there is privilege there can be no doubt. The statements complained of were made to a public authority with a view to inquiry, and must be presumed to have been made in the bona fide exercise of the citizen's right to bring before the proper authority what has been communicated to him, and as to which inquiry in the public interest is called for. There is no prima facie presumption in such circumstances that the person reporting and asking for investigation has any personal or sinister motive in calling the attention of those responsible for the working of a public institution to the matter, and asking them to look into it. There can be no question, as Lord Macnaghten observed in the case of Jenoure v. Delmege,¹ that in such cases "bona fides is always to be presumed."

There is no doubt that in this first letter the defender expressed himself in emphatic language which Lord Dundas has quoted. But I cannot see that, when he reports the information he has received—expressly calling attention to the fact that he is not speaking of his own knowledge but is speaking only from hearsay—and only says that if it is true a serious responsibility had been incurred, any malice can be inferred. He made no assertion of its truth. He put it as a quotation of what had been laid before him, and the mere statement that if it should turn out to be true it pointed to criminal responsibility, cannot, in my opinion, be held to imply malice. That he should have, and express, an opinion as to the character of what was done, if it should be established that it was done, cannot be accepted as entitling a pursuer to an issue in a case where malice must be put in issue, if he had a right and duty, as I am of opinion he undoubtedly had, to lay the matter before the proper authority for inquiry.

It is true that the defender made an application for a further inquiry; but this was on new information conveyed to him by a medical man. I cannot see how it can be said that his request for an inquiry on this new information can possibly be made a ground for implying malice in the previous proceedings, nor how it can be made to imply malice by itself.

¹ [1891] A. C. 73.

Jan. 15, 1913. The suggestion that the citizen who is bona fide informed of some alleged reprehensible conduct occurring in a public institution is to have malice implied against him, because he places the matter in the hands of the public body whose subordinate's conduct is impugned without first making inquiry himself, is a suggestion to which I cannot give my assent. It would surely be a most unfair burden to put upon any citizen that, when informed of there being something reprehensible occurring in a public institution, he should be necessary for him, before asking the proper body to examine into the matter, to make an examination himself, and that if he did not do so, it should be inferred that he harboured malice. I think his conduct might well be challenged by the public authority itself, if he attempted to conduct any inquiry among their subordinates without calling them in, he having no right to interfere with their establishment. If the person in regard to whom the allegations were made were under the control of the person accused of slander—as in the case of a servant living in his family coming under suspicion—something might be said for holding that the master ought to make inquiry within his own circle, as the head of his own house, and should not rush to make accusations recklessly. But no case could arise for civil damages unless he made an assertion of guilt. But here there was no relation between the parties at all. The defender had no right to make inquiries into the working of the infirmary. If he thought that an inquiry should be held, he, in my opinion, acted rightly in laying the matter before those who were in the control of the establishment in which it was reported that something had been done which was not right. I cannot, therefore, hold that, in asking that he did in asking for the inquiry, he can be held to have displayed specific malice.

But then it is said that—to use the Lord Ordinary's words—"his statements were tenaciously adhered to and repeated." This is based upon the fact that, being dissatisfied with the action of the hospital authorities, the defender availed himself of his legal right to appeal to the Local Government Board. I confess I am quite unable to see how, when the law entitles the citizen to take an appeal to a Department that has power to review a matter, the taking of such an appeal can be held to be a ground for inferring malice. The illustration given by Lord Dundas of a party, who has given information to a procurator-fiscal for inquiry, applying to the Crown Office who, being dissatisfied by the refusal of the procurator-fiscal to proceed seems to have done the most apposite. If there was no malice to be implied from the giving of the information to the procurator-fiscal, how could an application for review made to the proper reviewing authority be any ground for implying malice? It is significant that in his first letter he expressly referred to, and reserved his right to invoke the jurisdiction of, the Local Government Board should he see cause to do so. When it is said by the Lord Ordinary as a ground for implying malice that "the statements were tenaciously adhered to and repeated," it appears to me that the mistake is made of looking on the statements as being statements of alleged fact. The defender's position throughout was that he asserted only that he was informed, and desired to have the matter inquired into by the proper authority. As his persistence consisted in taking a legitimate appeal where he had a right of appeal, I cannot see nothing there indicating specific malice. After the Local Government Board inquiry was held, and a report obtained, the circumstances leading to Jan. 15, 1913. the second proposed issue arose. The defender wrote to the Local Government Board enclosing a letter received from a Dr Robertson. That letter, on the face of it, shows that some new alleged facts had been laid before the defender, and it was upon this new matter that he asked for inquiry, and this new matter was inquired into by Sheriff Fleming, who after inquiry found that there was no ground for what was set forth in Dr Robertson's letter.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Then occurred the correspondence between the agents for the pursuer and the defender and his agents. This is founded upon as implying malice. I do not think it necessary to go into this fourth ground stated by the Lord Ordinary to justify the allowing of issues as in a relevant case. Lord Dundas has done so very fully, and I agree entirely with what he has said, and also what he has said on the case referred to in debate. I am unable to see—if it be held that the implication of malice cannot be legitimately made on the first three grounds directly connected with the letters forming the subjects of the proposed issues—that the fact that the defender declines to meet a demand for apology, when the things he reported as matter for inquiry have not been substantiated, can be held to draw back, so that from that fact it can be held that when he wrote the letters asking for inquiry he was actuated by malice.

I concur entirely in what your Lordships have said as to the pursuer being vindicated as regards her conduct by the inquiries which were made.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the defender's first plea in law, and dismissed the action.

G. M. WOOD & ROBERTSON, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

W. B. SIEVWRIGHT (Crockart's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).— No. 69.

Morison, K.C.—D. Anderson.

HAY & COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—D.-F. Dickson—Jan. 16, 1913.

J. G. Jameson.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

Bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1696, cap. 5—Transaction in the course of trade—Sale of insolvent's goods by auctioneer—Retention by auctioneer of debt due to him.

A farmer, on surrendering the lease of his farm, instructed a firm of auctioneers, with whom he was accustomed to deal, to conduct a dis-pleenishing sale of the farm effects. At the date of instructing the sale he was in debt to the auctioneers, and he was (but not to their know-ledge) in embarrassed circumstances; but in employing them he had no intention of giving them any preference over his other creditors. The sale took place within sixty days of his sequestration. The auctioneers, who had a clause of lien in their conditions of sale, having retained from the proceeds of the sale the sum due to them, the trustee in the farmer's sequestration brought an action against them to recover this sum on the ground that they had obtained a preference contrary to the Act 1696, cap. 5.

Held that, as the transaction was entered into in the ordinary course of trade and without any intention of conferring a preference, it was not struck at by the statute; and defenders assolvièd.

Graig's Trustee v. Macdonald, Fraser, & Co., Limited, (1902) 4 F. 1132, distinguished.

Jan. 15, 1913. The suggestion that the citizen who is bona fide informed of some alleged reprehensible conduct occurring in a public institution is to have malice implied against him, because he places the matter in the hands of the public body whose subordinate's conduct is impugned without first making inquiry himself, is a suggestion to which I cannot give my assent. It would surely be a most unfair burden to put upon any citizen that, when informed of there being something reprehensible occurring in a public institution, it should be necessary for him, before asking the proper body to examine into the matter, to make an examination himself, and that if he did not do so it should be inferred that he harboured malice. I think his conduct might well be challenged by the public authority itself, if he attempted to conduct any inquiry among their subordinates without calling them in, he having no right to interfere with their establishment. If the person in regard to whom the allegations were made were under the control of the person accused of slander—as in the case of a servant living in his family coming under suspicion—something might be said for holding that the master ought to make inquiry within his own circle, as the head of his own house, and should not rush to make accusations recklessly. But no case could arise for civil damages unless he made an assertion of guilt. But here there was no relation between the parties at all. The defender had no right to make inquiries into the working of the infirmary. If he thought that an inquiry should be held, he, in my opinion, acted rightly in laying the matter before those who had the control of the establishment in which it was reported that something had been done which was not right. I cannot, therefore, hold that, in anything that he did in asking for the inquiry, he can be held to have displayed specific malice.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

But then it is said that—to use the Lord Ordinary's words—“his statements were tenaciously adhered to and repeated.” This is based upon the fact that, being dissatisfied with the action of the hospital authorities, he availed himself of his legal right to appeal to the Local Government Board. I confess I am quite unable to see how, when the law entitles the citizen to take an appeal to a Department that has power to review a matter, the taking of such an appeal can be held to be a ground for inferring malice. The illustration given by Lord Dundas of a party, who has given information to a procurator-fiscal for inquiry, applying to the Crown Office when dissatisfied by the refusal of the procurator-fiscal to proceed seems to me most apposite. If there was no malice to be implied from the giving of the information to the procurator-fiscal, how could an application for review made to the proper reviewing authority be any ground for implying malice? It is significant that in his first letter he expressly referred to, and reserved his right to invoke the jurisdiction of, the Local Government Board should he see cause to do so. When it is said by the Lord Ordinary as a ground for implying malice that “the statements were tenaciously adhered to and repeated,” it appears to me that the mistake is made of looking on the statements as being statements of alleged fact. The defender's position all along was that he asserted only that he was informed, and desired to have the matter inquired into by the proper authority. As his persistence consisted in taking a legitimate appeal where he had a right of appeal, I can see nothing there indicating specific malice. After the Local Government Board inquiry was held, and a report obtained, the circumstances leading to Jan. 15, 1913. the second proposed issue arose. The defender wrote to the Local Government Board enclosing a letter received from a Dr Robertson. That letter, on the face of it, shows that some new alleged facts had been laid before the defender, and it was upon this new matter that he asked for inquiry, and this new matter was inquired into by Sheriff Fleming, who after inquiry found that there was no ground for what was set forth in Dr Robertson's letter.

Couper v.
Lord Balfour
of Burleigh.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Then occurred the correspondence between the agents for the pursuer and the defender and his agents. This is founded upon as implying malice. I do not think it necessary to go into this fourth ground stated by the Lord Ordinary to justify the allowing of issues as in a relevant case. Lord Dundas has done so very fully, and I agree entirely with what he has said, and also what he has said on the case referred to in debate. I am unable to see—if it be held that the implication of malice cannot be legitimately made on the first three grounds directly connected with the letters forming the subjects of the proposed issues—that the fact that the defender declines to meet a demand for apology, when the things he reported as matter for inquiry have not been substantiated, can be held to draw back, so that from that fact it can be held that when he wrote the letters asking for inquiry he was actuated by malice.

I concur entirely in what your Lordships have said as to the pursuer being vindicated as regards her conduct by the inquiries which were made.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the defender's first plea in law, and dismissed the action.

G. M. WOOD & ROBERTSON, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

W. B. SIEVWRIGHT (Crockart's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).— No. 69.
Morison, K.C.—D. Anderson.

HAY & COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—D.-F. Dickson— Jan. 16, 1913.
J. G. Jameson.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

Bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1896, cap. 5—Transaction in the course of trade—Sale of insolvent's goods by auctioneer—Retention by auctioneer of debt due to him.

A farmer, on surrendering the lease of his farm, instructed a firm of auctioneers, with whom he was accustomed to deal, to conduct a dispenishing sale of the farm effects. At the date of instructing the sale he was in debt to the auctioneers, and he was (but not to their knowledge) in embarrassed circumstances; but in employing them he had no intention of giving them any preference over his other creditors. The sale took place within sixty days of his sequestration. The auctioneers, who had a clause of lien in their conditions of sale, having retained from the proceeds of the sale the sum due to them, the trustee in the farmer's sequestration brought an action against them to recover this sum on the ground that they had obtained a preference contrary to the Act 1896, cap. 5.

Held that, as the transaction was entered into in the ordinary course of trade and without any intention of conferring a preference, it was not struck at by the statute; and defenders assolvièd.

Craig's Trustee v. Macdonald, Fraser, & Co., Limited, (1902) 4 F. 1132, distinguished.

Jan. 16, 1913.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perth.

WILLIAM B. SIEVWRIGHT, accountant, Perth, trustee on the estate of John Crockart, formerly farmer, North Cassochie, near Methven, which was sequestrated on 17th December 1910, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Perth against Hay & Company, Limited, auctioneers and live stock salesmen, Perth. The pursuer's claim was for payment of £185, 12s. 9d., with interest thereon.

It was admitted on record that Crockart, on 22nd October 1910, handed over to the defenders his stock, crop, and implements, in order that they might carry out a dispenishing sale; and that the defenders, who had an article in the conditions of sale which stipulated that they should have a right of general retention or lien for debts due to them, had retained the sum sued for out of the proceeds of the sale against a debt due by Crockart to them.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) Said voluntary tradition of stock, crop, and implements within sixty days of Crockart's bankruptcy, in the circumstances averred, having disturbed the equality of division of Crockart's estate, is illegal (a) at common law, (b) under the Act 1696, chapter 5, and does not entitle defenders to retain the sum sued for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders having been in lawful possession, in the ordinary course of trade, of moneys (the proceeds of the said dispenishing sale) for which they were liable to account to Crockart or those in his right, were entitled to compensate his admitted debt to them, in virtue of (a) the common law, (b) the usage of trade between auctioneers and live-stock salesmen and their customers, (c) the express conditions upon which the defenders dealt with him, and (d) the course of dealing between him and the defenders. (3) The transaction challenged having been bona fide and in the ordinary course of business, the defenders should be assoilzied.

A proof was led in the Sheriff Court, the import of the facts established at which appears in the following interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) on 12th January 1912:—“ . . . Finds (1) that the defenders, Hay & Company, Limited, are auctioneers and live-stock salesmen at Perth, and that they conduct sales at their marts and many dispenishing sales at farms; (2) that they have conditions of sales, of which No. 12 of process is a copy, which stipulate that ‘the sales conducted by them, either at their mart or elsewhere, shall be subject to the following conditions, which shall be binding on all persons concerned,’ and which include a condition that the auctioneers ‘shall have the right of general retention or lien over all goods and money coming into their possession for any debt or liability, howsoever arising, of the owner or consigner to them’; (3) that frequently, in the course of their business, they make advances to farmers who deal with them, and that these advances are frequently, and indeed usually, repaid by the price of stock which such farmers put into their hands for sale; (4) that John Crockart was tenant of North Cassochie, Methven, prior to Martinmas 1910, at which date, by arrangement with the landlord, he terminated his tenancy of that farm; (5) that for some years prior to 1910 the defenders dealt with the said John Crockart in the way described, there being sometimes a balance against him, and such balance being from time to time extinguished or at other times much reduced, all as shown in the account No. 33 of process; (6) that, in particular, the defenders advanced to Crockart, on 21st June 1910, the sum of £100, he being to a small extent at the time indebted to them for balance of cash and of stock removed without payment, and that the £100 was used Jan. 16, 1913.

by him in paying rent claimed by his landlord (as to part of which claim there was at this time a dispute); (7) that at that time the defenders had no special knowledge of the state of his affairs, and that they made the advance in the ordinary course of their business and of their dealings with him, supposing him to be solvent; (8) that in June or July 1910 Crockart arranged with his landlord, with whom he had still a dispute, to go out of said farm at Martinmas 1911, but that he, towards the end of August 1910, changed his intention, and arranged with the landlord to renounce the lease as at Martinmas 1910 (a less advantageous year for outgoing), and that very shortly after that he met the witness Mr J. D. Hay at Perth Cross on a market day, and told him so, and told him that his firm (the defenders) would be entrusted with his dispenishing sale; (9) that the conducting of dispenishing sales is not only a common part of the defenders' business, but is in this district a common part of a farmer's business, not only if he retires, but also if he leaves one farm and takes another; (10) that the only difference in the defenders' usual conditions in the case of a dispenishing sale is that the buyers have three months' credit or discount at 3d. per £ for cash, and that they are allowed time to remove the goods, and that it is announced at the beginning of such sales by the auctioneer that the terms will be as usual, but with three months' credit or [discount for] cash, and with such opportunity of removal; (11) that the date fixed on for the sale was 22nd October 1910, and that a handbill, No. 10, was issued on 10th October by the defenders, who had the subjects of sale delivered over to them on the morning of the sale day for the purpose of their business;
(12) that the sale of the crop and stock and turnips produced, after deduction of commission and expenses, £321, 4s.; (13) that the said net amount, £321, 4s., was brought into Crockart's current account with the defenders, and that they afterwards paid out wages to his servants till Martinmas 1910, amounting to £21, 4s., which sum was also brought into account; (14) that it now appears, though the defenders are not shown to have known it, that in the summer and autumn of 1910 Crockart's affairs were embarrassed; (15) that the sale not having been a good one, and litigation having arisen with Crockart's landlord as to the last year's rent on North Cassochie, and arrestments having been used on the money in defenders' hands after the sale by the said landlord on the dependence of his action, and by another creditor on the amount of a decree for a small sum (the balance of a bill), and other claims having been made, Crockart applied for sequestration of his estates, the date of which sequestration is 17th December 1910; (16) that the pursuer was confirmed trustee on the estate, and represents creditors prior to said 22nd October 1910; (17) that in accounting with the pursuer the defenders have given him an accurate account of the sale, and have remitted to or for him £135, 11s. 3d., but are retaining £185, 12s. 9d. which is due to them on their current account with Crockart, and that the pursuer maintains that the sum must be paid over to him as the trustee, leaving them to make a claim for it, because Crockart was insolvent when he voluntarily handed over his whole stock (which practically was his whole estate) for sale, and the sale was for equal distribution among all creditors, or if that was not so, the handing over of the stock was in satisfaction of the prior debt due to the defenders, and within sixty days of said 17th December, and the equality of distri-

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

Jan. 16, 1913.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

bution is thus disturbed; (18) that the defenders maintain their right to retain the sum of £185, 12s. 9d. in dispute, on the grounds set forth in their second and third pleas in law; (19) that Hay & Company got the conduct of the sale not to give them a preference, but in the ordinary way of business so far as they were concerned: Upon these findings of fact, finds as matter of law (1) that an auctioneer employed in the ordinary way of his business to sell for a customer has, in accounting with the customer for the prices received, a right to retain against him not only his expenses and commission, but also to retain the amount of other debts which have arisen in the ordinary course of dealing between them; but (2) that when, on 22nd October, Crockart handed over and gave possession of his estate to the defenders, already his creditors for a considerable sum, so as to put the defenders in a position to obtain full payment of said debt then unsecured, and that when he was insolvent and within sixty days of his sequestration on 17th December, Crockart was not acting in the ordinary course of business, and did what amounted to a satisfaction or security for their said unsecured debt, and which is exposed to the operation of the Act 1696, cap. 5: Therefore repels the defences, and ordains the defenders to make forthcoming to the pursuer, as Crockart's trustee, the sum claimed in the initial writ, reserving always to the defenders their whole claims to rank as creditors on Crockart's estate. . . ."

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk), on 12th and 13th December 1912.

At the hearing both parties accepted as correct the first eighteen findings in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.

Argued for the appellants;—The appellants were entitled to hold the sum in question in respect of their lien,¹ or on the principle of accounting in bankruptcy.² To succeed, therefore, the respondent must show that the transaction fell within the Act 1696, cap. 5; and there was nothing to support this plea except the fact that the bankrupt had employed as auctioneers the appellants, with whom he had always dealt, and had not gone to another firm of auctioneers. The effect of the Act 1696, cap. 5, was stated by Professor Bell,³ and in the issue in Blinchow's Trustee v. Allan & Company.⁴ On the law as there stated the appellants had two answers to the respondent's case. In the first place it was not shown that the bankrupt had intended to create a preference in favour of the appellants.⁵ If such an intention was not proved, it was immaterial that the transaction had in fact resulted in a preference. It was an open question whether, if the parties were in bona fide, it was also necessary, in order to exclude the statute, to show that the transaction was in the ordinary

¹ Miller v. Hutcheson & Dixon, (1881) 8 R. 489; Glendinning v. Hope & Co., 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 73; Bell's Com. (7th ed.) ii. 3.

² Mitchell v. Mackersy, (1905) 8 F. 198.

³ Com. (7th ed.) ii., p. 196, et seq.

⁴ (1831) 9 S. 317, at p. 319; see also 7 S. 124 and 753; 9 S. 599; 7 W. & S. 26.

⁵ Pringle's Trustee v. Wright, (1903) 5 F. 522; Loudon Brothers v. Reid & Lauder's Trustee, (1877) 5 R. 293; Bruce v. Hamilton, (1832) 10 S. 250; Hepburn v. Bell, (1816) reported in Bell's Com. (7th ed.) ii., p. 199; Price & Pierce, Limited, v. Bank of Scotland, 1910 S. C. 1095, per Lord Kinnear, at pp. 1109, 1110.

course of business.¹ But, secondly, this latter point had in any case been established by the appellants. The sale of the bankrupt's stock was clearly within the course of his trade and was, therefore, protected.² Craig's Trustee v. Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, Limited,³ was distinguishable, as it appeared that the transaction in that case was entered into with a view to the approaching bankruptcy of the trader.

Jan. 16, 1913.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

Argued for the respondent;—An auctioneer had no general right of lien⁴; and the appellants could found only on the article in the conditions of sale. But this would not avail them in the circumstances of this case, for the transaction fell within the Act 1696, cap. 5. Admittedly fraud had not been actually proved, but a sinister motive was indicated by the fact that the management of the sale had been entrusted to a creditor. It was not, however, necessary under the Act to prove an *animus fraudandi*⁵; and the only respect in which motive was of importance was that, even if the transaction were in the course of trade, it would not be protected if the debtor were in point of fact actuated by an intention to create an undue preference.⁶ The question in the case, therefore, was whether the transaction was in the course of business. This could not be affirmed of the transaction for it was not carried through in pursuance of the bankrupt's business; but was the delivery per aversionem of his stock for the purpose of winding up the business.⁷ The stipulation for a lien in the conditions of sale operated in the same way as the receipt in *Craig's Trustee v. Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, Limited*⁸; and that case was a direct authority in favour of the respondent. The feature which distinguished *Anderson's Trustee v. Fleming*⁹ was that in that case the transaction challenged was just one of a series of similar transactions.⁹

At advising on 16th January 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The pursuer (respondent) is trustee in the sequestration of John Crockart, who, until Martinmas 1910, was a tenant farmer in

¹ Loudon Brothers v. Reid & Lauder's Trustee, 5 R. 293, per Lord President Inglis and Lord Shand, at p. 301.

² Anderson's Trustee v. Fleming, (1871) 9 Macph. 718; Morton's Trustee v. The Fifeshire Auction Co., Limited, 1911, 1 S. L. T. 405; Loudon Brothers v. Reid & Lauder's Trustee, 5 R. 293.

³ (1902) 4 F. 1132.

⁴ Bateman's Law of Auctions, (8th ed.) p. 347.

⁵ Matthew's Trustee v. Matthew, (1867) 5 Macph. 957, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 961; Nicol v. McIntyre, (1882) 9 R. 1097, per Lord Young, at p. 1100; McCowan v. Wright, (1852) 14 D. 968; Lord Newton, in Blincow's Trustee v. Allan & Co., 7 W. & S. 26, at p. 31. As to the form of issue formerly allowed, Wilson v. Drummond's Reps., (1853) 16 D. 275, and Ramsay v. Donald & Son, (1854) 16 D. 720, were referred to.

⁶ Goudy on Bankruptcy, (3rd ed.) 93, 94; Bell's Com. (7th ed.) ii. 170, 204.

⁷ Goudy on Bankruptcy, 21; Morton's Trustee v. Fifeshire Auction Co., Limited, 1911, 1 S. L. T. 405.

⁸ 9 Macph. 718.

⁹ Carter v. Johnstone, (1886) 13 R. 698, per Lord Shand, at p. 708; Torrance v. Trail's Trustees, (1897) 24 R. 837, per Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), at p. 841. Schuurmans & Sons v. Goldie, (1828) 6 S. 1110, was also referred to.

Jan. 16, 1913. Perthshire. Crockart's estates were sequestrated on 17th December 1910; he had been rendered notour bankrupt on or about 29th October. The defenders (appellants) are a firm of auctioneers in Perth. On 22nd October 1910 the defenders, in accordance with instructions received by them from Crockart in September, sold by auction his waygoing stock, crop, and implements. They claim to be entitled to retain a sum of £185 out of the price realised by the sale in payment of a balance due to them by Crockart on account current. The pursuer says this money must be paid over to him as trustee in the sequestration, because otherwise—the sale having been within sixty days of Crockart's bankruptcy—the defenders would obtain an illegal preference over his other creditors in the matter of their debt, contrary to the Act 1696, cap. 5. The real question comes to be whether or not the handing over by Crockart of his stock, &c., to be sold by the defenders, was a transaction in the ordinary course of trade or business between the parties, and, as such, outside the scope of the Act. The Sheriff-substitute, who evidently gave much care and study to the matter, has, with great difficulty and hesitation, decided that question in the pursuer's favour. The case is a narrow one; but I have come to the conclusion that the defenders are entitled to succeed.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.
—
Lord Dundas.

The material facts are summarised in the nineteen findings of fact contained in the interlocutor appealed against. The appellants' counsel accepted these as correct and sufficient. The respondent's counsel did so also, subject to two qualifications: (1) that finding 19 should be deleted in so far as it bears that the defenders got the conduct of the sale in the ordinary way of business so far as they were concerned; and (2) that an additional finding should be made to the effect that, at least in July 1910 and onwards, Crockart was in fact insolvent, and knew, or ought to have known, that he was so. I think finding 19 is quite right as it stands. Nor am I for making the additional finding suggested. The Sheriff-substitute has found "(14) that it now appears, though the defenders are not shown to have known it, that in the summer and autumn of 1910 Crockart's affairs were embarrassed." It seems probable, but I do not think it is actually proved, that Crockart was in fact insolvent from July onwards. That he knew he was insolvent is not, in my judgment, proved; and in any case it is, I think, perfectly clear that Crockart had no intention at all, when he placed the sale in the defenders' hands in September, and allowed them to conduct it in October, of creating any preference in their favour, or any idea that such preference would, or might, result from his doing so. The transaction was, I believe, an honest one throughout on his part, as it seems clearly to have been on the part of the defenders.

We must decide, then, whether or not the transaction was one in the ordinary course of trade or business between the parties. For the pursuer, it was argued that it was not, because a dispenishing sale of practically the whole assets of a man giving up his farm, and perhaps farming altogether, could not, ipsa natura, be in the ordinary course of business from his point of view, even if it were so (which was not admitted) from that of the auctioneers. I do not agree with this argument. The sale was a necessary and proper step in the giving up of the farm, and that was a circumstance, though perhaps an exceptional one, in the ordinary business career of the farmer; and the latter quite naturally gave the conduct of Jan. 16, 1913, the sale to the auctioneers through whom he had for years been in use to buy and sell stock, who in the ordinary course of their business had from time to time advanced money to him, and whose ordinary business included displenishing sales of all kinds. There was nothing, I think, so exceptional in the nature of the transaction itself as to take it out of the ordinary course of trade. It was no more exceptional than, e.g., the transaction which was sustained in *Loudon Brothers*¹; and I observe that in *Craig's case*² Lord Moncreiff regarded a displenishing sale as being prima facie in the ordinary course of business. But the pursuer's counsel argued that, even so, that transaction could not stand; because, assuming that Crockart did not mean to create a preference, his acting, none the less, resulted in fact in the creation of a preference, and that was enough to bring the transaction within the scope of the Act 1696, cap. 5. I think the weight of the authorities is against this contention.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.
Lord Dundas.

Professor Bell³ says:—"The plain intendment of the Act of 1696 was to comprehend all conveyances made to a creditor, if directly or indirectly intended to confer on him a preference over other creditors." In *Bruce v. Hamilton*⁴ the Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff), after quoting this passage, added:—"Before, therefore, there can be any room even for reasoning on a case as within the statute, it must at the least appear that the conveyance was made with the intention of giving to the particular creditor satisfaction or security of the prior debt; for if this intention did not exist, there could be no intention to give it as a preference." The Court agreed with the Lord Ordinary, Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle observing:—"This was a transaction in the ordinary way this bankrupt carried on his business, and is just one of the cases excepted from the statute, which does not cut down any incidental preference arising from such transaction." The case of *Anderson's Trustees v. Fleming*⁵ bears a very close resemblance to the present case, except that the persons claiming to retain were not auctioneers but bleachers, and that the subjects concerned were a parcel of goods and not (as here) the bulk of the customer's belongings, neither of which distinctions appears to me to be material. There was a clause of lien, similar to the clause here present, which was held to be effectual. The Court held that the transaction was one in the ordinary course of trade, and not struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5, there being no collusion or improper intention, no device to defeat creditors, nor anything secret or suspicious in the way it was gone about. Lord Kinloch said:—"There was no special purpose to constitute such security, which I consider indispensable to the operation of the statute. The goods were sent in the ordinary course of trade, and so the case falls under the well-known statutory exception, which holds good for the simple reason that no special transaction of security is thereby gone about. . . . There was no special security constituted. The preference has arisen by the operation of the law in the ordinary course of trade. Therefore the statute is inapplicable." The case of *Loudon Brothers*¹ is the next important authority on this matter of intention. Lord Mure, who gave the ¹ 5 R. 293.² 4 F. 1132.³ Com. (7th ed.), ii. 202.⁴ 10 S. 250.⁵ 9 Macph. 718.

Jan. 16, 1913.
 Crockart's
 Trustee v.
 Hay & Co.,
 Limited.
 Lord Dundas.

leading opinion, expressed the view that "if it is proved that the transaction was entered into in the ordinary course of trade, it cannot be held to come within the provisions of the statute unless it is also distinctly shown that a preference was intended to be conferred." After referring to the authorities, his Lordship proceeded to sustain the transaction under consideration, though it was of an exceptional character, because "there was no collusion and no intention to confer a preference over other creditors," but the transaction was "one of a description which may fairly be said to have taken place in the ordinary course of business and dealing between the parties, and to come within the ordinary transactions of life." Lord Shand agreed, but reserved his opinion as to whether the same result ought not to follow "in reference to any case in which it is shown that the transaction, even though not in the ordinary course of business, was yet in bona fide, and that no preference was intended to be given or taken." In the view I take of the present case, no occasion here arises for determining the point reserved by Lord Shand. The earlier case of Blinchow's Trustee,¹ which passed through many stages, was commented on in Loudon Brothers,² Lord Mure observing that its value as an authority was "that it shows that whenever the transaction challenged comes within the course of trade it will not be set aside, unless it is also proved that it was entered into with a view of conferring an undue preference." One may be thankful that cases like *Blinchow's Trustee*¹ are not now tried by way of jury; but the form of issue there adjusted—its terms are given by Lord Mure—is instructive in connection with the words just quoted. The case of *Craig's Trustee*³ does not, I think, help the pursuer here. The facts were peculiar, and the decision a narrow one. I am not sure that I appreciate some of the views expressed by the learned Judges who formed the majority. But assuming the case to be well decided, it is easily distinguishable from this case. The defenders there had no averment that the transaction was in the ordinary course of trade; and there were facts tending to show that they had grave suspicions of Craig's insolvency, and obtained an antedated receipt with the view of securing their own position in preference to his other creditors. The cases I have referred to—many others were cited at the discussion—are, I think, sufficient to establish that, if a transaction is prima facie in the ordinary course of business and the affairs of life, it is not enough to take it out of that category and bring it within the scope of the Act 1696, cap. 5, to show that it incidentally results in a preference, if it is clear that there was no intention to create one.

If, then, as I hold, the transaction here in question was not within the scope of the statute, the defenders were, I think, clearly entitled to retain the £185, looking to the clause of lien which was usual in their contracts, and employed on this occasion. *Anderson's Trustee v. Fleming*⁴ is a direct authority in their favour. We were referred to other cases, inter alia, Miller,⁵ where this Court held that an auctioneer has at common law a factor's lien for a general balance, and Glendinning v. Hope & Company,⁶

¹ 7 S. 124 and 753, 9 S. 317 and 599, 7 W. & S. 26.

² 5 R. 293.

³ 4 F. 1132.

⁴ 9 Macph. 718.

⁵ 8 R. 489.

⁶ 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 73.

where the law of lien was discussed with special reference to stockbrokers; Jan. 16, 1913. but I see no occasion to deal with these, or to aim at a definition of the nature, quality, and limitations of the right of lien possessed by auctioneers in general, or by the defenders in the circumstances of this case, apart from special contract.

For the reasons stated, I think we ought to sustain the appeal, alter the interlocutor appealed against, to the extent and effect . . . [His Lordship then suggested the terms of the interlocutor printed infra].

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

Lord Dundas.

LORD SALVESEN.—In this case the Sheriff-substitute has set forth the material facts in a series of careful and exhaustive findings the accuracy of which was not challenged. It is only necessary, therefore, to refer to those which, in my opinion, directly bear upon the points in controversy, viz. :—“(9) That the conducting of dispenishing sales is not only a common part of the defenders' business, but is in this district a common part of a farmer's business, not only if he retires, but also if he leaves one farm and takes another”; “(19) that Hay & Company got the conduct of the sale not to give them a preference, but in the ordinary way of business, so far as they were concerned”; and “(14) that it now appears, though the defenders are not shown to have known it, that in the summer and autumn of 1910 Crockart's affairs were embarrassed.” So far as the bankrupt is concerned, the material finding in fact is that he was insolvent at the time he instructed the defenders to conduct his dispenishing sale; and there is also a finding in law that when he gave them possession of his stock, plant, and crop for the purpose of sale, he was not acting in the ordinary course of business, and did what amounted to a satisfaction or security for the defenders' debt, contrary to the Act 1696, cap. 5. The Sheriff-substitute has accordingly decreed against the defenders to pay to the bankrupt's trustee the sum of £185, 12s. 9d., the amount of their debt against Crockart which was unsecured prior to the date when they were put in possession of the bankrupt's effects for the purpose of sale.

The Sheriff-substitute reached his conclusion with difficulty, and after a full argument I have come to an opposite result. It has always been recognised that a transaction in the ordinary course of business is not struck at by the statute even when it has the effect of conferring a preference on a creditor, and takes place within sixty days of notour bankruptcy. Professor Bell, in dealing with this class of exceptions to the operation of the Act 1696, cap. 5, says: “The only general doctrine that can be hazarded is, that wherever the transaction is in the ordinary course of dealing, and requisite or suitable to the fair purpose of the debtor proceeding with his trade, and unaccompanied by indications of collusion or notice of insolvency, it is not challengeable, although the effect may be to give a preference to one creditor over the rest.” The decided cases both before and after the date when the Commentaries were published entirely support this proposition. The question is whether the transaction now challenged falls within it.

Now, it is quite plain here that as Crockart was giving up his farm it was necessary that some firm of auctioneers should be employed to carry through the dispenishing sale. It is part of the defenders' ordinary busi-

Jan. 16, 1913.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.

Lord Salvesen.

ness to conduct such sales ; and they were employed on the ordinary terms. According to the Sheriff-substitute's note, it did not occur to Crockart that he was doing them any favour in so employing them ; and they were the auctioneers with whom he had previously conducted most, if not all, of his business in disposing of stock. It was natural, therefore, that he should employ them ; and it is expressly held that he did not do so for the purpose of giving them a preference. It is true that Crockart was giving up his farm without any intention of taking another ; but I not think that circumstance by itself makes this transaction one not in the ordinary course of trade. If he had been solvent he would have acted in precisely the same way. The dispenishing sale was a necessary part of his business as a farmer ; for he had renounced the lease of his farm, and required to cede possession of it at the Martinmas term. He was thus administering his affairs on the same footing as if he had taken another farm and was intending to continue his business as a farmer ; and it appears to me to make no difference that he had definitely resolved to give up farming and to embark on some other mode of earning his livelihood. In short, the transaction on which he entered with the defenders was, to use the language of Mr Bell, "requisite or suitable to the fair purpose of his proceeding with his trade" ; and it was not suggested that there were here any indications of collusion or notice of insolvency to the defenders ; while the mere fact that the effect of the transaction was to give the defenders a preference over other creditors does not make it challengeable under the statute.

These points are well illustrated by the case of Anderson's Trustee,¹ where goods were sent by manufacturers to certain bleachers with whom they were in the habit of doing business within sixty days of notour bankruptcy. The bleachers claimed to retain the goods in their hands at the date of the manufacturers' sequestration in security of an open account and acceptances for work done upon other goods. It was held that the sending of the goods for the purpose of being bleached was a transaction in the ordinary course of trade, and was not struck at by the Act, although it resulted in the bleachers obtaining a preference over the other creditors. It was suggested in the present case that it was the bankrupt's duty to have entrusted his dispenishing sale to an auctioneer who was not his creditor ; and it was said that whenever he had reason to know he was insolvent he became a trustee for the general body of creditors, and so was precluded from giving a preference to one creditor over the others. I do not think that is the law. So long as he remains in the administration of his estate, an insolvent is entitled to conduct his affairs in ordinary course. Thus, if he chooses to pay a creditor in cash it does not matter although he does so with the intention of conferring a preference on that creditor even where the creditor knows of his insolvency.² From a moral point of view the debtor's duty, when he knows himself to be insolvent, is to hold his estate for equal distribution amongst his creditors ; but he is under no legal disability to deal with it as he thinks fit, and even to exhaust it in paying one creditor to the prejudice of the rest, provided he makes his payment in cash. The same principle appears to me to apply to transactions in the ordinary course of trade. It may be a material element in considering whether a particular transaction was or was not in the ordinary course of trade to ascertain the debtor's intention in entering into it; but here the Sheriff-substitute holds that the bankrupt had no intention of conferring a preference, and indeed it appears that he hoped (probably without much justification) that the sale would realise sufficient to meet all his liabilities. The only thing that can be said against the transaction is that the effect of it was to confer a preference. The same contention was maintained unsuccessfully both in the bleachers' case, to which I have referred above, and in London Brothers.¹ The latter case is interesting as showing that the circumstance that a transaction is unique in the debtor's business does not necessarily take it out of the exception of being in the ordinary course of trade. The transaction there challenged was the return of an article which had been purchased in the ordinary course of trade but had been found useless for the buyer's purpose, and this was held to be within the ordinary course of business, having in view the absence of all intention to confer or obtain a preference.

¹ 9 Macph. 718.

² Pringle's Trustee, 5 F. 522.

An apparent difficulty is created by the decision in the case of Oraig's Trustees v. Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, Limited.² The facts there were in some respects not dissimilar from those of the present case, but there are two points of distinction which I think explain the decision. In the first place, the defenders neither averred nor proved that the transaction had taken place in the ordinary course of trade; and, in the second place, it was obvious that both they and the bankrupt suspected his insolvency. The receipt which was the foundation of the claim by the defenders was admittedly antedated with the object of evading the effect of the 1696 Act. The argument seems accordingly to have turned on the effect of the receipt, which, coupled with the subsequent delivery of the stock, was treated as a voluntary assignation and so reducible as having been granted within sixty days of notour bankruptcy. There is another important distinction which appears from a passage in Lord Moncreiff's opinion. He says,—"Although it may not be unusual for auctioneers to make advances against sales, I do not think there is evidence before us to establish that, according to the settled usage of trade, or according to the course of dealing, the defenders were entitled to retain for a general balance." In the present case it appears that one of the conditions on which the defenders conducted their sales was that they should have the right of general retention or lien over all goods and moneys coming into their possession for any debt or liability, howsoever arising, of the owners or consigners to them. They had regularly done business on these terms with the bankrupt, and had recouped themselves for advances made to him from time to time out of the proceeds of stock which they sold on his account. The dispenishing sale was conducted by them on the same condition. I do not think their lien would be excluded even if there had been no such general course of dealing, because in the case of Müller ³ it was expressly decided that auctioneers who received horses to sell on commission and keep in their stables until sold were

Jan. 16, 1913.
Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.
Lord Salvesen.

¹ 5 R. 293,² 4 F. 1132.³ 8 R. 489.

Jan. 16, 1913. entitled to a lien over the horses for a general balance due to them on all their transactions with the owner; and in the recent case of *Hope*¹ the general law was thus stated by Lord Kinnear:—"Every agent who is required to undertake liabilities or make payments for his principal, and who in the course of his employment comes into possession of property belonging to his principal over which he has power of control and disposal, is entitled, in the first place, to be indemnified for the moneys he has expended or the loss he has incurred; and in the second place, to retain such properties as come into his hands in his character of agent until his claim for indemnity has been satisfied." This proposition applies to the case of the defenders, and indirectly supports the judgment in Müller,² which, although cited in Craig's case,³ appears to have been overlooked in the opinions given by the majority. I cannot, therefore, regard that decision as ruling the present, for here, not merely was the general lien claimed by the auctioneers established by the course of dealing between the parties, but there was no indication that the bankrupt by employing them to conduct his dispoenishing sale intended to confer any preference upon them, nor any ground on their part to suppose that he was insolvent at the time. In short, the transaction is free from the taint which so largely influenced the majority of the Judges in Craig's case,³ and is, moreover, established to have been one in the ordinary course of trade, as to which the evidence in *Craig's case*³ was held to be insufficient.

In my opinion we should substantially reaffirm the Sheriff-substitute's findings in fact, but recall the findings in law with the exception of the first, and should find instead that when on 22nd October Crockart employed the defenders to conduct the dispoenishing sale on his farm both parties were acting in the ordinary course of business; and although this employment incidentally gave the defenders security for their previous advances, the delivery to them of the stock and cropping for the purposes of such sale is not struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. I think Mr Morison was right in saying that the real question in the case, and the only question, is whether the transaction complained of was or was not in the ordinary course of trade. If so, it appears to me that the ninth and nineteenth findings in the Sheriff-substitute's judgment are conclusive of the question, and ought to have led to the finding in law which Lord Dundas has proposed, to the effect that the transaction is not challengeable under the Act because it was in the ordinary course of business. As I understand Mr Morison's argument, he did not in the end maintain, and, in my opinion, on the authorities referred to by your Lordships he could not maintain, that the mere fact of the transaction happening to result in a preference in favour of the appellants, no such preference being intended, would by itself take it out of the ordinary course of business. His argument turned on the specialty that the bankrupt was going out of business and was realising his whole trade assets. That undoubtedly made the transaction one of extraordinary rather than of ordinary administration. But none the less was it, in the particular circumstances in which Crockart was placed, the natural and ordinary course for him to pursue. Indeed, had he employed another firm of auctioneers, say Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, as it is said he should have done, he would have been departing from the ordinary course of business so far as his past course of dealing showed. And suppose he had taken this course the transaction would have been equally an act of extraordinary and not of ordinary administration.

¹ 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 73, at p. 78.

² 8 R. 489.

³ 4 F. 1132.

Crockart's
Trustee v.
Hay & Co.,
Limited.
Lord Guthrie.

In this view the case of Craig's Trustee v. Macdonald, Fraser, & Company,¹ which the respondent maintained was final in his favour, has no application, because it was not averred in that case that the transaction was in the ordinary course of trade, and it was expressly found both by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Moncreiff, who formed the majority, that it was not in the ordinary course of trade. To sustain the transaction in question in the present case because it occurred in the ordinary course of business seems to me in accordance both with the letter and the spirit of the statute.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . .

Sustain the appeal: Recall the said interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact in terms of the nineteen findings in fact in the said interlocutor of 12th January 1912, with the following additional finding in fact, viz., and (20) that neither the defenders nor Crockart had any intention of creating a preference in favour of the defenders, or to satisfy or pay to the defenders the debt of £185, 12s. 9d. due by him to them, to the prejudice of his other creditors: Find in law in terms of the first finding in law in the said interlocutor appealed against, and, in lieu of the second finding in law in said interlocutor, find (2) that the transaction complained of was entered into and carried through by the parties in the ordinary course of business, and is not struck at by the Act 1696, caput 5: Therefore sustain the second and third pleas in law for the defenders, assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action, and decern. . . ."

J. MILLER THOMSON & Co., W.S.—CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT KIRKLAND MILLS, Pursuer.—Morison, K.C.—C. H. Brown. No. 70.

KELVIN & JAMES WHITE, LIMITED, Defenders.—Clyde, K.C.—Sandeman, K.C.—Lippe.

Jan. 17, 1913.

Reparation—Wrongous information to the police—Want of probable cause—Slander—Privilege—Malice—Statements in trade circular.

Mills v.
Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

Process—Jury trial—Verdict set aside and judgment entered for party unsuccessful at trial—Jury Trial Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V. cap. 31), sec. 2.

In an action of damages, at the instance of a discharged employee against his former employers, a jury found for the pursuer on issues whether the defenders had maliciously and without probable cause lodged with the criminal authorities charges of theft and of fraud against the pursuer, and whether they had caused to be circulated amongst certain business firms a circular in which they maliciously represented that the pursuer had been guilty of fraudulent practices.

Jan. 17, 1913.

Mills v.
Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

Circumstances in which the Court set aside the verdict on the ground that there was no evidence before the jury either of want of probable cause or of malice; and instead of allowing a new trial entered judgment for the defenders, in respect that all the relevant evidence which could be reasonably expected to be obtained was before them.

Observations of Bowen, L.J., in Abrath v. North-Eastern Railway Company, (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 440, as to the onus of proof on the pursuer in an action of damages for malicious prosecution approved (per the Lord President), and applied.

1st DIVISION. (REPORTED, on a question of diligence, ante, 1912 S. C., p. 995.)

Ld. Ormisdale
and a Jury.

On 28th December 1911 Robert Kirkland Mills, at one time an employee of Kelvin & James White, Limited, nautical and scientific instrument makers in Glasgow, brought an action against the Company, in which he claimed the sum of £5000 as damages, in respect that the defenders had maliciously lodged a criminal information against him, and had circulated slanderous statements regarding him.

The nature of the injuries complained of appears from the following issues for the pursuer and counter issue for the defenders, which, by interlocutor dated 8th March 1912, the Lord Ordinary (Ormisdale) allowed for the trial of the cause:—

“ Issues for Pursuer.

“ 1. Whether the defenders, in or about the months of November and December 1911 and January 1912, falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause, lodged, or caused to be lodged, with the procurator-fiscal at Glasgow, a charge or charges of the theft by pursuer of certain gauges, jigs, or other articles, which were the property of the defenders,—to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? 2. Whether the defenders, in or about said months, falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause, lodged, or caused to be lodged, with the procurator-fiscal at Glasgow or the Crown agent at Edinburgh, a charge or charges of fraud against the pursuer,—to his loss, injury, and damage? 3. It being admitted that on or about the 18th day of November 1911 the defenders printed and circulated, or caused to be printed and circulated, among various firms in their own line of business and others in the city of Glasgow and elsewhere, and, inter alios, among the following parties, viz.:—[Here followed a list of names and addresses]—a circular in the terms set forth in the schedule hereto annexed, or in similar terms, and whether the said circular or part thereof is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represents that the pursuer had been guilty of fraudulent practices, or contains representations to that effect,—to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £5000.

“ Schedule.

“ Kelvin & James White, Limited,
Nautical and Scientific Instrument Makers, 16-20 Cambridge Street,
Glasgow, 18th November 1911.

“ Dear Sir or Sirs,—We beg to inform you that in consequence of the discovery of serious irregularities, Robert K. Mills, then our works manager, was dismissed from our service on the 8th inst.

“ On the same day, Mr Francis Wood Clark, then our managing director, tendered his resignation as such, to take effect as at the end of the year, which, on being altered at the request of the directors so as to take immediate effect, was accepted.

"You will doubtless take note that neither of these persons has now any authority to act for or represent us in any way whatever.—
We are, yours faithfully,

KELVIN & JAMES WHITE, LIMITED,

C. W. WAINWRIGHT, Secy.

Jan. 17, 1913.
Mills v.
Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

"Counter Issue for the Defendants."

"1. Whether during the period between 1st January 1911 and 21st September 1911, the pursuer, while in the service of the defenders, fraudulently caused to be made for himself by the defenders' employees, and at the defenders' cost, duplicates of the tools, gauges, patterns, and other articles employed in the manufacture of the defenders' instruments, and also caused to be delivered to himself a complete azimuth mirror, the property of the defenders, and further fraudulently caused the said duplicates and other articles and the said mirror to be forwarded to Birmingham on various dates during said period, for his own purposes, and to await his further instructions?"

The case was tried before Lord Ormidale and a jury between 2nd and 12th July 1912, when the jury found for the pursuer, by varying majorities, upon all the issues, and assessed the damages at £1000.

The import of the evidence which was adduced at the trial will be found set forth in the opinion of the Lord President, infra.

On 19th July 1912 the defenders obtained a rule upon the pursuer to show cause why the verdict of the jury should not be set aside as being contrary to the evidence.

Counsel were heard upon the rule before the First Division (without Lord Kinnear and with Lord Ormidale) on 7th to 11th January 1913.

Argued for the pursuer;—The verdict of the jury should not be disturbed. It was the province of the jury to decide whether the defenders had acted with malice and without reasonable or probable cause,¹ and the Court would not set aside their verdict unless it was shown to be so flagrantly wrong that no jury properly discharging their duty would have returned it.² The jury here were entitled to hold, upon the evidence which had been put before them, that the defenders had lodged the criminal information without sufficient cause. Even admitting that the defenders had some reason to suspect the pursuer, their action in pressing the charges with the Crown authorities after the procurator-fiscal had declined to take proceedings, and in thereafter sending out the circular complained of, had been characterised by such recklessness as amounted in law to malice.³ The two elements of malice and want of probable cause might, and in the present case did, run into one another, and the one was proof of the other.⁴ The case of *Lightbody v. Gordon*⁵ was distinguishable, in respect that there no action was complained of beyond the lodging of the information.

Argued for the defenders;—The onus lay on the pursuer of showing

¹ Lister v. Perryman, (1870) L. R., 4 E. & I. App. 521, per Lord Colonsay, at p. 539.

² Milne v. Bauchope, (1867) 5 Macph. 1114; Campbell v. Scottish Educational News Co., Limited, (1906) 8 F. 691.

³ Denholm v. Thomson, (1880) 8 R. 31.

⁴ McDonald v. Fergusson, (1853) 15 D. 545, per Lord Fullarton, at p. 548.

⁵ (1882) 9 R. 934.

Jan. 17, 1913. that the defenders had acted without reasonable and probable cause.¹ This onus he had not discharged. As regarded the first two issues, it was for the pursuer to show that the defenders, acting as they were in discharge of a public duty, were actuated by some illegitimate motive,² and there was no evidence whatever to this effect. The whole evidence clearly showed that at the time the information was lodged the defenders were fully justified in lodging it; they bona fide believed that the charge of theft or of fraud was well founded, and they had good prima facie ground for that belief. That being so, the situation could not be affected by the subsequent actions of the defenders on which the pursuer relied as indicating malice. Nor was it a legitimate inference from the evidence that the defenders were actuated by malice either in the matter of lodging the information or in that of the circular. If the Court were unanimously of opinion that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, then this was a case where judgment should be entered for the defenders and where a new trial should not be ordered, as all the evidence relevant to the cause that could be reasonably expected to be obtained was already before the Court.*

—
Mills v.
Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

At advising on 17th January 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders in this case are a limited company of nautical and scientific instrument makers in Glasgow. A large branch of their business consists of compass work, for which they have been for many years famous. The firm was originally founded in the lifetime of Lord Kelvin, who had some very valuable practical patents for compasses. But the type of compass which was regulated by Lord Kelvin's patents is not the only type of compass, and in particular it has been, for certain purposes, one might almost say superseded by another class of compass known as the liquid compass. There is a certain form of liquid compass in the construction of which there are utilised certain patents which belong to Captain Chetwynd and Mr Clark, Mr Clark being one of the directors of the defenders' firm. This liquid compass has been very much used by the Admiralty. The Admiralty requirements necessitate a compass of great steadiness, inasmuch as the compass which they use may be subjected not only to the disturbing influences which come from the sea, but also from the excessive vibration which is the necessary concomitant of the firing of big guns.

¹ Abrath v. North Eastern Railway Co., (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 440, per Bowen, L.J., at pp. 455 and 457, aff. (1886) 11 App. Cas. 247, and approved in Cox v. English, Scottish, and Australian Bank, [1905] A. C. 168, per Lord Davey, at p. 170.

² Lightbody v. Gordon, 9 R. 934.

* The Jury Trials Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V. cap. 31), enacts:—Sec. 2. "If after hearing parties upon (a) a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted in terms of section 6 of the Jury Trials (Scotland) Act, 1815, on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence . . . the Court are unanimously of opinion that the verdict under review is contrary to evidence, and further, that they have before them all the evidence that could be reasonably expected to be obtained relevant to the cause, they shall be entitled to set aside the verdict and, in place of granting a new trial, to enter judgment for the party unsuccessful at the trial."

There are many sizes of this liquid compass—I think about seven or eight Jan. 17, 1913.
in all—which have been for some years made by the defenders' firm.

The compass as made for the Admiralty requirements is necessarily an expensive compass. No money is spared in turning it out, and in particular its metal parts are all, or almost all, made of castings. There are certain smaller portions connected with the compass itself and a larger portion connected with the binnacle head which are not made of castings, but which are made by what are known as stampings and spinnings. It is necessary at once to explain what is the difference between a casting and a stamping and spinning. A casting probably needs no explanation; the word is one of common use, and everyone knows what it means. But "stamping" and "spinning" are not so common. The words are used to describe the formation of a metal design out of a plate. The metal plate is cut and is then introduced between two shaped chucks upon a lathe, and the flat metal is, by the rotation of the lathe and the pressure of the chucks, pressed into the desired shape. When this can be done the result is achieved at a less expense than is the case when each part has to be made by a casting in the ordinary way.

Now Messrs Kelvin & White, Limited, while they in the ordinary commercial sense made the compass, that is to say, while they got all the parts and assembled all the parts when got, yet, not being a firm of founders or spinners, did not actually make all the parts themselves, and for such things as were spun they were in use to deal with the firm of Burt Brothers in Birmingham, with whom they had dealt for some time—in fact the relations between the two firms may be described as of an intimate commercial kind.

On 1st November 1911 a Mr Wynn, who was one of the partners of Burt Brothers, came to Glasgow and requested to see Dr Bottomley, who is the chairman of the directors of Kelvin & James White, Limited. The other directors are his son Dr Frank Bottomley, Mr Baird, Mr Warren, who is a lawyer and a member of the firm that attends to the interest of the widow of Lord Kelvin, and Mr Clark, whom I have already mentioned. Mr Clark was the director who had the practical conduct of the works; but Dr Bottomley, who was a gentleman of great scientific attainments, and who, being Lord Kelvin's nephew, was associated with Lord Kelvin from the very inception of this business, took a general supervision of everything which went on. Now when Mr Wynn saw Dr Bottomley he communicated to him that there was a matter which had given him and his partner at Birmingham considerable cause for anxiety, and he then told Dr Bottomley the story that within the last few months, viz., from the month of May onwards, certain boxes of articles had been sent to their firm in Birmingham from Glasgow. They had been sent by Mr Mills, who is the pursuer in this action, and who was the works manager of Kelvin & White, Limited. They had been sent with instructions that the articles contained in the boxes should be kept until further orders. Without going into detail at this moment the effect upon the mind of the partners of Burt Brothers had been that there was something wrong and something curious about these consignments. They were consignments of things which Burt Brothers said they had never had before, and for which they imagined they could have

Mills v.

Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

Ld. President.

Jan. 17, 1913. no use. Following upon that conversation it was arranged to send some of the practical persons from Kelvin & White, Limited, to Birmingham to see Mills v. those articles and to take an inventory of them and discover what they Kelvin & James White, Limited. were. That was done, and it was then found that there had been sent from the defenders' works to Burt Brothers, first of all, a complete Admiralty compass, and secondly, an absolutely complete set of gauges and jigs for the whole of the current patterns of the Admiralty compass. I shall explain later exactly what jigs are. "Gauges" is an ordinary term which I think everyone understands.

Ld. President.

In consequence of this report from their representatives the directors of Kelvin & White held a meeting on 8th November, at which their lawyer Mr Alexander attended, and they summoned Mr Mills before them. He was then subjected to an examination as to what reason he could give for having sent these boxes with their somewhat mysterious contents to Burt Brothers. The account given by Mr Mills, in the view of the directors, was so unsatisfactory that they dismissed him upon the spot. Having dismissed him upon the spot, and being within the next few days in possession of a little more information, they then, upon the 11th November, informed the procurator-fiscal, with a view of having Mills prosecuted for either theft or fraud, and upon the 18th November they sent out a certain circular.

Before calling your Lordships' attention to the actual terms of the circular it is as well to say this, that Clark had, upon the very morning of the meeting, handed in his resignation. After the meeting with Mills the directors had a meeting with Clark, at which they accepted his resignation, but only upon the condition that he re-wrote the resignation which had arrived that morning, and which was a resignation as from 31st December, which was still to come; they accepted the resignation which he then re-wrote, dating it from the day of its arrival, that is, 8th November, the day of the meeting.

The circular which they sent out on 18th November was sent to their trade connection, and was in these words: "We beg to inform you that in consequence of the discovery of serious irregularities, Robert K. Mills, then our works manager, was dismissed from our service on the 8th inst. On the same day Mr Francis Wood Clark, then our managing director, tendered his resignation as such, to take effect as at the end of the year, which, on being altered at the request of the directors so as to take immediate effect, was accepted." And then the recipient is asked to note that neither of these persons, Mills or Clark, has any authority to act for or represent in any way Kelvin & James White, Limited.

On 28th December Mills raised the present action, which is an action concluding for £5000 damages, and is based, first, upon the complaint of information having been given to the procurator-fiscal, that is to say, in other words, of attempted prosecution; and, secondly, upon the terms of the circular. Four issues were presented to the jury. The first and second issues have to do with the lodging of the charge. There are two issues instead of one, because one is put as a charge of theft and the other is put as a charge of fraud. Both of these issues necessarily have in them the words "falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause." The third issue is based upon the circular. It also contains the word "maliciously," which is tantamount to an admission by the pursuer that the occasion was privileged—it contains the word “maliciously,” but, of course, not the words Jan. 17, 1913.

 “without probable cause.” The defenders took a counter issue, which was the fourth issue, which put the question whether the pursuer, while in the service of the defenders, for his own purposes fraudulently caused to be made for himself the articles that were in the boxes. The matter was tried, and the jury by a majority—by a varying majority on the various issues—found for the pursuer upon the whole issues, and the present application to your Lordships is an application for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence.

Mills v.
 Kelvin &
 James White,
 Limited.
 Ld. President.

The first matter that has to be considered is what is the onus which the pursuer must discharge in order to succeed upon the first two issues? There is a passage in a judgment of Lord Justice Bowen in the case of Abrath v.
North-Eastern Railway Company,¹ which I respectfully think expresses with great terseness and correctness the law upon this matter. It needs a little altering in the phraseology in order to fit it to our Scots practice, but the gist of it, I venture to say, is just as good law in Scotland as it is in England. I say “as it is in England” because the case of *Abrath*¹ has been again and again recognised as an authority, and has been approved of in the House of Lords. Lord Justice Bowen in that case said this (at p. 455):
 “This is an action for malicious prosecution, and in an action for malicious prosecution the plaintiff has to prove, first, that he was innocent and that his innocence was pronounced by the tribunal before which the accusation was made; secondly, that there was a want of reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, or, as it may be otherwise stated, that the circumstances of the case were such as to be, in the eyes of the Judge, inconsistent with the existence of reasonable and probable cause; and, lastly, that the proceedings of which he complains were initiated in a malicious spirit, that is, from an indirect and improper motive, and not in furtherance of justice.”
 Now, so far as the first of these three propositions is concerned, namely, that the plaintiff has to prove that he was innocent and that his innocence was pronounced by the tribunal before which the accusation was made, his Lordship is there dealing with an actual prosecution. Your Lordships remember perfectly well that private prosecution in England is the ordinary form of prosecution. Naturally, with our system, the matter is not quite the same. The person who practically decides, except in a very few rare cases, whether there is to be actual prosecution or not is the Lord Advocate.
 And the gravamen accordingly in Scotland is not, in many cases, the prosecution itself, but is the giving to the procurator-fiscal, who is the representative of the Lord Advocate, the information with a view to a prosecution.
 When it is stated, then, that the plaintiff has to prove that he is innocent, that is the case in England; whereas here the pursuer is entitled to have his innocence presumed. No prosecution did, as a matter of fact, follow in this case, and that is the reason why the defenders thought it necessary to take a counter issue, as they were entitled to do. Without a counter issue it would be held proved that the pursuer was actually innocent of what he was alleged to have done. As regards the second proposition, where his Lordship says that the circumstances of the case must be such as to be

¹ 11 Q. B. D. 440.

Jan. 17, 1913. in the eyes of the Judge inconsistent with the existence of reasonable and probable cause, there, in Scotland, you would substitute for the word "Judge" the word "jury," because probable cause itself, in our practice, is for the jury and not for the Judge. But the last proposition as to malice is applicable in terms to our own law.

Mills v.
Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

Ld. President.

Now, when I come to consider what want of probable cause is, I am met with the difficulty of giving an actual definition of a negative. But one may say, I think, without fear of being far wrong, that a man has probable cause if, in giving the information, he is acting in a way in which a reasonable man, swayed by no illegitimate motives, would act. Naturally, when I speak of illegitimate motives, that trenches upon the domain of the third proposition, namely, malice; but there is no doubt that the two provinces of want of probable cause and malice rather overlap. You cannot deal with the two as entirely separate. But when one speaks of the way in which a reasonable man would act, one must add, I think, that the test of what a reasonable man would do must be taken according to the state of his knowledge when he gives the information; and, accordingly, the first inquiry in this branch of the subject is to see what the defenders knew when they gave this information to the procurator-fiscal.

When I come to look at what the defenders knew, I think that the salient points are these: First of all, by this time they knew what the things were that had been sent to Birmingham. They knew they were an absolutely complete set of articles which would enable anybody skilled in the trade at once to commence the manufacture of compasses that would suit the Admiralty. The second thing they knew was that these things had been sent with instructions that they should be kept secret, and should not be given up, but should await some further directions that were coming. The next thing they knew was that the class of things that had been sent, and the way in which they had been sent, had created a most uncomfortable feeling in the minds of the partners of Burt Brothers, who, while they did not know exactly what was wrong, had a very strong suspicion, and one which had been in their minds for some time, that something was wrong. The next thing they knew was that on the eve of the day on which they had summoned Mills to give them an explanation, Mills and Clark had both written letters to Burt Brothers with a request that everything that Burt Brothers had belonging to Kelvin & James White, Limited, including the articles referred to in this case, should be sent back; in other words, there had been an obvious attempt on Mills's and Clark's part to get back the contents of these mysterious boxes. The next thing they knew was that it had come to their knowledge that Mills had been throwing out feelers to various people as to setting up in business by himself. And finally they knew that, before they had given any note of warning to either Mills or Clark, Clark had handed in his resignation.

Now all those circumstances were what I may call extraneous of any explanation by Mills himself. But then they also had the meeting with Mills upon the 8th. I have already stated to your Lordships how Mills was sent for and was confronted by the five directors. The learned counsel for the pursuer characterised that as a harsh proceeding. I am bound to say that I cannot see anything harsh in it. I cannot see that the board of directors were not absolutely entitled, where, as here, the circumstances Jan. 17, 1913. were full of suspicion, to send for the man who was implicated and ask him what explanation he had to give. There are various sources of information as to what happened at this meeting. As a matter of fact the defendants made arrangements for having what was said at the meeting taken down in shorthand, and we have got a transcript of what was said so far as the shorthand writer can reproduce it. If you take what is said literally as you see it in the shorthand notes extended, there is an absolute admission on Mills's part that these articles had been sent to Birmingham, not for the proper purposes of the firm of Kelvin & James White, Limited, but for purposes connected with Mills's possible future business, because, as the shorthand notes run, Mills says: "I anticipated that, when the day came that I left Kelvin & James White, I should be able to get work done by them"—that is by Burt Brothers—"the same as they did for Kelvin & James White. That was the reason; I was looking to my future." It is the case that the shorthand notes have been subjected to a certain criticism by an expert shorthand writer, and he suggests that the sentence which I have just read is in answer to a question which has been omitted, and that if you framed the question in a certain way the sentence which I have read might not have the precise shade of meaning which it obviously has if you read it as I have read it. I do not think that very much matters, because you have also the story of the various people who were at the meeting; and they one and all—I shall not take up your Lordships' time by reading bits of the evidence—they one and all were left, after the meeting, with the distinct impression that Mills had practically admitted that these articles were sent for a purpose of his own and not for the purposes of the firm. And I think we have what may be called contemporaneous evidence of that being the case, because after Mills had been then and there dismissed, when the directors met Clark, Mr Alexander, who was the mouthpiece of the directors, made a speech to Clark, and in that speech he says this: "We have heard from Mr Mills just now an account of it, and he has openly confessed that they"—that is, the articles—"were sent to be useful to him when he was in a position to start for himself with Dents's people." That seems to me to be an absolute confirmation of what all these gentlemen say in the witness-box, namely, that the effect upon them of the interview was that they had no doubt whatsoever that Mills had reluctantly admitted that he had sent the articles for his own purposes.

Now if Mills did make that admission, and if that was the state of knowledge at the time of these persons, there can be no doubt that, in their view, and, indeed, in anybody's view, not only had a grave breach of duty been committed by Mills, but something had been done by him which put him within the reach of the criminal law. I do not think it is at all necessary to consider whether, in the technical sense of the word, there was theft—whether there had been that animus which makes theft in the strict sense of the word—and when the complaint came to be made to the authorities, what is complained of is "theft or fraud." The truth is that the question whether the nomen juris was theft or fraud was really a matter for the Lord Advocate, and not for the private informant at all;

Jan. 17, 1913. but that it is fraudulent to take your employers' goods without their leave and to send them away to a place where they are eventually to be used for your purpose and not for your employers' purpose, I have no doubt. There is a good deal of fencing on Mr Mills's part as to the word used, that is to say, with the words of a question put to him, namely, whether he proposed to "use" the articles himself. Well that, obviously, is neither here nor there. If a man took a violin which did not belong to him and sent it away to someone else it would be no answer to a criminal charge against him to say that he could not play the violin and could never use it himself. If Mills meant Burt Brothers to use these things, which did not belong to him, for the purposes of his eventual business, undoubtedly that was a fraud. I do not think it is necessary to decide whether, technically speaking, it is a theft or a fraud.

Mills v.
Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

—
Ld. President.

I now come to a great peculiarity of the case, and that is this, that in the summons the attitude that is taken as regards the sending of these things is not only not an admission of such a thing as I have put—which, of course, would have been fatal—but is the putting forward of an entirely different story; and there is this further peculiarity, that that entirely different story, which, if it is a true story, could easily have been told at the meeting of the 8th, was never breathed at that meeting. The story which is put forward in the summons is this: The Admiralty compass, as I have already said, is a very expensive compass, and there is an opening in the trade for the introduction of a liquid compass which will have the advantages of the liquid compass and yet be made at such a figure as will allow it to be bought by the mercantile marine and by that large class of persons who cannot afford to pay the price which the Admiralty are prepared to pay. The theory which is put forward in the summons, then, is that all these articles were sent to Burt Brothers in order to allow of their making spinings for a cheap liquid compass. I have already mentioned that where you can spin instead of cast it is cheaper to do so.

If I were inclined to deal with the matter very strictly, or, indeed, if I had been sitting as a jurymen, I would be of opinion that, whatever was in the summons, the fact that Mills did not say that at the meeting of the 8th November would be enough to justify the position of the defenders at that time. But I do not propose to do that, because, although the result of Mills's examination is as I have said, there is a part of his examination where, though he falls far short of putting the case as I have put it now, and as it is put in the summons, still there is a sort of hint which might have been developed into the case as it stands in the summons. When he is asked at the beginning of the examination what he had sent the things for, he says this: "All those things you mention were sent with the express purpose of having them stamped." The particular person who was examining him at the time, Mr Alexander, did not really understand the meaning of the word "stamped," and took it—as a layman would do—as meaning the impression of a name or a mark upon them, and consequently did not press the answer in a way that a person who did understand stamping would have done. Dr Bottomley did, because he asked if they were going to stamp circular plate glass, &c., and certain other parts of the compass which were perfectly unfit to be stamped, and no answer was made to that entirely pertinent question. But still I am content to take it that this Jan. 17, 1913. mention of the stamping was a sort of indication—a sort of embryo—of Mills v. the story that is now told; and seeing that we are not here trying the case, Kelvin & but considering an application for a new trial and to set aside the verdict James White, of the jury as being contrary to evidence, if I could find that there is any Limited. substance for what I may call the innocent view, so that the jury had a Ld. President. possible choice between the one view and the other, then I should not, however much I thought they were wrong, consider myself entitled to disturb their verdict. But if, on the other hand, the allegation as now made is preposterous and upon the face of it false, then the mere fact that it is given and sworn to by the two interested parties, Clark and Mills, does not really create evidence upon which the jury were entitled to go.

Now, I have used the word "preposterous." Preposterous, of course, must be preposterous not to anybody, but to the judgment of the man who understands the subject.—[His Lordship then pointed out that the directors of Kelvin & James White, Limited—or at least some of them—perfectly understood the subject; and he examined at length the evidence which led him to the conclusion that, to anyone who knew the subject, the suggested explanation must have been obviously preposterous. He founded on the following circumstances:—(1) that Kelvin & James White were quite alive to the good market there was for a cheap liquid compass, and had for two years been experimenting with the aid of Messrs Burt in an endeavour to turn out a cheap compass by substituting spun parts for cast parts, and that the result of the experiments had been to demonstrate that it was impossible to produce the necessary parts by spinning; (2) that the pursuer's alleged reason for sending to Messrs Burt the whole range of Admiralty compasses—viz., that he intended that they should turn out for Kelvin & James White compasses completed in all details save for painting and filling in the liquid—was quite untenable, as Messrs Burt were spinners, and spinners only, and had neither the skill and experience, nor the plant, men, and premises, necessary to enable them to do what was suggested; (3) that among the articles sent were not only gauges but jigs; that jigs are frames for holding the parts together temporarily to test the accuracy of their dimensions and to enable the holes for the screws to be bored at the exact spots and to the correct depth; that spun parts, from their method of construction, must always vary in section from cast parts; that a variation of one sixty-fourth of an inch will render such a jig useless; and accordingly that the jigs were perfectly useless if the intention was to make the compasses of spun parts.]

Now, that is the one side—an explanation which, on the face of it, as soon as you come to understand it, is preposterous and ridiculous, and which no man who knew the business at all would accept for a moment. What is the other?—a man who has admitted that he is planning to start a new business, admits to sending, behind the backs of his directors, such a complete set of jigs and gauges, together with a complete Admiralty compass, that with that stock-in-trade he can go into a good shop, like that of one of the London manufacturers which has been mentioned here, and the very next day begin to construct compasses of the Admiralty pattern. Some of these jigs, we are told, and it is quite evident, are the result of

Jan. 17, 1913. years of experiment. It is not entirely a question of design; they represent a great deal of empirical achievement. One improvement follows another, until you get the contrivance, I do not say in the most perfect form—there are probably better jigs yet to be made—but still you get it in very perfect form. All that trouble and labour is abbreviated to the person who has these things. (I have just referred to the London manufacturers whose names have been brought before your Lordships in the debate, and, although they have nothing to do with this case, I say at once that there is not the remotest suggestion of either Messrs Dent or Captain Chetwynd having the slightest knowledge of this matter.)

Mills v.
Kelvin &
James White,
Limited.

Ld. President.

Now, when you have those two sides of the matter as they presented themselves to the directors, really the case seems to end. On the one hand you have very obvious reasons for the action of the directors, the circumstance of secrecy and the whole circumstances of the case all pointing the one way. On the other hand you have an explanation, not made at the time but made now, which will not hold water for one moment, and really can only hold water if it is presented to a sufficiently ignorant or uninstructed person. I am afraid the question of instruction in such matters as these is sometimes a little difficult, and it is certainly one of those cases where one regrets very much that in our practice we do not have the advantage, as they have in England, of the services of a special jury, because I cannot disguise from myself that probably the majority of the jury who tried this case never came to a proper understanding of what a jig really was, and as to the deductions that must necessarily be drawn from the nature of it. But as the evidence stands, I say there is here no evidence whatsoever of want of probable cause, because, as I have already said, the mere fact that two people swear to an inherently preposterous story does not create evidence at all.

That, to my mind, settles the first two issues. I have already said that I think the question of theft or fraud was for the Crown Office and not for the defenders. And when you have settled the first two issues, you have, I think, practically settled the third, because, as regards the third, you have, applying the words of Lord Justice Bowen, to find that the sending out of the circular was done in a malicious spirit and from an indirect and improper motive. If I am right in all I have already said, it is impossible to find any malice in sending out the circular. The directors were perfectly entitled to say what they did, and to tell their customers that neither Mills nor Clark would ever in the future be their representative.

The only point, in this connection, which was urged before us, and, I daresay, urged with great effect before the jury, was that malice might be inferred from the fact that after information was lodged, and after a communication had been received from the procurator-fiscal that he did not propose to take proceedings, the directors would not take "No" for an answer, and went back and requested a meeting with Crown counsel. I do not think that is a matter from which it is allowable to extract malice. A person is entitled to call upon the Crown authorities to do what he thinks is their duty. But in this case they were more than ever entitled, for the reasons that I have already given, to secure a thoroughly informed opinion upon the facts of the case. It is absolutely necessary in this case to become sufficiently acquainted with what the compass is, and how it is constructed, Jan. 17, 1913.

 in order to appreciate what was really meant by sending all those things to ^{Mills v.}
 Burt Brothers. I do not think that the understanding of compass work is ^{Kelvin &} within the ordinary training of the Crown Office, even including the Advo- ^{James White,} cates-depute, and I think it was perfectly natural that the defenders here ^{Limited.} should wish to explain thoroughly to the Crown authorities exactly how the ^{Ld. President.} matter stood. And that really is practically the only matter that can be appealed to in the question of malice.

It follows that in my opinion there is no evidence whatsoever to support the verdict of the jury upon the first, second, and third issues. I need scarcely add that it also follows from what I have said that I think there ought to have been a verdict for the defenders upon the fourth issue. But I do not think it necessary that your Lordships should deal with that, because if there is no evidence in support of the pursuer's case under the first, second, and third issues, the verdict necessarily goes.

There is another fact which I have not mentioned as regards the first, second, and third issues, because I have necessarily dealt with the knowledge of the defenders at the time that they took these steps, and this particular thing was not known to them at that time, but I refer to it in connection with the fourth issue. It is this, that in addition to the other facts, it is proved that Mills had a complete set of drawings of all these Admiralty compasses made out for him and delivered to him, and that those drawings are now nowhere to be found. That set of drawings would have added the final touch to the equipment of a person who had made available to himself the set of patterns and jigs in the case, and would have enabled him to start the construction of Admiralty compasses at once. But I do not think it necessary to go further into that, because I think it is perfectly unnecessary that we should deal with the fourth issue at all. As regards the first, second, and third issues, as I understand the opinion which I have just delivered is shared by all your Lordships, including, of course, the very valuable opinion of the learned Judge who presided at the trial, it is I think a clear case for entering a verdict for the defenders.

LORD JOHNSTON, LORD MACKENZIE, and LORD ORMDALE delivered opinions in which they reviewed the evidence, and came to the same conclusion as the Lord President on all the points.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords (including Lord Ormdale who presided at the trial) having heard counsel for the parties on the rule, make the rule absolute, set aside the verdict, and, being unanimously of opinion that the verdict is contrary to evidence, and further, that they have before them all the evidence that could be reasonably expected to be obtained relevant to the cause, assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

No. 71. STEWART CRUDEN, Claimant (Respondent).—Wilson, K.C.—MacRobert.

Jan. 21, 1913. THE WEMYSS COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—Horne, K.C.—Russell.

Cruden v.
Wemyss Coal
Co., Limited,

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (15)—Remit to medical referee—Finality of referee's report—Proof as to wage-earning capacity.

In an application to end the compensation payable to a miner who had received an injury to his eye, the question of his condition and his fitness for employment was referred to a medical referee under paragraph (15) of the First Schedule to the Act. The medical referee reported that "his condition is such that I consider he ought now to be fit to resume his ordinary work as a miner below ground."

The miner having lodged answers in which he averred that he had not yet recovered from the effects of the accident and that his earning capacity was not restored, the Court allowed a proof as to the miner's wage-earning capacity, but excluded all evidence with regard to his physical condition and physical fitness for his ordinary work as a miner below ground, as on those points the medical referee's certificate was final.

Form of interlocutor in Arnott v. Fife Coal Company, Limited, 1911 S. C. 1029, commented on.

2D DIVISION. IN an application under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Cupar for review of compensation paid by the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross. Wemyss Coal Company, Limited, to Stewart Cruden, miner, the Sheriff-substitute (Armour-Hannay) allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments, and, at the request of the employers, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that on 9th August 1910 the respondent, who was working as a miner underground, sustained injury to his left eye as the result of an accident in the course of his employment with the appellants, and received full compensation from that date till 31st January 1911, and partial compensation between the latter date and 28th March 1911. That since the last date he had received no compensation, but that the compensation down to 12th June 1911 would be adjusted.

The case further set forth:—“(3) On 12th June 1911 the claimant was examined by Dr George Mackay, 20 Drumsheugh Gardens, Edinburgh, medical referee in ophthalmic cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, on a remit under section 15 of Schedule 1 of said Act.

“(4) The report of said medical referee lodged on 13th June 1911 is in the following terms:—‘The said Stewart Cruden has a scar upon the cornea of his left eye, due to a septic ulcer which followed upon an abrasion by a piece of coal accidentally striking his eye while at work on August 9th, 1910. The direct vision of this eye is thereby reduced to about one-fourth of normal for distance, but the eye is now free from inflammation, has a fair field of vision, and, though impaired, is still capable of doing useful service. The other eye is practically normal, only requiring reading glasses suited to his age. Cruden has a good judgment of distance and direction even in subdued light. He has been already engaged for three months in surface work; and his condition is such that I consider he ought now to be fit to resume his ordinary work as a miner below ground.’

“(5) Following upon said report the appellants lodged in process in the Sheriff Court at Cupar a minute craving the Court to end the claimant's compensation as at 12th June 1911. The claimant lodged answers to said minute, stating inter alia that he had not recovered from the injuries which he had sustained, and that he had not recovered his earning capacity following upon said injuries; that he was still under medical treatment; that as the result of the injuries which he had sustained he was suffering from giddiness and headaches, both during his shift and after; that these headaches, &c., were most frequent when he had to stoop or bend, and were a result of the injuries which he had sustained; that they interfered with his capacity for work and his earning ability; that his eyesight was weak as a result of the accident, and became dim and fagged by the end of the shift; and further, that he was unable to work in the glare of a naked light or in strong sunlight. The claimant also stated that, while his earning capacity had been, and was at that time, much reduced as a result of the injuries which he had sustained, he was prepared to try work below ground, so that his earning capacity at mining work might be properly tested. He averred, further, that it was necessary for a certain period to elapse to enable him to accustom himself to his altered conditions.

Jan. 21, 1913.
Cruden v.
Wemyss Coal
Co., Limited.

"(6) I heard parties on the minute and answers, and allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the claimant a conjunct probation. The question argued before me was whether the proof should be limited to the question of the workman's earning capacity. Following Arnott v. Fife Coal Company, Limited,¹ I allowed an open proof on the footing that certain questions as to the claimant's physical capacity might be necessary and competent, although in a general way evidence on this subject was clearly incompetent."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Was I right in allowing parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the claimant a conjunct probation? (2) Should I have restricted the proof to the wage-earning capacity of a one-eyed miner?"

The case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 21st January 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The respondent was not entitled to a proof of his averments. Paragraph (15) of the First Schedule to the Act provided that the medical referee's certificate was to be "conclusive evidence as to the matter so certified." Whether proof was admissible after such a certificate depended on the nature of the workman's injuries and the character of his employment. If, for example, the workman's injury was a broken leg and the referee reported that he had recovered, no further proof was admissible, for in that case the man's leg would be as strong as before the accident.² On the other hand, if the workman had lost a finger then, as he might labour under a certain disability even after recovery from the wound, a proof might be allowed on the question as to whether the workman's chance of employment had been diminished.³ But even in this case

¹ 1911 S. C. 1029.

² Gray v. Shotts Iron Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 1267.

³ Arnott v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, 1911 S. C. 1029, 1912 S. C. 1262; Ball v. William Hunt & Sons, Limited, [1912] A. C. 496, per Lord Shaw, at p. 511 (1912 S. C. (H. L.) 85, footnote), approving of Lord Salvesen's statement of the law in Carlin v. Stephen & Sons, Limited, 1911 S. C. 901, at p. 907.

Jan 21, 1913. proof would not be granted unless the workman averred that he could either get no employment at all or no employment at the same rate of wages as before the accident; and the proof would be limited to that question. Here the medical certificate was conclusive as to the respondent's recovery; and the respondent did not aver that he could not get work. All the statements made by the respondent in his answers were, it must be presumed, made by him to the medical referee, and the referee must have taken them into consideration as he was bound to do.¹ (2) In any case the proof allowed should be limited to the question of the respondent's wage-earning capacity. The decision in Arnott v. Fife Coal Company, Limited,² was to this effect; and the interlocutor had apparently per incuriam been pronounced in terms inconsistent with the opinions.

Cruden v.
Wemyss Coal
Co., Limited.

Argued for the respondent;—The arbitrator was right in allowing an unrestricted proof. The medical referee's certificate was final only where it was complete and showed that the workman was restored to the physical condition in which he was before the accident.³ The certificate here was not of this kind, and its phraseology was ambiguous. Accordingly the respondent was entitled to a proof as to his wage-earning capacity. The interlocutor here should be in the same form as that in Arnott's case.³ Under such an interlocutor proof might be led as to the respondent's wage-earning capacity, and any evidence in contradiction of the referee's certificate would be rejected by the arbitrator.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am very clearly of opinion that the first question which is put to us ought to be answered in the negative. I do not think this is a case in which a general proof should have been allowed of the respective averments of parties. The medical report here is given as a judgment, and that judgment, so far as it relates to the physical capacity of the applicant, is final. No doubt, in one of the cases quoted to us, Arnott v. Fife Coal Company,² a general proof was allowed in circumstances somewhat similar to, though not quite the same as, those here. I cannot help thinking that there must have been some mistake in that case, and that the proof was not intended to be as extensive as was allowed; and I am not satisfied that we are bound in any way by what was done in that case.

Dealing with this particular case, I think the second question should not be set aside altogether, but I think it may be better stated. It is a pity that the Sheriff-substitute put into the question the words "the capacity of a one-eyed miner." I think the proper course would be to supersede consideration of the second question, and to remit to the arbitrator to allow the respondent a proof relating to his wage-earning capacity, excluding therefrom all evidence with regard to his physical condition and his physical fitness for his ordinary work as a miner below ground.

¹ Regulations dated June 27, 1907, by the Secretary of State and the Treasury as to the duties and remuneration of medical referees in Scotland under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, Rule 10.

² 1911 S. C. 1029, 1912 S. C. 1262.

³ Gray v. Shotts Iron Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 1267, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 1272.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion. I am not surprised that Jan. 21, 1913. the Sheriff-substitute should have allowed an open proof here, following as he did the interlocutor which was pronounced in the case of *Arnot v. Fife Cruden v. Wemyss Coal Coal Company, Limited.*¹ I agree with your Lordship, however, in thinking that it is difficult to reconcile the form of the interlocutor with the opinions of the Judges who decided that case, and I am disposed to think that, if the matter had been noticed and brought before their Lordships of the First Division, the interlocutor would have been in somewhat more qualified terms.

But it is obvious that the Sheriff-substitute himself contemplates that certain matters are foreclosed by the report of the medical referee, for he says that he allows a proof only on the footing "that certain questions as to the claimant's physical capacity might be necessary and competent, although in a general way evidence on this subject was clearly incompetent." Now, I do not think it is satisfactory where the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that a general proof would be incompetent that he should nevertheless allow a proof at large on the footing that there might be certain questions which might be competent.

It is admitted by Mr MacRobert that the medical referee's report is conclusive as to the matters which he finds. It is his duty under the Act to find among other things whether the claimant is fit to resume his work; and although the referee's report is not very accurately expressed, I take him as meaning that it is his opinion that the claimant was at the date of his report fit to resume his ordinary work as a miner below ground. He has therefore decided that matter so that it is now concluded, and there can be no further inquiry with regard to it.

I agree with your Lordship that we must restrict the proof substantially as the Sheriff-substitute has himself indicated; but I think we must define that in the interlocutor, and I am quite satisfied with the terms of the interlocutor which your Lordship in the chair proposes.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The medical referee has found that the claimant ought now to be fit to resume his ordinary work as a miner below ground. I think, with Lord Salvesen, that we must take it that he means that the claimant is fit to resume his ordinary work, although the certificate is rather ambiguously expressed.

In the end, it was not denied, on the one side, that the referee is final in regard to the three matters specified in paragraph (15) of the First Schedule, namely, the condition of the workman, his fitness for employment, and the kind of employment for which he is fit. On the other side, it is not denied that although the medical referee is final in these three matters, there is another question which is involved in all these cases, and on which he is not final, namely, wage-earning capacity. It is certainly necessary that we should make it distinct that the proof of wage-earning capacity does not include evidence of the three matters to which I have just referred. I think the interlocutor which your Lordship proposes makes that quite clear.

¹ 1911 S. C. 1029, 1912 S. C. 1262.

Jan. 21, 1913.

Cruden v.
Wemyss Coal
Co., Limited.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the first question of law therein stated in the negative, and supersede consideration of the second question: Remit the cause to the arbitrator to allow the respondent in the appeal a proof relating to his wage-earning capacity, excluding therefrom all evidence with regard to his physical condition and physical fitness for his ordinary work as a miner below ground, and to proceed as accords."

D. R. TULLO, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1913.

Graham v.
Barr &
Thornton.

MRS MARY GRAHAM, Pursuer (Appellant).—D.-F. Dickson—Kirkland.

BARR & THORNTON, Defenders (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—Carmont.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Workman killed while returning from work.

A workman, employed underground in a coal mine, on finishing his day's work returned to the surface and was proceeding home by a track along the side of a private branch railway line, the property of his employers, when he was knocked down and killed by an engine at a point 400 yards distant from the mouth of the pit.

Held that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment.

Caton v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Coal Co., Limited, (1902) 4 F. 989, followed.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians, at Linlithgow, Mrs Mary Graham, widow of John Tennant Graham, coal miner, claimed compensation for herself and two pupil children, in respect that her husband was killed by an accident which arose out of and in the course of his employment with Barr & Thornton, coalmasters, Fauldhouse.

The Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) refused compensation, and at the request of the pursuer stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—

"1. The deceased was a haulage man in the employment of the respondents, who are coalmasters at Fauldhouse, at their No. 1 Cultrig Pit.

"2. There are no boundaries to mark the extent of surface occupied by the respondents, but in the immediate vicinity of the mouth of the shaft of the said pit the respondents had the usual surface colliery properties. The respondents had a colliery office about 120 yards to the west of the shaft mouth, and a private branch railway line (also the respondents' property) took the traffic westwards from the sidings at the mouth of the shaft to another private branch railway line in the joint occupation of the respondents and of the United Collieries, Limited, and thence to a branch line of the North British Railway.

"3. The aftermentioned accident to the deceased took place at a point on the respondents' said private branch railway line about 400 yards to the west of the shaft mouth, and 280 yards to the west of the said colliery office. Between the said colliery office and the point of the accident there was no property belonging to the respondent Jan. 21, 1913.

 dents except their said private branch railway line.

"4. The deceased's duties were entirely underground, and as soon as he stepped out of the cage at the mouth of the shaft his employment for the day was over, and he was at liberty to proceed at once from the shaft mouth to his home at East Benhar. (This paragraph makes a general statement).

Graham v.
 Barr &
 Thornton.

"5. And in particular on the day libelled, when the deceased had finished his work for the day and had stepped from the cage on reaching the mouth of the shaft, his duties for that day were entirely over, and accordingly he proceeded from the mouth of the shaft to his home at East Benhar.

"6. The deceased had a choice of two routes from the mouth of the shaft to his home. One route consisted of a beaten track across the moor, but this route, though shorter and not exposed to danger from railway traffic, was used by very few of the respondents' workmen. Indeed, except in summer time and after a long spell of dry weather, it was not at all a very attractive route, by reason of the depth of mud on its surface. The route which the deceased generally took was the one which the great majority of the respondents' workmen generally followed—without either the sanction or the prohibition of the respondents. It consisted of a beaten track along the side of the respondents' said private branch railway line, and was so smooth and comfortable that many bicycles were in the habit of traversing it.

"7. The deceased, following his usual custom, proceeded homewards on the date libelled from the mouth of the shaft by the said beaten track along the side of the respondents' said private branch railway line, and when at a point on the respondents' said private branch railway line about 400 yards from the mouth of the shaft he was knocked down and killed by an engine belonging to the North British Railway which worked the traffic for the respondents.

"8. At the time libelled the appellant and her said two children were the only dependants on the earnings of the deceased, and they were wholly dependent thereon.

"On the foregoing facts I inclined in law to the view (1) that though the deceased chose to go homewards from the mouth of the shaft by the respondents' private branch railway rather than go by the other route across the moor, yet in the circumstances the mere choice of route (distinguishing this case from that of Hendry v. United Collieries, Limited, 1910 S. C. 709) was not fatal to the appellant's claim; but (2) that on consideration of the question as to the existence of any relationship between the accident at the spot where it happened and the deceased's employment with the respondents, the accident could not be said to have arisen out of and in the course of that employment without disregarding two Scottish decisions, viz.:—Caton v. Summerlee and Mossend Company, 11th July 1902, 4 F. 989, and Anderson v. Fife Coal Company, Limited, 15th October 1910 S. C. 8—and, having so decided, I assoilzied the respondents with expenses."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Was I right in deciding that the accident to the deceased did not arise out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 18th and 20th December 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—It had been decided that, in certain

Jan. 21, 1913.

Graham v.
Barr &
Thornton.

circumstances, employment began before and continued after the actual working hours,¹ and in the present case the deceased was still in the course of his employment while he was on the respondents' railway line,² which, for purposes in connection with that employment, was to be regarded as part of their mine.³ Not until he left the line did he cease to be in the course of his employment,⁴ and the accident by which he was killed was one of the ordinary risks of that employment,⁵ seeing that it happened while he was traversing a recognised path within the premises over which his employers had full control.⁶ As the limits of these premises were not marked in any way, a reasonable margin had to be allowed. The case of *Kelly v. "Foam Queen"*⁷ was distinguishable from the present case because the deceased's place of work was not his home. In the cases of Caton v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Coal Company, Limited,⁸ and Anderson v. Fife Coal Company, Limited,⁹ a narrower interpretation was given to the word "employment" than was warranted by the general course of the decisions; and in the light of the generally accepted interpretation of "employment," the deceased should be held to have been in the course of his employment while on his way home and in a place where he was entitled to be.¹⁰

Argued for the respondents;—A workman did not continue in his employment until he reached his home, and an accident happening beyond a reasonable margin of distance from his place of work, as in the present case, could not be regarded as happening in the course of his employment.¹¹ Where the employers' premises were distinctly marked off, a workman might still be in course of his employment though at a little distance from his actual place of work,¹² but in the absence, as in the present case, of ascertained limits to the employers' premises the test to be applied was continuation of duty.¹³ Neither the deceased nor his employers were under any obligation with regard to his duty at the place where the accident happened, and therefore it could not be held to have arisen out of and in the course of his

¹ Brydon v. Stewart, (1855) 2 Macq. 30, Cranworth, L. C., at p. 35; Todd v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1899) 1 F. 1047, Lord M'Laren, at p. 1051.

² Mackenzie v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited, (1903) 6 F. 8, Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren, at p. 10.

³ Coal Mines Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 50), secs. 111, 122.

⁴ Walters v. Staveley Coal and Iron Co., (1911) 49 S. L. R. 623, Lord Shaw, at p. 624, 105 L. T. (N. S.) 119.

⁵ M'Laren v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1911 S. C. 1075, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 1078.

⁶ Coldrick v. Partridge, Jones, & Co., Limited, [1910] A. C. 77, Lord Shaw, at p. 82, doubting Davies v. Rhymney Iron Co., (1900) 16 T. L. R. 329; Hoskins v. Lancaster, (1910) 3 Butterworth's W. C. C. 476.

⁷ (1910) 3 Butterworth's W. C. C. 113.

⁸ (1902) 4 F. 989.

⁹ 1910 S. C. 8.

¹⁰ Sharp v. Johnson & Co., Limited, [1905] 2 K. B. 139, and Crow, Tetley, & Co. v. Catterall, not reported, but therein referred to by Collins, M. R., at p. 145; Gane v. Norton Hill Colliery Co., [1909] 2 K. B. 539.

¹¹ Walters v. Staveley Coal and Iron Co., 49 S. L. R. 623, 105 L. T. (N. S.) 119; Gilmour v. Dorman, Long, & Co., Limited, (1911) 105 L. T. (N. S.) 54.

¹² Hoskins v. Lancaster, 3 Butterworth's W. C. C. 476.

¹³ Anderson v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, 1910 S. C. 8.

employment.¹ To be run over by an engine at that place was not one of the ordinary risks of the deceased's employment.²

Jan. 21, 1918.
Graham v.
Barr &
Thornton.

At advising on 21st January 1913,—

THE COURT (without Lord Kinnear) after delivering opinions in which they referred to the similarity between the circumstances of the present case and those of the Second Division case of Caton v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Coal Company, Limited (4 F. 989), answered the question of law in the affirmative.

J. DOUGLAS GARDINER & MILL, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

MRS CATHERINE GIBB, Pursuer.—Sandeman, K.C.—MacRobert.
THE EDINBURGH AND DISTRICT TRAMWAYS COMPANY, LIMITED,
Defenders.—G. Watt, K.C.—Macmillan, K.C.—Black.

No. 73.
Jan. 23, 1913.

Reparation—Negligence—Contributory negligence—Accident—Proximate cause.

Gibb v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.

In an action of damages against a tramway company tried before a jury the pursuer's case was that, when crossing a street, she stopped in the four-foot way between two sets of car rails to allow a car to pass, and that her dress was caught by a stay that projected beneath the car and she was thrown down and run over. She maintained that had the car been provided with side guards, as it should have been, the accident would not have happened. The defenders pleaded contributory negligence, their case being that the pursuer, not looking where she was going, had herself walked into the car.

Counsel for the pursuer asked the Judge to direct the jury "that, even if they be of opinion that the pursuer contributed by her fault to the accident which happened, she is not disentitled to recover damages from the defenders, if the jury are also of opinion that reasonable care on the part of the defenders, viz., provision of side guards to the car, would have prevented the accident." His Lordship refused the direction, and the pursuer excepted to his ruling.

In a bill of exceptions held that the direction had been rightly refused in respect that, if the pursuer's own negligence was a causa proxima of the accident, the fact that there might also have been contemporaneous negligence on the part of the defenders which affected the accident did not entitle her to a verdict; and bill refused.

Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company, (1876) 1 App. Cas., distinguished, and observed, per the Lord President, that the doctrine of that case applies only where the negligence of the defender is due to an act of volition subsequent to the contributory negligence of the pursuer.

(REPORTED ante, 1912 S. C. 580.)

On 20th June 1911 Mrs Catherine Gibb brought an action against the Edinburgh and District Tramways Company, Limited, in which she claimed the sum of £2000 as damages in respect of personal 1ST DIVISION.

Lord Hunter
and a Jury.

¹ Kelly v. "Foam Queen" 3 Butterworth's W. C. C. 113; Hendry v. United Collieries, Limited, 1910 S. C. 709; Davies v. Rhymney Iron Co., Limited, 16 T. L. R. 329; Caton v. Summerlee and Mossend Iron and Coal Co., Limited, 4 F. 989.

² McLaren v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1911 S. C. 1075, Lord President, at p. 1078; Kitchenham v. Owners of s.s. "Johannesburg," [1911] 1 K. B. 523, [1911] A. C. 417.

Jan. 23, 1913.

Gibb v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.

injuries sustained by her through being knocked down and run over by a tramway car belonging to the defenders.

The pursuer averred, inter alia:—(Cond. 2) "About mid-day on 14th September 1910, when out shopping, the pursuer had occasion to cross from the east to the west side of Lothian Road at a point some yards to the north of the Edinburgh Savings Bank's branch office there, near the top of said street. Pursuer, in so crossing, saw the defenders' car, No. 81, approaching from the south, going in the direction of Princes Street, and she stopped between the two sets of tramway rails with the intention of allowing the car to pass her. There was no car approaching from the opposite direction, that is from Princes Street, near pursuer at the time. The car was travelling at full speed—at the rate of about ten miles an hour. The pursuer had taken up a position midway between the two sets of rails so as to be clear of the car, but when it was about halfway past her the lower part of the skirt of her dress was drawn in by the suction caused by the car and caught by the vertical stay on the right side of the car, or became jammed between the main stay and the body of the car. The pursuer was in consequence thrown violently to the ground and dragged by the car for some distance on the causeway on her face. The right rear wheel of the car passed over her left leg. . . ."

(Cond. 3) "The said accident was due to the fault and negligence of the defenders. The bottom end of the upright rod of said vertical stay in the car in question projected thereunder to the extent of about 1 inch. Said projection was unguarded, and was a source of great danger to a person standing at the side of the car as it passed. It was specially dangerous to a woman, as her dress is liable to be sucked in under the car as it passes and to catch on the vertical projection. Further, the main stay was unguarded, and a woman's dress is liable to be caught between the stay and the car. It was the duty of the defenders to have had both the vertical stay and the main stay guarded, but this they failed to do. Had the stays been guarded the accident would not have happened. Further, and in any event, it was the duty of the defenders to have had the side of the car between the body and between the front and back wheels guarded, and also to have had the wheels themselves guarded. This is usual and customary. The defenders failed in this duty. There was no guard at the side of the car between the wheels to prevent a person who had fallen from getting beneath the car and under the wheels, nor were the rear wheels guarded in front. Had the defenders adopted either of these precautions the accident would not have happened."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, contributory negligence, and averred:—"The pursuer left the pavement on the east side of the street to cross over to the other side without looking where she was going or observing what traffic was on the street. She walked straight forward without taking notice of anything, and quite regardless of where she was going and of the approach of the defenders' car. Her peculiar action was observed by the driver of the car, who rang his bell loudly to attract her attention, and at the same time shouted to her, as it was obvious that she was about to walk straight up against the car. Her conduct was also observed by the constable on duty at the place, and by bystanders who also shouted to her. The pursuer, however, took no notice of these repeated warnings, but continued on her course as before. The driver of the car applied both brakes hard, but before the car could be brought to a standstill the pursuer collided with the body of the car on the right-hand side, and fell to the ground, Jan. 23, 1913. and the right rear wheel of the car passed over her left leg."

On 7th December 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) allowed an issue in ordinary form for the trial of the cause, and on a reclaiming note the Court adhered.*

Gibb v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.

The trial took place on 25th and following days of June 1912 before Lord Hunter and a jury. The jury unanimously found for the defenders.

On 8th July 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) signed a bill of exceptions for the pursuer, in which it was stated:—

"The pursuer maintained [at the trial], inter alia, that the defenders were negligent in respect that they had failed to provide side guards for their cars, and that, had this precaution been adopted, the injuries to the pursuer would have been prevented.

"The pursuer led evidence to the effect that she had stood in the four-foot way between the two lines of rails waiting till the car passed; that her dress was caught by the car and she was thrown down; that had there been guards at the side of the car the injury sustained by the pursuer would in all probability have been avoided.

"The defenders maintained that the cars were safe without side guards, and led evidence to the effect that the pursuer, in a preoccupied manner, walked against the side of the car, with the result that she was thrown down on the street.

"It was common ground between the parties that the pursuer fell clear of the car, but that her leg went under the car, and was run over by the front wheel of the rear bogie.

"After the evidence of both parties had been closed, and after their respective counsel had addressed the jury, the presiding Judge charged the jury to the effect that if they came to be of opinion that the pursuer's carelessness contributed to the accident they must return a verdict for the defenders, and that the question as to their opinion with reference to the propriety of having side guards or not was immaterial. Counsel for the pursuer did then and there request the presiding Judge to direct the jury:—

"That, even if they be of opinion that the pursuer contributed by her fault to the accident which happened, she is not disentitled to recover damages from the defenders, if the jury are also of opinion that reasonable care on the part of the defenders, viz., provision of side guards to the car, would have prevented the accident."

"Which direction the presiding Judge refused to give. Whereupon the counsel for the pursuer respectfully excepted to his Lordship's refusal."

Counsel were heard before the First Division (without Lord Kinnear and with Lord Hunter) on 23rd January 1913.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in not giving the direction asked for. The question for the jury to decide was what was the causa proxima of the accident. The pursuer was entitled to have an answer to the question whether or not the causa proxima was the absence of guards. This question arose even if the jury were of opinion that the pursuer was guilty of contributory negligence.¹ The law applicable to such circumstances as the present

* Reported 1912 S. C. 580.

¹ M'Naughton v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1858) 21 D. 160, per Lord Wood, at p. 167.

Jan. 23, 1913.

Gibb v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.

was that, although the pursuer's negligence may have contributed to the accident, yet if the defenders could in the result, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened, the pursuer's negligence would not excuse them.¹ In the present case the last act of negligence was that of the defenders in leaving the side of the car unguarded. Had it not been for that act the ultimate injury, that is the injury to the pursuer's leg, would not have happened.

Argued for the defenders;—The law laid down in Radley's case² did not apply. In order to give rise to circumstances to which that law would apply there must be a new act of volition, or the opportunity for a new act of volition, on the part of defenders after the pursuer's act of negligence. There was no such opportunity here. If it were an act of negligence to have no side guards upon the car, it would be necessary for the pursuer to show that this act of negligence could have been remedied after the pursuer's negligent act of walking into the passing car. This was a plain case where the pursuer was injured through her own fault without fault on the part of the defenders, or at highest where there was want of reasonable care on both sides; in neither of which cases could the pursuer recover from the defenders.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of damages at the instance of a lady who met with an accident by being run over by one of the tramway cars belonging to the Edinburgh and District Tramways Company. She did not allege in her action any fault on the part of the driver of the car, but her complaint was that the car was not provided, as it ought to have been, with a side guard filling up the space between the front and the back wheels. She said that the provision of such side guards was a proper precaution adopted elsewhere, and that the absence of them constituted negligence on the part of the defenders. She averred that, if there had been side guards, it would not have been possible for her leg to get under the car. The Tramway Company put in defences in which they admitted that there were no guards. They contended that the side guard was not a proper contrivance, and that, while it might prevent one class of accidents, it courted another, and that there was no negligence in the facts in which she averred negligence to be. But they also said that the real cause of the accident was the pursuer's own actings, in respect that she had simply walked into the car while it was in motion and so was run over. This was denied by the pursuer.

In that state of matters your Lordships, upon a former occasion, held that there was a relevant case made, and sent it for trial to a jury upon the usual issue of fault.

The learned Judge, after hearing evidence which was directed, on both sides, to making good the points which I have just mentioned as being in the pleadings, charged the jury—and now I am reading from the statement in the bill of exceptions—"charged the jury to the effect that if they came Jan. 23, 1913. to be of opinion that the pursuer's carelessness contributed to the accident, Gibb v. they must return a verdict for the defenders, and the question as to their Edinburgh opinion with reference to the propriety of having side guards or not was and District immaterial." Now, the learned counsel for the defenders did not take any Tramways Co., Limited. exception to that portion of the charge. If that is so, they cannot be heard Ld. President. now to say that that portion of the charge was misleading. It would be possible to argue that, if that sentence which is quoted in the bill of exceptions had been the only thing that the learned Judge said, it might have been misleading, because it would be possible to argue upon the question of what the true meaning of "carelessness" is, and it would be possible to argue upon the true meaning of the words "contributed to the accident"; and it is only after the words "contributed to the accident" that the Lord Ordinary goes on to say that "the question as to their opinion with reference to the propriety of having side guards or not was immaterial." But inasmuch as they have not excepted, I think, in accordance with the well-known practice of this Court, we must hold that there was no ambiguity, because these matters had been explained in the other portions of the learned Judge's charge which are not here quoted. And I have no doubt whatsoever that they were so explained; no Judge, I am certain, ever charges a jury upon the question of contributory negligence without explaining to them what the true meaning of the word "contributory" is, and I have no doubt it was done here. I may mention here that I think the leading authority upon this matter is the opinion of Lord Young in the case of Woods v. Caledonian Railway Company.¹ In the same way, I think that the expression "carelessness" must be taken with the evidence that we know was led upon the only point which was alleged, namely, that the pursuer walked into the car.

¹ Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Co., (1876) 1 App. Cas. 754, per Lord Penzance, at p. 759; Mitchell v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1909 S. C. 746.

² 1 App. Cas. 754, at p. 759.

³ The "Bernina," (1887) 12 P. D. 58, per Lindley, L.J., at p. 89.

Now, that having all been satisfactorily explained to the jury in a way which one must consider was proper and in accordance with the law, the learned counsel afterwards asked the Judge to add to what he had already said the following: "That, even if they"—the jury—"be of opinion that the pursuer contributed, by her fault, to the accident which happened"—and again I say that here the words must be taken in their true sense—that is to say, as meaning that she contributed materially to the cause of the accident—"she is not disentitled to recover damages from the defenders, if the jury are also of opinion that reasonable care on the part of the defenders, viz., provision of side guards to the car, would have prevented the accident." The learned Judge refused that direction, and to that refusal exception is taken.

I am of opinion that the learned Judge very rightly refused that direction, because I think it would have been either a wrong direction or, at least, a misleading direction. The learned counsel for the pursuer bases his argument on this, that it always comes to be a question of what is the actual causa proxima of the accident, and then he defines the accident here as the loss of the pursuer's leg. "Now," he says, "I was entitled to maintain to the jury that the actual particular accident, to wit, the loss of the leg, would

¹ (1886) 13 R. 1118.

Jan. 23, 1913.

Gibb v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.

Ld. President.

not have occurred if there had been a side guard ; and if the failure to provide a side guard is a negligent act, then the loss of the leg is due to that negligent act and to that act alone, and has nothing to do with the question of the pursuer walking into the car, and I did not have an opportunity of pleading this with effect to the jury, because the direction which was asked for was not given."

I think there are two fallacies in that argument. In the first place, I do not think that the accident, in the strict sense of the word, or rather—because I wish to use what I think is the proper word—the legal wrong for which the pursuer is suing is the loss of the leg. The legal wrong was the car running over the pursuer. After that it was more or less luck what happened. No doubt the pursuer's damage would be measured by what happened, and she would recover much more damages, if the defenders are in fault, for the loss of the leg than she would have recovered for a trifling injury or scratch. But that is not really the legal wrong: the legal wrong is running over her. I think that is the first fallacy.

The second fallacy is the assumption that it could be still in the pursuer's mouth to say that the proximate cause of the accident was the want of the guard in a case where the jury had come to the conclusion that the pursuer had been guilty of contributory negligence in the proper sense of the word. Of course, if the jury had not come to the conclusion that the pursuer had been guilty of contributory negligence, then cadit questio,—there is nothing else left but the possible fault of the Tramway Company in not providing the guard. And such a case might have arisen on other facts at the trial. Supposing it had been the case that the pursuer was standing, not on the tramway line, but in its vicinity, and that she had, by no fault of her own, been violently thrown upon the tramway lines—by the fault of somebody else coming up behind her, or through the pressure of a crowd, or anything of that sort,—and then she had been run over by the tramway car, that would have raised the pure question of whether there was negligence on the part of the Tramway Company in not having a side guard. But in this case Lord Hunter only put that matter to the jury in the event of their coming to the conclusion that she had not been, in the proper sense of the word, guilty of contributory negligence. But if it is once found that, in the proper sense, she had been guilty of contributory negligence, I think it is tantamount to a finding that the want of the guard is not the only causa proxima of the accident. The truth is that, although causa proxima is used in the singular, yet no doubt there are cases where the accident is so much the result of the actions of two different parties, that the act of both or of one or other, or rather the acts of the two combined, are truly the causa proxima.

The only other thing I have to say is that I respectfully entirely agree with the analysis of the various positions which are set forth by Lord Lindley in the case of the "Bernina,"¹ which was cited to us by Mr Macmillan, and when you come to consider the facts of this case, it is certain that the case comes under one of the categories in which he says that A, the injured party, could not sue B, who is supposed to be the injurer.

No one doubts the proposition that is generally associated with the case of Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company.¹ The learned Judge, who presided at the trial of this case, has told us that he explained that to the jury. I do not think, on the facts of this case, that he need have done so, because the facts of this case do not seem to me to raise a case analagous to the case of Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company.¹ In other words, I do not think there is any instance of the doctrine of Radley's case¹ except instances in which the subsequent negligence is due to a subsequent act of volition. Now, here there was no room for a subsequent act of volition, because nobody says that, after the lady stepped into the track of the tramway lines, it would have been possible for the Tramway Company to have let down a side guard. And, accordingly, the original negligence in not having a side guard—if that was negligence—could never have been made to do duty again for the subsequent act of negligence which may infer liability, as in Radley.¹

¹ 12 P. D. 58, at p. 89.

Jan. 23, 1913.
Gibb v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

On the whole matter, therefore, I think that the bill of exceptions must be refused.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship on the following—it may be somewhat narrow, but to me sufficient—ground, namely, that the result of the argument for the pursuer is that an injured person cannot commit, or rather be responsible for, contributory negligence if the primary negligence is of such a character that it is continuous before, during, and after the accident. There is nothing in the authorities, so far as I can see, to justify this result, and its mere statement satisfies me that the argument itself is unsound. While I base my own judgment upon that somewhat narrow ground, I desire to say that I entirely agree with the wider views expressed by your Lordship.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship that, when the circumstances under which the accident happened are explained, it is clear that the direction was rightly refused. In a case of this kind, the succession in point of time appears to me to be essential, and, as the act which immediately preceded the accident was that the pursuer walked up against the side of the car, the question of setting up subsequent negligence on the part of the defenders does not arise. It is impossible, that being the act which immediately preceded the accident, that there could be any opportunity for subsequent negligence on the part of the defenders—that is to say, you cannot use the want of the side guard as negligence subsequent to that act of the pursuer which was the proximate cause of the accident. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the bill of exceptions should be refused.

LORD HUNTER.—I concur. I may say I only referred to Radley's case¹ because counsel for the pursuer argued at length upon it, and asked me to direct the jury upon the lines of Radley's case.¹ I explained Radley's case¹ to the jury, and asked them to disregard it in so far as the law I was laying down to them was concerned.

THE COURT refused the bill of exceptions.

CONNELL & CAMPBELL, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ 1 App. Cas. 754.

No. 74.

(Poor) MISS MAY M'KEAN, Petitioner (Respondent).—

Jan. 24, 1913.

W. A. Fleming.

JAMES HERBISON, Respondent (Appellant).—*Aitchison.*M'Kean v.
Herbison.Poor's-roll—Sheriff—Reporters on probabilis causa litigandi—Applicant's agent acting as reporter on her application.

It is incompetent for a procurator for the poor in the Sheriff Court, who is acting as agent for an applicant for the benefit of the poor's-roll, to act as a reporter on probabilis causa litigandi with regard to that application.

2D DIVISION. MISS MAY M'KEAN, Yoker, presented an application in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton for the benefit of the poor's-roll for the purpose of prosecuting an action against James Herbison, Dalnuir. This application was signed by Andrew Duncan, one of the agents for the poor. The Sheriff-substitute (Macdiarmid) remitted to "any two agents for the poor to inquire and report" whether the applicant had a probable cause of action.* A report by two agents for the poor, one of whom was Andrew Duncan, the agent who had signed the application for admission to the roll, to the effect that, after inquiry, she had been found to have a probable cause of action, having been submitted, the applicant was, by interlocutor (dated 30th December 1912) of the honorary Sheriff-substitute (W. M. Henderson), admitted to the roll.

Herbison thereupon appealed to the Court of Session. On the case appearing in the Single Bills of the Second Division on 24th January 1913, counsel for the appellant objected to the respondent's admission to the roll, in respect that one of the two reporters on probabilis causa litigandi who had reported on the respondent's application was the agent who was acting for her at the time.

THE COURT (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the proceedings before the agents for the poor on the remit to them by the Sheriff-substitute were irregular and incompetent in respect that the agent for the applicant was one of the two agents who reported in favour of the admission of the applicant: Hoc statu recall the interlocutor of 30th December 1912, and remit the petition to the Sheriff to remit of new to the agents for the poor to inquire and report, and thereafter to proceed as accords."

SHIELD & PURVIS, S.S.C.—DOVE, LOCKHART, & SMART, S.S.C.—Agents.

* The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), enacts:—First Schedule, Rule 163. "The Sheriff shall remit the application [for the benefit of the poor's-roll] to the procurators for the poor, who shall notify the parties, and after inquiry shall make a report to the Sheriff."

MRS M. WALLS OR DRYLIE AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).— No. 75.

D.-F. Dickson—Wilton.

THE ALLOA COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).— Jan. 25, 1913.

Horne, K.C.—Carmont.

Drylie v.
Alloa Coal
Co., Limited.

*Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—
"Accident"—Pneumonia following upon chill—Chill due to partial immersion in water accumulating in a mine through breakdown of a pump.*

During the working time in a coalpit, which was a wet pit, water began to accumulate owing to a defect in the pump; and the pump being stopped for repair, the water accumulated still further. When the miners found the water rising they decided to leave the pit, and hastened to the pit bottom, where they were kept waiting for twenty minutes, during which time they were severely chilled by the water which rose to their knees, and by exposure to the current of cold air descending the shaft. One of these miners on reaching the pit head lingered there for at least twenty minutes, and on arriving at his home complained of chill, and next day suffered from a cough, hoarseness, and pains, but went to his work. After several days—on three of which he worked at the pit—he was found to be suffering from pneumonia, of which he ultimately died.

In an application by his dependants for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the arbitrator awarded compensation, holding that the pneumonia was due to the chill which the deceased had received, and that his death resulted from injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

In an appeal a Court of Seven Judges (diss. Lord Salvesen) held that the occurrence in the mine on the day in question was an "accident," and that there was evidence on which the arbitrator might competently find that the deceased's pneumonia was due to that occurrence; and affirmed the arbitrator's decision.

MRS MARGARET WALLS OR DRYLIE, widow of John Drylie, a brushing contractor in the employment of the Alloa Coal Company, Limited (on behalf of herself and her pupil children), and her son John Drylie junior, presented an application in the Sheriff Court at Alloa for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of John Drylie's death. The Sheriff-substitute (Leslie), after hearing the case with the assistance of a medical assessor, awarded compensation, and at the request of the employers stated a case for appeal.

2D DIVISION,
with three consulted Judges.
Sheriff of Stirling, Dum-
barton, and Clackmannan.

The case set forth that on 25th September 1911 while Drylie, who was a healthy man, "was at work along with two other men in the defenders' Brucefield Pit, owing to a defect in the pump, water began to accumulate at the pit bottom; that the pump was stopped in order that this defect might be remedied; that the stoppage allowed the water still further to accumulate; that when the men found the water rising they became somewhat alarmed, and decided to leave their work and the pit; that they arrived at the pit bottom heated from the exertion of their work and their haste on the way to the shaft; that the cage did not descend for them in reply to their signals until they had stood for about twenty minutes at the pit bottom while the repair to the pump was being completed; that, while they were standing there, the water rose two inches, until they were immersed up to the knees in icy-cold water; that there was a draught of cold air falling down the shaft upon them; that they were

Jan. 25, 1913.

Drylie v.
Alloa Coal
Co., Limited.

severely chilled by this exposure ; that on reaching the pit head the deceased John Drylie remained hanging about for twenty minutes or half an hour ; that he complained of chill on arrival at his house ; that on the following day, Tuesday, 26th September, he suffered from cough, hoarseness, and pains, but went to his work ; that he left his work early ; that the next day, Wednesday, was an idle day, and he only left his house to arrange about his pay lines ; that occasionally while quite well he did not remain a full shift in the pit ; that on Thursday and Friday he was again at work, but not for the full shifts ; that his cough continued during these days ; that on Friday, 29th September, he was shivering, and complained of cold all over ; that on Saturday, 30th September, he was seen by a doctor, who suspected pneumonia ; that on Sunday, 1st October, the doctor was assured that he was suffering from pneumonia ; that on 8th October John Drylie died of pneumonia ; that the Brucefield Pit is a wet pit ; that the workmen there generally get wet at their work ; that John Drylie was exposed to wetting at his work on the days following 25th September ; that it was unusual for water to accumulate in the pit to the depth of two feet ; that it was unusual to repair the pump when men were at work in the pit ; that the pneumonia from which deceased died was due to the chill which he received on 25th September ; that his remaining at the pit head in his wet condition, and his working on the days following, and his wetting on these days, had not a favourable effect upon the illness caused by the chill on 25th September ; that the pneumonia from which deceased died was a natural sequence of the chill to which he was exposed on 25th September.

"On these facts I found (1) that the death of the deceased John Drylie resulted from injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants ; (2) that the respondents were entitled to compensation from the appellants in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, to the amount of £265, 3s. 8d."

The question of law was :—"Did the death of the deceased John Drylie result from injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants ?"

The case, after a hearing before the Second Division on 7th, 8th, and 12th June 1912 was sent, in respect of the importance of the question submitted, to a Court of Seven Judges ; and it was again heard before the Second Division, with the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Mackenzie, on 19th and 20th December 1912.

Argued for the appellants ;—(1) There was no "injury by accident" in this case. The word "accident" must be construed in the popular sense¹ ; and accordingly the applicant must prove some incident happening at a particular place and date which caused the injury.² There was nothing of that kind here, for all that occurred was that the deceased contracted a chill, and no one would call that an accident. The cases of Sheerin v. Clayton & Company,³ and Yates

¹ Fenton v. Thorley & Co., Limited, [1903] A. C. 443, per Lord Macnaghten, at p. 448 ; Brintons, Limited, v. Turvey, [1905] A. C. 230, per Halsbury, L.C., at p. 232. Ismay, Imrie, & Co. v. Williamson, [1908] A. C. 437, and Clover, Clayton, & Co., Limited, v. Hughes, [1910] A. C. 242, were also referred to.

² Eke v. Hart-Dyke, [1910] 2 K. B. 677.

³ [1910] 2 I. R. 105.

v. South Kirkby, &c., Collieries, Limited,¹ were not consistent with the decisions of the House of Lords, and were wrongly decided.² (2) The injury did not arise out of the deceased's employment. To get wet and chilled was not a risk peculiar to or usually connected with the employment,³ and in this respect the present case was distinguished from such cases as poisoning by sewer gas⁴ or by carbon-monoxide gas.⁵ Further, there was no evidence to connect the deceased's death with what happened in the mine. None of the other miners who were exposed to the same conditions as Drylie suffered from pneumonia; and it was quite as probable that Drylie's death was due to his having lingered at the pit head as to his having waited at the bottom of the pit. His conduct made it impossible to hold that there was the necessary causal connection between the alleged accident and his death⁶; and, that being so, the Court ought to reverse the arbitrator's decision.⁷

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The stoppage of the pump owing to its defective state was an accident; or, at all events, the stoppage of the pump and the consequent accumulation of water where the miners were compelled to wait was an accident. To satisfy the definition of the words "injury by accident" it was not necessary to prove any direct physical injury or lesion; thus a "physiological injury"⁸ or nervous shock⁹ was an accident.¹⁰ (2) Drylie's death was due to the accident in the mine. The accident did not require to be the immediate,¹¹ or the sole,¹² cause of the workman's injury or death; it was enough if the injury or death could be traced to the accident.¹³ Here the necessary connection was established. But

¹ [1910] 2 K. B. 538.

² Ystradowen Colliery Co., Limited v. Griffiths, [1909] 2 K. B. 533; M'Millan v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Limited, supra, p. 346; Martin v. Corporation of Manchester, (1912) 28 T. L. R. 344, 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 259.

³ Blakey v. Robson, Eckford, & Co., 1912 S. C. 334; Rodger v. Paisley School Board, 1912 S. C. 584; Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union, (1912) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 355.

⁴ Eke v. Hart-Dyke, [1910] 2 K. B. 677.

⁵ Kelly v. Auchenlea Coal Co., Limited, 1911 S. C. 864.

⁶ Dowds v. Bennie & Son, (1902) 5 F. 268; Chandler v. Great Western Railway Co., (1912) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 254, per Fletcher-Moulton, L.J., at p. 257.

⁷ Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited, supra, p. 331; Martin v. Corporation of Manchester, 28 T. L. R. 344, 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 259.

⁸ Stewart v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Limited, (1902) 5 F. 120, per Lord M'Laren, at p. 122.

⁹ Yates v. South Kirkby, &c., Collieries, Limited, [1910] 2 K. B. 538.

¹⁰ Morgan v. Owners of s.s. "Zenaida", (1909) 25 T. L. R. 446; Warner v. Couchman, [1911] 1 K. B. 351, [1912] A. C. 35; Pugh v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., [1896] 2 Q. B. 248; Malone v. Cayzer, Irvine, & Co., 1908 S. C. 479; Sheerin v. Clayton & Co., [1910] 2 I. R. 105, were referred to.

¹¹ In re Etherington and The Lancashire and Yorkshire Accident Insurance Co., [1909] 1 K. B. 591, at pp. 598 and 603.

¹² Clover, Clayton, & Co., Limited, v. Hughes, [1910] A. C. 242; Isamay, Imrie, & Co. v. Williamson, [1908] A. C. 437.

¹³ Dunham v. Clare, [1902] 2 K. B. 292; Golder v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1902) 5 F. 123; M'Innes v. Dunsmuir & Jackson, 1908 S. C. 1021;

Jan. 25, 1913. supposing the Court were of opinion that it was not, the question being one of fact, the arbitrator's decision could not be disturbed unless there was absolutely no evidence to warrant his finding¹; and as that could not be maintained here, the decision on this point must stand.

Drylie v.
Alloa Coal
Co., Limited.

At advising on 25th January 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—This case seems to me to lie very near the line which separates liability and non-liability for compensation by an employer. The Sheriff-substitute has decided that it lies on the side inferring liability; and I do not see any sufficient ground for disturbing his decision.

The difficulty of the case is to a large extent caused by the unsatisfactory way in which some of the findings are expressed; but the gist of the facts found may, I think, be summarised as follows—I quote the actual words where it seems advisable to do so. On 25th September 1911 the workman, John Drylie, a healthy man of forty-five, was engaged at his work in the appellants' Brucefield pit—a "wet pit," where the employees usually get wet at their work. Owing to a defect in the pump, water began to accumulate at the pit bottom; the pump was stopped, in order to repair it; and the "stoppage allowed the water still further to accumulate." The men, becoming alarmed at the rising water, decided to leave work and the pit; they reached the pit bottom heated by the exertion of their work and their haste; and the cage did not descend for them, in reply to their signals, until they had stood for about twenty minutes, while the repair to the pump was being completed. The water, icy-cold, rose up to their knees, and a draught of cold air was falling from the shaft upon them. "They were severely chilled by this exposure." On reaching the pit head Drylie remained hanging about for twenty or thirty minutes; he "complained of chill" on arriving at his house; and, on the 26th, suffered from cough, hoarseness, and pains, but went to his work, which he left early. On the 27th, an idle day, he only left his house to arrange about his pay lines. On the 28th and 29th he was at work, but not for the full shifts; his cough continued during these days, and on the 29th he was shivering, and complained of cold all over; on the 26th, 28th, and 29th he was (as was usual) exposed to wetting at his work. On the 30th Drylie was seen by a doctor, who suspected pneumonia; on 1st October "the doctor was assured that he was suffering from pneumonia"; and on 8th October he died of pneumonia. The arbitrator further finds "that it was unusual for water to Jan. 25, 1918. accumulate in the pit to the depth of two feet; that it was unusual to Drylie v. repair the pump when men were at work in the pit; that the pneumonia Allosa Coal from which deceased died was due to the chill which he received on 25th Co., Limited. September; that his remaining at the pit head in his wet condition, and Lord Dundas. his working on the days following, and his wetting on these days, had not a favourable effect upon the illness caused by the chill on 25th September; that the pneumonia from which deceased died was a natural sequence of the chill to which he was exposed on 25th September." On these facts the Sheriff-substitute found that Drylie's death resulted from injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants, and awarded compensation to his dependants. The question of law is, as too often happens, badly stated. It ought to have been in the form given in Euman,¹ or in substantially similar words.

Dunnigan v. Cavan & Lind, 1911 S. C. 579; Kelly v. Auchanlea Coal Co., Limited, 1911 S. C. 864; Thoburn v. Bedlington Coal Co., Limited, (1911) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 128; Stapleton v. Dinnington Main Coal Co., Limited, (1912) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 602, were referred to.

¹ Warnock v. Glasgow Iron and Steel Co., Limited, (1904) 6 F. 474; Spence v. William Baird & Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 343; Mitchell v. The Glamorgan Coal Co., Limited, (1907) 23 T. L. R. 588; Hawkins v. Powells Tillery Steam Coal Co., Limited, [1911] 1 K. B. 988; Richard Evans & Co., Limited, v. Astley, [1911] A. C. 674; "Swansea Vale" Owners v. Rice, [1912] A. C. 238; Grant v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., 1908 S. C. 187; Coe v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, 1909 S. C. 393, at p. 396; Mackinnon v. Miller, 1909 S. C. 373; Euman v. Dalziel & Co., 1912 S. C. 966, and supra, p. 246.

The appellants' counsel maintained that there was here no accident at all within the meaning of the Act; and alternatively, that, if there was such an accident, there was no evidence to justify the arbitrator in attributing the man's death to it.

The words "accident" and "personal injury by accident" occurring in the Act of 1906 and the earlier Act of 1897 have been frequently interpreted and applied by the Courts, and particularly by the House of Lords. In Murray v. Denholm & Company,² I took occasion to examine with some care the pronouncements of the House upon this point, and I refer to my observations without repeating them. The guiding rules laid down by Lord Macnaghten in Fenton v. Thorley & Company, Limited,³ and again in Clover, Clayton, & Company, Limited, v. Hughes,⁴ and since then repeatedly adopted and re-affirmed by the House of Lords, would seem to be simple and clear enough to follow; but, as many subsequent decisions testify, it has not always been found easy to apply them consistently and satisfactorily to the manifold and varying circumstances which are constantly brought before the Courts. In a recent Irish case, not unlike the present in some respects, where the applicants were successful, the Lord Chancellor (Sir Samuel Walker) observed that "the word 'accident' has, where used in this statute, long ceased to have the meaning the man in the street would attribute to it."⁵ But I think one may postulate, as a result of all the decisions, that you must have a definite "accident" of some sort—not necessarily an occurrence extraneous to the workman—involving something unusual, unexpected, and undesigned, to which the injury or death can be unequivocally—or at least, by a reasonably inferred train of causation in fact—attributed; and also, probably as a corollary, that death from disease—apart from the industrial diseases specially mentioned in the Act of 1906 and subsequent statutory rules and orders—is not an "accident," unless the disease which caused death can be definitely collocated in the relation of effect to cause with some unusual, unexpected, and undesigned event arising, at an ascertained time, out of the employment. Examples of an "accident" where there was no "extraneous occurrence" are seen in Fenton,³ Clover, Clayton,

¹ 1912 S. C. 966.² 1911 S. C. 1087.³ [1903] A. C. 443.⁴ [1910] A. C. 242.⁵ Sheerin v. Clayton & Co., [1910] 2 I. R. 105.

Jan. 25, 1913. *Drylie v. Alloa Coal Co., Limited.*¹ and *M'Innes.*² The necessity for a sufficient train of causation in fact, though not necessarily as matter of natural or probable sequence, is illustrated, e.g., in *Malone,*³ *Dunham,*⁴ and *Ystradowen Colliery Company, Limited.*⁵ Cases in which death from disease was held to have been caused, or sufficiently contributed to, by personal injury by accident are found in, e.g., *Brintons, Limited,*⁶ *Dunnigan,*⁷ and *Kelly*⁸; while a contrary result is illustrated, e.g., by *Eke,*⁹ *Steel,*¹⁰ and *Broderick.*¹¹ Kelly's case⁸ has some features of special similarity to the present. The workman's death was caused by pneumonia, contracted owing to inhalation of carbon-monoxide gas in a mine. There was also an incident of delay in cold and draught at the pit bottom. It appeared that death from pneumonia was not a usual occurrence from blastings generating the gas—it was apparently unprecedented; but on this occasion a lethal dose had been unexpectedly generated and administered to the workman. The Court declined to interfere with the arbitrator's decision in favour of the applicants. If Kelly's case⁸ was rightly decided, as I think it was, it seems to carry the respondents here a long way towards success. The circumstance of Drylie finding himself immersed to the knees in icy-cold water was abnormal; it, in its turn, was, as matter of fact, due to an abnormal cause—the stopping of the pump while men were at work in the pit; and, if the pneumonia of which he died was in fact caused by his immersion, I think the elements of an “accident” are here present. That the immersion and its consequences arose out of, as well as in the course of, his employment seems clear enough. The man when at his work in the pit left his place owing to the rising water, and had to go to the pit bottom for his means of exit from the pit. Now, whether or not the pneumonia which caused Drylie's death resulted directly from his having been “chilled,” or having “contracted a chill”—the two things are, I apprehend, pathologically distinct, but I take either hypothesis—is a question of fact. The arbitrator, who heard medical evidence on both sides, and also had the advantage of the assistance and advice of a medical assessor, found in fact “that the pneumonia from which deceased died was due to the chill which he received on 25th September.” I think this finding must mean that the arbitrator drew the inference from the evidence before him that the pneumonia (and death) resulted directly from the man's immersion in icy-cold water at the pit bottom on the given date; and I cannot say that he could not competently so find. I am therefore of opinion, as I was after the hearing in the Second Division, that the appellants have failed to show cause for disturbing the arbitrator's decision.

I am keenly alive to the kind of danger which the Lord President has more than once alluded to when he spoke of the driving force of step-by-step decisions towards an ultimate point un contemplated at the outset. But I do not think the present case, if determined as I think it should be, would mark any new departure in decision; and I take it that the Court will

¹ [1910] A. C. 242.

² 1908 S. C. 1021.

³ 1908 S. C. 479.

⁴ [1902] 2 K. B. 292.

⁵ [1909] 2 K. B. 533.

⁶ [1905] A. C. 230.

⁷ 1911 S. C. 579.

⁸ 1911 S. C. 864.

⁹ [1910] 2 K. B. 677.

¹⁰ [1905] 2 K. B. 232.

¹¹ [1908] 2 K. B. 807.

always find grounds for calling a halt when they are invited to proceed to Jan. 25, 1913. extreme and unreasonable conclusions (cf. M'Millan v. Singer Company, Limited,¹ and *Spence*²). The present case could never be fairly cited in the future as indicating that the Court is willing to hold that a mere ordinary disease (e.g., pneumonia) entitles a workman to compensation; the Court must be satisfied—or be unable to say that an arbitrator had not, on the facts, ground upon which he might reasonably be satisfied—that the disease was attributable to some particular event or occurrence of an unusual and unexpected character, incidental to the employment, which could, in the light of the decisions, be fairly described as an accident.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When this case was heard before the Second Division, the opinion I formed was in accordance with that now expressed by Lord Dundas. But there being a difference of opinion on the bench, and the case being one relating to the application of the Act of Parliament to cases of injury due to causes which, as was expressed in the Appeal Court, were not such as would be called “accidents” by the “man in the street,” I thought it advisable, and my brethren concurred with me that it would be right, to have the case disposed of by a larger bench. With the advantage of another debate from the bar, and consultation with your Lordships who sat at the rehearing, my opinion in favour of the respondents has been confirmed. Lord Dundas has fully and clearly expressed the views which lead me to the conclusion I have formed, and I adopt them in every particular, and content myself with expressing my concurrence in his opinion.

LORD SALVESEN.—This case is one of the most important that we have had to determine under the Workmen's Compensation Act, as it is the first in which an arbitrator has decided that a death which resulted from pneumonia ensuing on a neglected cold was a death resulting from injury by accident. Pneumonia is well known to be at present one of the most common diseases, and latterly it has become responsible for an increasing share in the mortality of the people of Scotland. The case therefore requires the most careful consideration, as, if decided in accordance with the views of the Sheriff-substitute, it opens up an endless vista of litigation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and would tend to extend the application of the Act to numerous cases which can scarcely have been contemplated by its framers.

The first question is whether the deceased miner suffered an injury by accident. In my opinion there was no accident in the sense in which the Courts have hitherto held that the word “accident” falls to be construed, i.e., in its ordinary and popular acceptation. That there was an accident to the pumping machinery in the appellants' mine is perhaps true, and it is also true that in consequence there was a greater accumulation of water in the pit than was ordinarily met with even in this wet mine, where (as it is expressly found) the miners generally get wet at their work. But would anyone say in popular language that the deceased had met with an accident

¹ Supra, p. 346.

² 1912 S. C. 343.

Jan. 25, 1913. because he required to stand for some twenty minutes at the bottom of the pit in water which gradually rose so that he was ultimately immersed up to the knees? If so the other men who were with him at the time equally met with an accident, because they all stood in the pit bottom during the same time and under exactly the same conditions. I cannot imagine that any of these men when they came to the pit head would have so described their experience. It was argued that the decisions, especially some in the House of Lords to which we were referred, have extended the definition of "accident" so as to include an occurrence of this kind; but I do not think any of the cases cited is really in point; and I notice that even in the most recent the general rule prescribed for the guidance of inferior Courts already referred to still holds its own. There is no case where a death from a disease such as pneumonia has been held to be a death resulting from an injury by accident, because it might be with more or less probability attributed to an accidental exposure to wet or cold. In the case of *Eitherington*¹ it was held that the representatives of a man who was insured under an accident policy, and who died of pneumonia in consequence of his having had a heavy fall on wet ground while hunting, were entitled to recover under the policy. In that case, however, the decision was reached on considerations which cannot be taken into account in cases arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act; as for instance that the construction of the policy contended for by the insurance company would limit their liability in a way that could not have been contemplated by the other contracting party. Apart from this the decision appears to me to be well warranted by the fact that pneumonia immediately supervened on what undoubtedly in popular language would be described as an accident.

The only case decided in the House of Lords, so far as I am aware, where a death from disease not preceded by some direct lesion was held to be a death resulting from injury by accident is the well-known anthrax case (*Brintons, Limited, v. Turvey*²). In that case there was a vigorous dissent by Lord Robertson, and the Judges who formed the majority were careful to guard against the decision being extended to ordinary cases of disease. Thus Lord Lindley said: "I hope that the decision in this case will not be regarded as involving the doctrine that all diseases caught by a workman in the course of his employment are to be regarded as accidents within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. That is very far from being my view of the Act, and I concur with the observations made by Cosens-Hardy, L.J., on this point at the end of his judgment"; and Lord Chancellor Halsbury said: "I so far agree with my noble and learned friend that I think, in popular phraseology, from which we are to seek our guidance, it excludes, and was intended to exclude, idiopathic disease." The ground of the decision really was that the accident consisted in a particle of matter striking the man in the corner of his eye, and so causing some abrasion through which the infection was communicated to his body. It is true that the County Court Judge had found that there was no abrasion of the eye, but Lord Macnaghten pointed out that the medical evidence seemed to be that without some abrasion infection was hardly possible. The illustrations given by the Lord Chancellor are all of accidents in the popular sense Jan. 25, 1913.

¹ [1909] 1 K. B. 591.

² [1905] A. C. 230.

 causing a wound, and so permitting the entry into the body of the germs Drylie v.
 of erysipelas, tetanus, or the like. If so, this decision is quite in accordance Alloa Coal with the principle given effect to in other cases, although its application to Co., Limited.
 the particular facts might well have given rise to acute divergence of opinion. Lord Salvesen.
 It is a different thing to say that, because of the decision in Brintons' case,¹ we are to hold that pneumonia contracted by a workman in the course of his employment, through some accidental exposure having occurred which made him more or less liable to contract the disease, is to be treated as an injury resulting from accident.

Let me illustrate what I mean by a few concrete cases. A workman is employed by his master to take a journey by train. He arrives at the station to find that his train has been delayed by an accident. He has to wait for some time, exposed, it may be, to wet or merely to a cold draught, and in consequence catches a cold which he neglects, and which ultimately produces pneumonia which carries him off. Could any reasonable person say that he had been injured by accident, or that his death had resulted from injury by accident? Again, a window is accidentally broken in a factory, and it happens to be a cold day outside. One of the workmen contracts a cold from the draught to which he is exposed owing to the window having been broken. Can it be affirmed that the cold was the result of an injury by accident? Similar illustrations might be multiplied; yet in all such cases, if we are to affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, it will be open for the arbitrator to find, if he were bold enough to attribute the disease to a particular exposure resulting from some accidental occurrence, that it was the result of an injury by accident within the meaning of the Act. I do not know where the liability would stop if this principle were once recognised. It may be assumed that every workman who catches a cold must have been exposed to conditions which were somewhat out of the ordinary. If a wetting produced by a breakdown of a pump in a wet mine is an accident, although it produces no ascertainable effect upon the parts exposed, how can that be distinguished from a wetting resulting from a heavy rainfall which made the mine wetter than usual on the day on which the cold was said to have been caught? Or, again, suppose that a miner had had to wait at the bottom of the pit somewhat longer than usual, owing either to the negligence of the men who worked the cage or to an unusual number of men having to be taken up on the particular day, and was exposed in consequence for some minutes longer than usual to the cold draught prevailing at such places, and that he caught a cold which might or might not terminate fatally, can he or his representatives recover on the footing that he sustained an injury by accident? Great importance was attached by the respondents' counsel to the circumstance that there was in this case an accident to the pumping machinery. That appears to me to be an entirely irrelevant consideration. The question is whether the man met with an accident. It is true that if the water had risen so high that he had been drowned, or if hot water had escaped from a boiler used in the pit, and he had died from contact with it, his death would rightly be attributed to

¹ [1905] A. C. 230.

Jan. 25, 1913. accident; but in each of these cases it would have been the result of some external agency, contact with which had produced an injury. Medical men tell us that pneumonia is caused by the multiplication of the germs of the pneumonia coccus, which exist in the respiratory organs of most healthy people, but which are harmless until the vitality has been markedly impaired. These scientific theories are not common knowledge; and I think it would surprise the man on the street if he were told that a person who died from pneumonia, contracted, as that disease usually is, by exposure to cold, had died from accident. The case of traumatic pneumonia is in an entirely different position. It is exactly analogous to the cases referred to in the Lord Chancellor's opinion in Brintons, Limited.¹ The body suffers a lesion through which the poisonous germ effects an entrance. Here there was nothing of the kind. The men who were immersed up to their knees in cold water suffered no lesion, although in the case of one of them his vitality may have been reduced by the exposure. I am therefore quite unable to reach the conclusion that the deceased met with an accident which caused him an injury, or that the pneumonia resulted from injury by accident within the meaning of the statute.

I have kept in view in these observations the decision of the Extra Division in the case of Kelly.² The ratio of that decision is not necessarily in conflict with the conclusion at which I have arrived, although I should not myself have reached the same conclusion as the Extra Division. In that case the accident which caused the man's death was the direct result of his lungs having been exposed to a dose of carbon-monoxide gas. The disease was thus set up by an external agency which operated directly on the part of the body in which it was produced. Lord Kinnear in that case says that the word accident implies "some external act which could be the subject of a notice to the employer. . . . Therefore you have to look for some external fact distinct from the idiopathic condition of the man himself which can be described as an unforeseen and undesigned occurrence causing injury to the workman." Here the deceased's legs were the only parts of his body which came in contact with the only external agency that can be postulated, viz., a quantity of cold water. If his legs had in consequence got inflamed, or if the water had been corrosive in its character, there would perhaps have been an injury by accident; but his legs were in no way injured, although the fact that the man suffered from cold feet may have exposed him to certain risks of catching disease which he might otherwise have escaped. The cases are therefore essentially distinct, although it was a peculiarity of Kelly's case² that the poisonous gas which pervaded his lungs was in itself inert, and operated by preventing or obstructing such aeration of the blood as was necessary to combat the disease.

If the circumstances above described constitute an accident then I do not think there can be much doubt that it arose not merely in the course but also out of the employment. There remains, however, the question whether there was evidence from which the Sheriff-substitute could legitimately infer that the death of John Drylie resulted from an accident. After the general narrative of facts there are two findings which it is somewhat difficult to construe. The Sheriff-substitute found that the "pneu- Jan. 25, 1913.

¹ [1905] A. C. 230.

² 1911 S. C. 864.

monia from which deceased died was due to the chill which he received Drylie v. on 25th September," and also at the very end of his narrative "that Alloa Coal the pneumonia from which deceased died was a natural sequence of the Co., Limited.
chill to which he was exposed on 25th September." I think these two Lord Salvesen.
findings must be read together and that they amount to this, that as the pneumonia was a natural sequence of the chill, the Sheriff-substitute considered himself entitled to find that the chill was in fact the cause of the deceased's death. There are no doubt circumstances in which this disease follows so immediately on an unusual exposure as to justify the inference that the exposure caused the disease. No difficulty on this score could arise in the case of *Etherington*¹; but the remaining facts found by the arbitrator here show that the present case does not belong to this simple category. After getting to the pit head the deceased loitered for twenty minutes on the surface before going home. On the following day he suffered from the symptoms of a severe cold, but went to his work, which he left early; the next day—Wednesday—was an idle day, but Drylie was again out of his house to arrange about his pay lines; on the two following days he was again at work but not for the whole shifts; on Friday, 29th September, he was shivering and complained of cold all over, but it was not until 1st October that the doctor who saw him, and who on the previous day had suspected pneumonia, was satisfied that he was actually suffering from that disease. On 8th October he died. I confess that the circumstances suggest to my mind nothing more than that the man caught a cold on 25th September, presumably as the result of the exposure; that he absolutely neglected it, and it was only after four or five days of such neglect that the pneumonia set in. To loiter at the pit head without occasion for twenty minutes or half an hour after he had been standing in icy-cold water, and to work in this wet pit on three out of the four following days, during each of which he was exposed to a wetting at his work, seems to have been grossly imprudent for a man who was suffering from a severe cold. No doubt the arbitrator had the benefit of the advice of a medical assessor; but he has narrated all the material facts on which he relied for his own conclusion, and we are just as able to draw an inference ourselves as he was. It may be matter of reasonable conjecture that the disease from which Drylie died commenced with a cold which he caught on 25th September, but it is just as reasonable to conjecture that if he had gone straight home after his wetting or had not gone to his work the rest of the week nothing more serious would have happened. The Sheriff-substitute has found that his so working had not a favourable effect upon the illness, which he thinks commenced on 25th September, a negative way of stating what happened in the interval which does not do full justice to the facts. The pneumonia itself did not develop for nearly a week, and I do not think the inference which the arbitrator drew was warranted by the facts he has stated; unless, indeed, the fact that a man has caught a cold during his work from which he never recovers until pneumonia supervenes is a ground for inferring that the circumstances which produced the cold

¹ [1909] 1 K. B. 591.

Jan. 25, 1913. also produced the supervening pneumonia, however long the interval that elapsed. In my opinion the arbitrator was not entitled to find anything more than that the exposure on the 25th September led to the deceased taking a cold which, like any other cold if neglected—as it was in the present case—might have serious consequences. In my opinion, we ought to answer the question of law in the negative.

Drylie v.
Alloa Coal
Co., Limited.

Lord Salvesen.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In my opinion there is sufficient in this case to justify the arbitrator in reaching the conclusion he did. I confess that I have all along felt that the difficulty in this case lay in the facts and not in the law. Like many other cases which we have had to consider, there is a difficulty in the application of the law to the facts, and therefore I state quite shortly what I think the true view of the facts found by the arbitrator is.

He finds, in the first place, that the workman died on 8th October from pneumonia; and as I read his findings, he also finds in fact that the pneumonia was directly caused by what occurred on 25th September; that what happened on that day was an unintended and unexpected occurrence, which caused hurt or loss, and that that unintended and unexpected occurrence consisted in an unusual accumulation of water which alarmed the men who were working there, and induced them to hasten to the pit bottom. I may remark here, in passing, that I do not think miners drop their graith and run for nothing, and the circumstances of this case are in marked contrast to one of the illustrations that have been given—that of a heavy shower of rain. The men ran to the bottom, and while they were waiting there the water rose upon them and they were immersed up to their knees, and were chilled by exposure to the water and to the air.

Now, it appears to me that according to the law which has been laid down in many cases, both in the House of Lords and here, that is a case of injury by accident arising out of and in the course of employment. You can give the time, you can give the day, you can put your finger on the circumstances and the place of the occurrence of a definite event by which injury was caused to the workman. The facts in this case are in marked contrast to those in M'Millan v. Singer Sewing Machine Company, Limited,¹ which was decided by the First Division on 7th December 1912, where we refused to hold that, where a man merely caught cold, that entitled him to compensation under the Act. In that case the line was drawn, and we held that the claimant had failed to make any relevant averment of an occurrence. Here there was an occurrence.

As regards the law, I confess that I do not think any good purpose is to be served by resuming the various cases. I am content, for my part, to refer to what has been said by the Lord President in the case of Euman v. Dalziel & Company,² by Lord Kinnear in the case of Kelly v. Auchinlea Coal Company,³ and to the law as explained in Eke v. Hart-Dyke.⁴

LORD GUTHRIE concurred in the opinion of Lord Dundas.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinion

¹ Supra, p. 346.

² 1911 S. C. 864.

³ Supra, p. 246.

⁴ [1910] 2 K. B. 677.

which has been delivered by Lord Dundas, and I concur in that opinion in Jan. 25, 1913. all its parts, and therefore do not think it necessary to attempt any review of the cases.

Drylie v.
Alloa Coal
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

If this were a new question, and we were deciding it for the first time, I think there would be great force in much of what Lord Salvesen has said. I do not hesitate to say that if I had been sitting in the House of Lords in the case of Brintons,¹ I think I should have voted with Lord Robertson; and if I had been there in the case of Ismay,² I certainly should have voted with Lord Macnaghten. But sitting in this Court I am bound to take the cases as I find them, and—whatever my own opinions may be—to follow loyally the doctrine that has been laid down by the House of Lords.

Now, I think that that doctrine may be stated in a single sentence, and it is this: The fact of disease is not an accident, but the contraction of disease may be by accident. When you seek to apply that doctrine to the question in the present case, namely, Was this disease of which the man died contracted by accident? it seems to me you have to answer two questions. The first question is: Was it contracted in consequence of what happened on the 25th September? Or is it impossible to say when and where it was contracted? Now, upon that matter I agree the evidence is very thin. But here we are not actually deciding upon the evidence. What we have got to decide is: Was there evidence upon which the arbitrator could reasonably come to the conclusion that it was contracted in respect of what happened on the 25th September? Well, I cannot say there was not. I think he was entitled to come to that conclusion, although personally I should perhaps have hesitated to do so.

The next question is: Was that which happened on the 25th September an "accident" in the sense of the statute? I think it was, because—to use the words of Lord Macnaghten in *Fenton v. Thorley & Company, Limited*³—it was "an untoward and unexpected event." Accordingly, upon the whole matter, I agree with the majority of your Lordships.

LORD KINNEAR was absent at advising.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . . Find in answer to the question of law stated in the case that there was evidence upon which it could be competently found that the death of the deceased John Drylie resulted from injury by accident arising out of and in course of his employment: Therefore affirm the award of the arbitrator, and decern. . . ."

D. R. TULLO, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Brintons, Limited, v. Turvey, [1905] A. C. 230.

² Ismay, Imrie, & Co., Limited, v. Williamson, [1908] A. C. 437.

³ [1903] A. C. 443.

No. 76.

Jan. 28, 1913.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

JAMES TAYLOR, Appellant.—D.-F. Dickson—Guild.
 MRS MARY RAMSAY STEEL-MAITLAND, Respondent.—
Constable, K.C.—W. Mitchell.

Lease—Outgoing—Compensation for improvements—Market garden—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 64), secs. 23 (1), 29 (2), and 35 (1)—Varying portions of arable farm cultivated as market garden—Whether market garden in sense of Act—Lease providing rotation of crop for market garden—Whether provision cancelled by Act or waived by landlord.

Under a lease, dated May 1892, of a farm of 150 acres let "primarily as an agricultural subject" the tenant was "entitled to use all or so much of the land" as he might think proper for the purposes of a market garden, but subject to conditions including a condition as to rotation of crop, which permitted only two years' continuous cultivation of market-garden produce. The tenant annually kept 50 acres, but not always the same 50 acres, under cultivation as a market garden.

In 1902 he proceeded to erect a forcing-house for the production of early rhubarb, the process being that the rhubarb stools are forced in the house and then transplanted to the fields where they remain for from three to five years. While the forcing-house was being erected the landlord's factor wrote to the tenant inquiring as to his intentions, and advising him that the conditions of the lease would be "strictly enforced." The house was completed, and rhubarb was cultivated until the expiry of the lease in 1911, when the tenant claimed compensation for improvements on his holding under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, in respect of the forcing-house erected by him and of rhubarb stools left in the ground. These he maintained were improvements executed "without notice of dissent by the landlord" in the sense of section 29 (2) of the Act.

Held that the fact that the ground cultivated had varied from time to time did not prevent the 50 acres under cultivation at the expiry of the lease from being a market garden within the meaning of sec. 29 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, for the purpose of a claim for compensation for improvements. Diss. Lord Johnston, who was of opinion that the provisions of the Act as to market gardens did not apply, because, as no fixed part of the farm had been in cultivation wholly or mainly as a market garden, there was no "holding" within the meaning of the Act.

Held further (1) that the restrictions as to rotation contained in the lease were not removed by sec. 23 (1) of the Act, which applied only to arable land; (2) that the factor's letter was a "notice of dissent" within the meaning of sec. 29 (2), in so far as the improvements claimed for were in contravention of the lease; and (3) that the tenant was entitled to compensation for the rhubarb, but only if and in so far as the cultivation had not been in contravention of the terms of the lease, and for the forcing-house, but only if and in so far as it constituted an improvement in connection with such a cultivation.

Lease—Outgoing—Compensation for improvements—Market garden—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 64), sec. 29 (2)—Improvements "then executed."

The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, sec. 29 (2), which makes certain provisions with regard to improvements on market gardens, begins with these words:—"Where under a lease current on the first day of January 1898 a holding was at that date in use or cultivation as a market garden . . . and the tenant thereof has then Jan. 28, 1913.

executed thereon . . . any improvement . . .

Held that the word "then" means "thereafter."

Smith v. Callander, (1901) 3 F. (H. L.) 28, followed.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

ON 11th May 1911 a case was stated for the opinion of the Sheriff of 1st DIVISION.
the Lothians and Peebles by James Inglis Davidson, Saughton Mains, Sheriff of the Midlothian, the arbiter appointed by the Board of Agriculture and Lothians and Fisheries in a reference under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Peebles.
Act, 1908, between James Taylor, sometime farmer, Easter Drylaw, Davidson's Mains, Midlothian, and Mrs Mary Ramsay Steel-Maitland of Barnton. The case was stated at the request of Taylor under section 9 of the Second Schedule to the Act.

The case set forth the facts as follows:—"2. By lease, dated 24th and 30th May 1892, entered into between Sir James Ramsay Gibson Maitland (whose successor the said Mrs Mary Ramsay Steel-Maitland is) and the said James Taylor, the said Sir James Ramsay Gibson Maitland let to the said James Taylor All and Whole the farm and lands of Easter Drylaw aforesaid, and by subsequent agreement between the said Sir James Ramsay Gibson Maitland and James Taylor, dated 12th and 14th January 1894, and incorporated with said lease, and subject to the provisions thereof, certain other lands were let to the latter. Said farm and lands were let for the period of nineteen years from and after Martinmas 1892, and said other lands for eighteen years from and after Martinmas 1893. Said lease and agreement and said whole lands let are hereinafter referred to as the 'lease,' and the 'farm' or 'holding' respectively. The extent of said lands was 153 acres or thereby, and the rent £851, 8s. The whole of said farm was arable land. The lease terminated at Martinmas 1911, by notice of termination as at that date being sent to the tenant by the agents of the proprietrix on 9th November 1910. . . . 4. By the said lease it is provided that, . . . although the farm is let primarily as an agricultural subject, the said James Taylor and his foresaids shall be entitled to use all or so much of the land of the farm as he or they think proper for the purposes of a market garden, but subject always to the conditions following, videlicet:—(1) None of the land shall be used for growing any kind of fruit except strawberries;
(2) land used for market garden purposes shall be worked on a four years' rotation (the first and second years of the rotation being market-garden produce, and the third white crop, and the fourth year grass);
. . . . (3) in the case of land under four years' rotation the tenant shall apply not less than 60 tons per acre of well-rotted horse or cow dung to the land in the first year, and not less than 40 tons per acre in the second year of the rotation; . . . (4) land which has been under market-garden produce shall be thoroughly cleaned before being put under white crop; (5) the tenant shall be bound constantly to keep all land used for market-garden purposes well cleaned and in good heart, and to manage it according to the recognised rules of well-managed market gardens in the vicinity of Edinburgh,' under a penalty in case of failure. 5. Mr Taylor, who was a market gardener, residing at Bangholm, Ferry Road, Edinburgh, from the outset grew market-garden produce at Easter Drylaw, but the forcing of rhubarb was not carried on by him there until about the year 1902. In the course of his tenancy he gradually increased the area under market garden crops until there would be annually about 50 acres. These

Jan. 28, 1913.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

50 acres, however, were not annually precisely the same ground, as Mr Taylor changed the portions of the ground, his custom being to select for market-garden purposes the fields or portions of fields he thought most suitable. The rest of the farm was cultivated as an ordinary arable farm. In evidence Mr Taylor stated: 'Before I entered it, it had been cropped merely as a farm, and I began bit by bit to convert it into a market garden. After I was able to get the land to carry the crops I gradually increased my extent of market gardening. It was in 1899 that I began to grow rhubarb to any particular extent upon it. I required to have it ready for my forcing-houses in 1902. I ultimately extended my rhubarb break to 12 to 15 acres.' At the termination of Mr Taylor's lease at Martinmas 1911, about said quantity of 50 acres of the farm were under market-garden crops, and of these 12 acres or thereby were under rhubarb crop, a considerable part of which, however, had been planted out in the spring of 1911, after he had received notice to quit the holding, which course he had followed in previous years. 6. In or about the year 1901, Mr Taylor removed from certain land which he had rented at Bangholm, and from that date down to November 1911 his whole business was carried on upon Easter Drylaw Farm. As there were no suitable houses upon Easter Drylaw for the growing and forcing of early rhubarb, Mr Taylor erected and equipped suitable forcing-houses. This he did at his own expense, but without the previous consent of the proprietrix. The landlord's knowledge of the erection of the first forcing-house is established by the following letter to Mr Taylor from Mr Grigor, factor on the estate, and Mr Taylor's reply:—

"Mr Grigor to Mr Taylor, 4th November 1903.

"Dear Sir,—I beg to draw your attention to the terms of your lease of Easter Drylaw Farm, and shall be obliged if you will kindly explain what your intentions are with regard to the brick structure you are erecting on the field to the west of the garden.

"I may mention that the conditions of the lease will be strictly enforced.—I am, &c."

"Mr Taylor to Mr Grigor, 5th November 1903.

"Dear Sir,—The building I am erecting is a forcing-house for growing rhubarb.—Yours faithfully."

"From about this time onward to the termination of the lease it is admitted on both sides that the growing of rhubarb at Easter Drylaw was carried on upon a larger scale than had previously been the case. . . . The buildings erected by the claimant for market-gardening purposes were not required, and are not now required or used for the purposes of a purely agricultural farm. . . . 8. The tenant's occupation of the subjects referred to expired on 28th November 1911, and, on 10th November 1911, he intimated a claim under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, in which he claimed, inter alia, the sum of £2163, 17s. 7d., being the value of the improvement claimed to have been effected by him on said holding or parts thereof by the planting thereon of the vegetable crops (limited in the claim to rhubarb stools) which continue productive more than two years, and the erection of buildings for the purpose of trade or business of a market gardener. . . . 11. After the arbiter had accepted office, the proprietrix lodged objections to Mr Taylor's claim, in which she repudiated said claim in toto, denying it to be competent or well founded, and, alternatively, stating it to be excessive. . . . Proof was led by the parties before the arbiter on 25th, 26th, and 30th January 1912, and the proof having been closed, the arbiter heard parties on the evidence on 31st January 1912. 13. It was established in evidence that the proprietrix was aware of the manner in which the said farm was being managed and cultivated, and of the proportion thereof annually under market-garden crops, and of the nature and class of crops grown, and that she did not, either verbally or in writing, express any dissent therefrom, but warned Mr Taylor that the terms of the lease would be strictly enforced. In the growing of forced rhubarb it was proved:—(1) That the stools are kept in the forcing-house for from six to eight weeks; (2) That thereafter they are removed to the fields from the house; (3) That the stools require from three to five years' nursing in the field to recover their full vigour.”

Jan. 28, 1913.
Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

The case further stated:—“14. At the hearing on the evidence, it was contended, inter alia, on behalf of the proprietrix that, upon a sound construction of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, and in view of the terms of the lease, and of the facts above set forth, the clauses of said Act, which allow compensation for tenants' improvements on lands let or cultivated as market gardens, do not apply to the claimant's holding as let to and cultivated by him, and that he is not entitled under the Act to any compensation for the improvements which he claims to have made. The contrary view was contended for by the claimant. . . . A question has also been raised by the claimant as to whether, in view of the facts above set forth, the proprietrix has not barred herself from objecting to the validity of the claimant's claim.”

The questions of law were:—“(1) Are the subjects which were let to, and cultivated and used by, the claimant, or any part thereof, a market garden as defined by the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908,* to which the special provisions as to market gardens con-

* The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 64), enacts:—

Sec. 23 (1). “Notwithstanding any custom of the country, or the provisions of any lease or agreement respecting the method of cropping of arable lands, or the disposal of crops, a tenant of a holding shall have full right to practise any system of cropping of the arable land on the holding, and to dispose of the produce of the holding, without incurring any penalty, forfeiture, or liability. . . .”

Sec. 29 (2). “Where under a lease current on the first day of January Eighteen hundred and ninety-eight a holding was at that date in use or cultivation as a market garden with the knowledge of the landlord, and the tenant thereof has then executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, any improvement comprised in the Third Schedule to this Act, the provisions of this section shall apply, in respect of that holding, as if it had been agreed in writing after that date that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden, so however that the improvements in respect of which compensation is payable under those provisions as so applied shall include improvements executed before as well as improvements executed after that date. . . .”

(3) “Where the land to which such agreement relates or so used and cultivated consists of part of a holding only, this section shall apply as if that part were a separate holding.”

Sec. 35 (1). “. . . ‘Holding’ means any piece of land held by a tenant, which is . . . in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden. . . . ‘Market garden’ means a holding cultivated, wholly or mainly, for the purposes of the trade or business of market gardening.”

Jan. 28, 1913. tained in that statute apply? (2) Is the proprietrix, in the circumstances stated in this case, barred from raising any question as to the tenant's right to obtain compensation under the Market Garden clauses of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908?"

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

On 23rd August 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) answered both questions of law in the negative.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The present case as presented to me seemed to me, after I first heard parties on it, to be defective, in respect that it did not set forth in geographical and other particular detail as to cropping and improvements the condition of matters as at 1st January 1898. I put the case out for rehearing of parties on this point, and I was then informed that it would be impossible for any amendment of the case to be made so as to give me particulars as to what precise part of the whole holding was in use as a market garden at 1st January 1898, and as to whether any of the improvements which would have given the tenant a claim under the Act of 1897 had then been executed. I was, however, at the same time informed that I might treat the statement in article 5 of the stated case as meaning that from 1st January 1898 down till the expiry of the lease fifty acres, although not the same fifty acres, might be treated as in cultivation as a market garden.

"It is clear that the tenant's claim cannot fall under the first subsection of section 29 of the Act of 1908, as the only agreement in writing between the parties upon which such a claim could be founded is the lease itself, and it is not dated on or after 1st January 1898. Any claim that the tenant has, therefore, must be brought by him under subsection 2 of section 29 of the Act, and he must show that at 1st January 1898 his holding, or part of his holding, was in use or cultivation as a market garden with the knowledge of the landlord, and that he had then executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, improvements comprised in the Third Schedule to the Act. Now there were certain of the improvements set forth in that Third Schedule which he was quite entitled to make under the powers which his lease gave him; for example, he had the power to plant strawberry plants and to plant vegetable crops, which might continue productive for two or more years. There is no express power given to him in the lease to grow rhubarb, and it is possible that in the growing of rhubarb or such other vegetable crops he might not be able to grow these at a profit if he followed the rotation of cropping which is provided for in the lease for market gardening. But I repeat again that any such consideration does not affect the question for decision. The question is one of fact: had the tenant at 1st January 1898 actually executed on a part of his holding any of the improvements specified in the Third Schedule to the Act? There is no statement in the case that he had, and there is no doubt that he had not then started to grow rhubarb, which is now the foundation of his claim. I think, however, that if he had at 1st January 1898 executed any of the statutory improvements he would have been entitled to preserve his claim under the Act, and to extend it to any similar improvements that he made after that date. That is really the meaning of the amending provision of the Act of 1898. I make this remark at this stage subject to some observations that I will have to make with regard to the tenant changing the locality of his market garden within the range of his whole holding. I take it that the statement of facts in the stated case is a statement of all the facts relevant to the question to be determined by me that could be stated. If this be so, then the tenant has failed to prove that at 1st January 1898 he had brought himself within the provisions of the Acts of Parliament entitling him to compensation such as he is now claiming in respect of his improvements on a market garden.

"The most of the argument presented to me was on the question as to

The claimant appealed, and the case was heard before the First Jan. 28, 1913.
 Decision on 14th November 1912.

Argued for the appellant ;—The appellant was entitled to compensation in respect of the rhubarb stools left in the land and the forcing house, these being recognised improvements under the Third Schedule of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, made (as required by section 29 (2)) under a lease current on 1st January 1898, after that date, with the knowledge of the landlord, and without any written notice of dissent upon his part. The Sheriff-substitute had decided the case against the appellant on the ground that under section 29 (2) compensation could only be claimed when the improvements had been made before 1st January 1898, but in so doing he had proceeded upon a misconstruction of the word "then," because that word clearly meant "thereafter," when construed as it should be, in accordance with the opinion of the House of Lords¹ upon the construction of the Market Gardeners' Compensation (Scotland) Act, 1897.² The fact that the market garden extended only to a portion of the farm was immaterial in view of the definition of "holding" in section 35 (1), and so too was the fact that the actual portions of land cultivated as a garden varied from year to year, seeing that there had been all through the period from 1898 a continuous use of 50 acres of the farm for the purpose, which fully complied with the provisions of the Act as to continuity of cultivation. Any other reading of the statute was narrow and technical. Further, it was not in the respondent's mouth to complain of the change of ground seeing that she founded on the condition in the lease as to the rotation of crops, which necessitated the change. Lastly, there had been no written "notice of dissent" by the landlord. The mere statement that the terms of the lease would be strictly enforced, followed as it was by obvious acquiescence in what was being done, was not a "notice." Even if it were it was quite unavailing, because the

Taylor v.
 Steel-
 Maitland.

whether it was necessary, in order to entitle the tenant to compensation, that the part of his holding which was in cultivation as a market garden at the expiry of his lease should be the same part throughout. If I had come to the conclusion that the tenant had had a claim under the Act in respect of the condition of matters at 1st January 1898, I should have been prepared to hold that he had not lost the right which he then possessed to claim compensation by changing from one part of his holding to another in the growing of market-garden produce. He would have been doing that under the express power given to him in the lease, and I think it would have been only fair and equitable that any right which he had to compensation at 1st January 1898 should not be lost by the exercise of a power antecedently granted to him by the landlord. This opinion, in the view that I have taken of the facts, does not of course affect the determination of the questions submitted to me in the present case.

"These observations apply to the first question of law put to me. As to the second question, I agree with the contention of the proprietor that her actings can never create a right in the tenant, and I do not think that any of her actings can bar her from stating and maintaining her statutory rights. Her actings may give rise to claims at the instance of the tenant if anything she did was contrary to or destructive of his rights. But these are not matters which are raised in the present case."

¹ Callander v. Smith, (1900) 2 F. 1140, Lord Kyllachy, at p. 1144, (1901) 3 F. (H. L.) 28, Lord Chancellor Halsbury, at p. 30, Lord Shand, at p. 31, Lord Davey, at p. 32.

² 60 and 61 Vict. cap. 22.

Jan. 28, 1913. effect of section 23 (1) of the Act was to strike out of the lease entirely the provisions as to rotation, so that the only lease which could be "strictly enforced" was a lease allowing the appellant to cultivate the market garden in any rotation which he pleased. A fortiori as regarded the forcing-house the factor's letter on the subject was no notice of dissent.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Argued for the respondent;—Though the case of *Smith v. Callander*¹ made it necessary to construe the word "then" in subsection 2 of section 29 of the Act as meaning "thereafter," that did not affect the question with which the Sheriff-substitute had to deal as to whether there was here a "market garden" in the sense of the Act. In point of fact there was not. To entitle a tenant to the benefits of the clauses providing market-gardening compensation the holding must be cultivated wholly or mainly for the purposes of market gardening. The whole of the appellant's farm or holding certainly did not comply with that condition, seeing that it was "let primarily as an agricultural subject," and admittedly was in large part used for agricultural purposes. But neither did any part or portion of the farm comply with the condition. Parts of it were from time to time used for market-garden purposes, but no single part was wholly or even mainly used as such. Admittedly part of an agricultural farm might be a market garden within the meaning of the Act, but it required to be a definite and not an ambulatory portion, and it must have been occupied as such on 1st January 1898 and continuously thereafter, and it was only for improvements "thereon,"² i.e., on this definite portion, that claims for compensation could be entertained in the year of ish. The word "thereon" could not otherwise be applied. Even, however, if there was a holding or market garden in the sense of the Act the appellant had not complied with the conditions of the lease as to cropping, which were valid and binding seeing that section 23 of the Act dealt only with arable lands. The lease itself was accordingly a notice of dissent—as was also the factor's letter of 4th November 1903—with reference to any improvements that were excluded by the lease, as were those which were the subject of the present claim.

At advising on 28th January 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute in a stated case under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908. The case is stated by Mr Davidson of Saughton Mains, who was the arbiter in the case, for the determination of certain points of law. The parties to the arbitration are the tenant of the holding of Easter Drylaw on the estate of Barnton and the proprietrix of that estate. The tenant became tenant by lease entered into in 1892. Now, 1892 was prior to the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act of 1897, which is the beginning of the legislation as regards market gardens. The regulating statute now is the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1908, the provisions of which replace the provisions of the former Acts. Under the lease in question the farm was let as an agricultural farm; but the lease contains the following provision:—"Without prejudice to the foregoing conditions, it is hereby provided and agreed that, although the farm is let primarily as an agricultural subject, the said James Taylor and his foressaids shall be entitled to use all or so much Jan. 28, 1913. of the land of the farm as he or they think proper for the purposes of a ^{Taylor v.} market garden, but subject always to the conditions following, videlicet (1) ^{Steel-} None of the land shall be used for growing any kind of fruit except straw- ^{Maitland.} berries; (2) land used for market-garden purposes shall be worked on a Ld. President. four years' rotation (the first and second years of the rotation being market garden produce, the third year white crop, and the fourth year grass). Then there is a special provision for land under strawberries, which I need not quote. Then "(3) In the case of land under four years' rotation the tenant shall apply not less than sixty tons per acre of well-rotted horse or cow dung to the land in the first year, and not less than forty tons per acre in the second year of the rotation." The object of that is perfectly clear. The farm is to be looked on as an agricultural holding, but the tenant is to have leave, if he chooses, to use portions of it as a market garden. If he does so, he is to treat it in such a way that it will, so to speak, resume its place as an agricultural holding for those who come after him. The tenant, as a matter of fact, availed himself of this option, and he cultivated portions of the farm as a market garden, and practically he cultivated about 50 acres out of the total acreage of about 150. He did not keep to the same 50 acres all along, but he at one time cultivated one portion and at another another; but, roughly speaking, during his tenancy there were generally 50 acres under cultivation as a market garden. In November 1903 the tenant decided to force early rhubarb. With that intention he put up a forcing-house. Upon that the landlord's factor, in November 1903, wrote a letter in these terms:—"I beg to draw your attention to the terms of your lease of Easter Drylaw Farm, and shall be obliged if you will kindly explain what your intentions are with regard to the brick structure you are erecting on the field to the west of the garden. I may mention that the conditions of the lease will be strictly enforced." The tenant answered that the building he was erecting was a forcing-house for growing rhubarb, and after that time the tenant did grow rhubarb and forced rhubarb in the house. At the end of the lease this claim is brought for meliorations under the Agricultural Holdings Act. I should suppose that in the arbitration there are other claims, but the only claim which we have before us is the claim which is made in respect of this rhubarb. That is the only matter upon which the arbiter has asked for assistance as upon a point of law. A claim is made for this house and also for the value of certain rhubarb stools which were left in the ground. I suppose one is entitled to know so much—in fact, it is stated in the case—that the method of forcing rhubarb is that the rhubarb is forced in the house, that the stools are removed to the fields, and take some time to recover.

¹ 3 F. (H. L.) 28.

² 8 Edw. VII. cap. 64, sec. 29 (2) and (3).

The section of the Act of 1908 which deals with market gardens is section 29. That section replaces, not in exactly the same terms, but replaces the earlier section in the repealed Act of 1897. (I may say the Act in the Schedule is called the Act of 1895, but that is an obvious misprint; it is 1897, and indeed there is no difficulty raised, because the session and chapter, 60 and 61 Vict. cap. 22, are quoted correctly.) Now that section provides (subsection (2)) that "Where under a lease current on the 1st day

Jan. 28, 1913. of January 1898"—this lease was, of course, current at that time—"a holding was at that date in use or cultivation as a market garden with the knowledge of the landlord"—of that there is no question, for this holding was under cultivation as a market garden under the option given by the

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Ld. President. lease—"and the tenant thereof has then executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, any improvement comprised in the Third Schedule to this Act, the provisions of this section shall apply, in respect of that holding, as if it had been agreed in writing after that date that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden, so however that the improvements in respect of which compensation is payable under these provisions as so applied shall include improvements executed before as well as improvements executed after that date." The improvements in the Third Schedule include the planting of asparagus, rhubarb, and other vegetable crops which continue productive for two or more years, and the erection or enlargement of buildings for the purpose of the trade or business of a market gardener; so that, so far as the Schedule is concerned, both the rhubarb and the rhubarb forcing-house are improvements for which compensation might be claimed.

Now there are various points of law that have been brought forward by the landlord as excluding this particular claim for compensation. But I may say at once that it is unfortunate that the learned Sheriff-substitute has disposed of the case on a ground which it is impossible to uphold, owing to the fact that his attention was not called to the case of Smith v. Callander.¹ He disposes of the case on a very short ground, and one which, if it had been sound, would have been conclusive. The Act deals with the case where, under a lease current at the beginning of 1898, "the tenant thereof has then executed thereon, without having received previously . . . any written notice of dissent." Now the learned Sheriff-substitute has read the word "then" as if it meant "at that date," and if that were so it would end the matter, for there is no question that these improvements were not executed in 1898. But unfortunately in the case of *Smith*¹ the opinions both of the Lord Ordinary in this Court and of the learned Judges in the House of Lords were that the word "then" really meant "thereafter," and accordingly the learned Sheriff-substitute's ground of judgment is gone.

The next point that was argued was that the holding was not, at 1st January 1898, in use or cultivation as a market garden, in view of the provision that not the whole farm but only a portion of it could, at any one time, be so cultivated. I do not think that argument will do, because in the 35th section holding is defined as meaning "any piece of land held by a tenant, which is either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral, or in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden." Now this farm is obviously in part cultivated as a market garden, and therefore the argument that it is not a holding will not do. But then section 29 goes on, "and the tenant thereof has then executed thereon," that is, of course, upon the holding—the holding as a market garden. It is found as a fact in the case that nobody can tell now what precise 50 acres were occupied as a market garden in 1898, and therefore the landlord Jan. 28, 1913. argues that you cannot tell whether the improvement as here now was ^{Taylor v. Steel-} really put upon the holding which existed as a market garden in 1898. ^{Maitland.} Well, I do not think that argument will do either. I think that, as the holding shifts from one part of the farm to another, the possibility of Ld. President. making improvements upon that holding also shifts; and I think it would be far too narrow a view to hold that the mere fact that the part of the farm that was cultivated was, so to speak, ambulatory, excluded the tenant from the advantages conferred by the Act.

¹ 3 F. (H. L.) 28.

But then comes the last argument, and this argument is, I think, conclusive against the tenant's claim. The statute says, "without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent." Now I remind your Lordships of the letter which I have read, where the factor, seeing the large building in course of erection, says in effect, "Now remember, look at your lease, because we are going to hold you strictly to the terms thereof"—and the lease says that the market-gardening ground is to be treated under a four-year rotation and with a special treatment of dung under that rotation. I think that that is a dissent from the tenant cultivating the land in any way that is inconsistent with that rotation. There are two things to be said about that: First of all, the tenant argues that the provisions as to rotation were swept away by the 23rd section of the Act, which says, "Notwithstanding any custom of the country, or the provisions of any lease or agreement respecting the method of cropping of arable lands, or the disposal of crops, a tenant of a holding shall have full right to practise any system of cropping of the arable land on the holding, and to dispose of the produce of the holding, without incurring any penalty, forfeiture, or liability," and there are certain other provisions which lay certain duties upon the tenant which I need not read. The simple answer to that argument is that of set purpose that provision is applied to arable land only, and therefore a provision in a lease respecting market-gardening ground is not struck at by section 23. The other thing to be said is this—in order to express the argument I have been obliged for the moment to assume that the cultivation of rhubarb is contrary to the provisions as to the four-year shift. I do not consider that I have any right to know that, and I have no right to lay it down. I may know it, and indeed there are various indications in the case which, even if I knew nothing about it, would enable me to guess with something approaching to certainty that the two things are inconsistent; but, at the same time, I do not think we can say that in this Court. That is a matter for the arbiter, who is asking our directions on a point of law, and therefore I think we ought to tell the arbiter that, if he is of opinion that the growing of rhubarb with a forcing-house was a method of cultivation which was inconsistent with the terms of the lease with regard to the use of the land for market-garden purposes, then the factor's letter was a good expression of dissent by the landlord, and that it barred a claim for compensation. I think that we ought to answer the question put to us in that way.

Another question was put as to whether the proprietrix was barred, and there the learned Sheriff-substitute held that she was not. I think he was right, and I have nothing to add on that part of the case.

Jan. 28, 1913.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

LORD JOHNSTON.—This case raises a question of difficulty as to the retro-active effect of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, which has now been substituted for the Acts of 1883 and 1897. It arises under a lease of the farm of Easter Drylaw for nineteen years by Sir James Gibson Maitland, Bart., to James Taylor, dated in May 1892. At that date the first Scottish Agricultural Holdings Act, that of 1883, was still in force. That Act made no provision specially applicable to market gardens, and its provisions with regard to compensation generally were more limited than those contained in the subsequent Acts. It contained a clause, section 5, for which section 4 of the later Act of 1908 is now substituted, limiting its application where a lease executed after its date contained an agreement securing to the tenant fair and reasonable compensation, having regard to the circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement, for any improvement specified in the third part of the Schedule to the Act. In such cases the compensation in respect of such improvement was to be payable in pursuance of the agreement, and not under the Act. The third part of the Schedule deals with manuring, and is really the only one of the provisions for compensation which could be made to apply to market gardens. The lease of 1892 was executed in full view of the passing of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883, and takes advantage of the section to which I have referred by including a special agreement as to compensation.

I think it desirable to look carefully at the provisions of this lease, for, while on the one hand the tenant is designed as a market gardener, and was at its date carrying on that trade at Bangholm on the north side of Edinburgh, and while there are provisions permitting him to continue that trade at Drylaw, on the other hand the subject was an arable farm, supplied with all the farm buildings and all the other appurtenances requisite for that purpose. The lease in its general scope is an agricultural lease, and the express permission to use any part of the ground for market gardening is a matter wholly subsidiary. It is, moreover, not only limited, but its extent and its limitations are very clearly defined.

I have already said that the lease is in its essence an ordinary agricultural lease of an arable farm. It is one which, owing to its proximity to a large town, and to the high rent accordingly commanded, contains a scheme of provisions regarding cultivation very liberal to the tenant. But it contains two very important conditions bearing on its real purpose as an arable holding—First, a provision that the tenant should undertake to keep a sufficient stocking of horses, cattle, and implements, and to cultivate and manage the lands according to the most approved rules of good husbandry, and to apply to them the whole manure made on the farm, and an equivalent of well-made dung bought in for any straw sold off the farm; and second, a provision that the tenant should never in the course of the lease have less than one-fourth part of the whole land of the farm under drilled green crop, all properly cleaned, and manured with not less than forty tons of well-made horse or cow dung per acre.

These are general over-riding provisions. But then it is added that, without prejudice to the foregoing provisions, "although the farm is let primarily as an agricultural subject," the tenant should be entitled to use all or so much of the land of the farm as he might think proper for the purpose of a market garden. This apparently general provision is, however, Jan. 28, 1913. thus restricted; first, no kind of fruit except strawberries is to be grown; second, any land under strawberries is to be worked on a six-year rotation—three years strawberries, the fourth and fifth years green crop, and the sixth year white crop; third, where land is put under this crop there is to be applied to the land in the first year not less than seventy tons, in the fourth year sixty tons, and in the fifth year forty tons of good farmyard manure. If instead of strawberries the land is used for growing ordinary market-garden produce, fourth, this must be on a four-year rotation, the first and second years of the rotation being market-garden produce, not less than sixty tons of manure being applied the first year and forty the second, the third year white crop, and the fourth year grass, and the land to be thoroughly cleaned before being put under white crop. Moreover, the tenant is taken bound generally to keep all land used for market-garden purposes well cleaned and in good heart, and to manage it according to the recognised rules of well-managed market gardens in the vicinity of Edinburgh. If the tenant fails to observe these conditions of his liberty to use any part of the farm as a market garden, he comes under an obligation to pay an additional pectional rent of £10 an acre for every acre ascertained on a reference not to have been properly managed. Further, there is a general provision that should the tenant choose to crop the ground in any manner other than that specified during the currency of the lease without written consent of the landlord, he comes under an obligation to pay £10 an acre of additional pectional rent for every acre so cropped differently for the year of miscropping, “without prejudice nevertheless to the right of the first party,” the landlord, “to stop such miscropping in whole or in part as he may incline.”

These provisions which I have thus summarised indicate very clearly that the tenant received no roving commission to turn the farm or any part of it into a market garden, but that his permission to do so was limited and defined, in strong contrast to his comparative freedom in cultivating the farm as an ordinary arable farm. Their practical intention and effect was to limit market gardening to the growing of strawberries and of such market-garden produce as could be grown in two successive years, that is, of ordinary vegetables; and, further, to bring the land back at the end of the market-gardening rotation to such a condition that, though it might again be used for market gardening, it might also at once go back to ordinary arable cultivation. The latter would, I think, have been the natural course to follow, and in fact apparently was followed.

One further condition, which I have already referred to, I will shortly note. It is that compensation for unexhausted manures in the land of the farm, without discrimination of ordinary arable and market-gardening use, is provided according to a schedule annexed; this arrangement to come in place of and to supersede the provisions of the Act of 1883 with reference to compensation for tenants' improvements, which were dispensed with by mutual consent.

Before I advert to the Market Gardeners Act of 1897, which came into force on 1st January 1898, and the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1908, which repealed and superseded the Acts of 1883 and 1897, I think it con-

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Ld. Johnston.

Jan. 28, 1913. venient to state briefly what has been the course of cultivation of the farm, as stated by the referee after evidence led before him.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Ld. Johnston. Prior to Mr Taylor's entering on possession the farm was cultivated wholly as an arable farm. Mr Taylor at once began to grow market-garden produce, and gradually increased this use of the land until there were about 50 acres, or one-third of the farm, under market-garden crops. This continued to be the area under this system of cultivation till the termination of the lease. "These 50 acres, however," the referee states, "were not annually precisely the same ground, as Mr Taylor changed the portions of the ground, his custom being to select for market-garden purposes the fields or portions of fields he thought most suitable. The rest of the farm was cultivated as an ordinary arable farm."

It must be added that when he suggested that the case should be amended in certain particulars the Sheriff, to whom it had been presented, was informed "that it would be impossible for any amendment of the case to be made so as to give me particulars as to what precise part of the whole holding was in use as a market garden at 1st January 1898, and as to whether any of the improvements which would have given the tenant a claim under the Act of 1897 had then been executed," but that he might take it "that from 1st January 1898 down till the expiry of the lease fifty acres, although not the same fifty acres," were cultivated as a market garden. This information must therefore be accepted as if it had been part of the case stated by the referee.

We are not told what was the nature of the crops taken prior to 1st January 1898. It is not said that strawberries were cultivated, and I assume, therefore, that the portion of the farm turned to market-gardening purposes prior to that date was cropped, under the four-years' rotation stipulated by the lease, with ordinary market-garden produce. But after the passing of the Market Gardeners Act of 1897 Mr Taylor began to grow rhubarb, and to force rhubarb. This is not a fruit. It is an ordinary market-garden product of the vegetable species. But it cannot be grown in any case, and certainly not for forcing, under the four-years' rotation of the lease. It takes some time for the rhubarb stools to mature for forcing. The process of forcing takes, as we are told, six or eight weeks. The stools are then removed to the fields, and require three to five years' nursing in the open to recover their vigour.

What Mr Taylor did was to plant out rhubarb in 1899 to be ready for forcing in 1902, by which time he had erected a range of forcing-houses adjoining the steading. And from that date to the end of the lease he continued the practice of forcing rhubarb for the early market, having generally about 15 acres of the farm under this crop. But for this rhubarb cultivation so carried on there would probably have been no question between Mr Taylor and Mrs Steel-Maitland, who is now the proprietrix of Drylaw, as, in regard to ordinary market-garden crops, no compensation can be claimed except for unexhausted manure, and as there would probably not be much difference in the actual measure of compensation, whether that compensation falls to be ascertained under the lease or under the Act.

It must be apparent from the above statement that from and after 1st January 1898 Mr Taylor commenced and continued to cultivate in contravention of his lease. He was not stopped. But Mrs Steel-Maitland was Jan. 28, 1913. made aware, through her factor, of the course he was pursuing. She did Taylor v. not either verbally or in writing express any dissent therefrom, but she Steel-Maitland. warned Mr Taylor, particularly when in course of erecting his forcing-houses, and when she was apprised of their purpose, "that the conditions Ld. Johnston. of the lease will be strictly enforced."

Apparently Mr Taylor assumed that the Act of 1897 freed him from the restrictions of his lease, and authorised him, notwithstanding thereof, to do anything in the way of market gardening for which compensation is provided by that Act, and now by the Act of 1908. For he now claims, inter alia, compensation (£2163, 17s. 7d.) for the value of the improvement "effected by him on said holding or parts thereof by the planting thereon of the vegetable crops (limited in the claim to rhubarb stools) which continue productive more than two years, and the erection of buildings for the purpose of trade or business of a market gardener," all as detailed in schedule 3 of his claim. These buildings were the forcing-houses.

The parties differed, and a reference was made to Mr James Inglis Davidson under the Act of 1908, before whom it was contended on behalf of the proprietrix that "upon a sound construction of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, and in view of the terms of the lease, and of the facts above set forth, the clauses of said Act, which allow compensation for tenants' improvements on land let or cultivated as market gardens, do not apply to the claimant's holding as let to and cultivated by him, and that he is not entitled under the Act to any compensation for the improvements which he claims to have made."

The question thus raised was one which in the opinion of Mr Davidson was of importance, and the determination of which was necessary before he could proceed to pronounce an award. And he accordingly stated a case for the opinion of the Sheriff under section 11 of the Act of 1908, in which he submitted the following question of law:—"Are the subjects which were let to, and cultivated and used by, the claimant, or any part thereof, a market garden as defined by the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, to which the special provisions as to market gardens contained in that statute apply?" The Sheriff answered this question of law in the negative, and an appeal to this Court was taken by Mr Taylor, the tenant.

Before the referee Mr Taylor had also pleaded that Mrs Steel-Maitland was barred by her actings from challenging his right to compensation as claimed. This question also the Sheriff answered in favour of Mrs Steel-Maitland, but at the bar of this Court the contention was abandoned by the appellant's counsel, and need not be further adverted to.

In dealing with the question at issue any reference to the Act of 1897, which was the Act in force during almost the whole of Mr Taylor's time, may be avoided, because the more comprehensive Act of 1908 superseded both the general Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 and the Market Gardening Act of 1897, and with a still more retroactive effect.

In considering this question for determination it must be kept in mind that we are dealing with a subject held under lease dated prior to and not after 1st January 1898, and therefore under a lease the parties to which could not have had in view any of the provisions of the Act of 1897 or of

Jan. 28, 1913. the substituted Act of 1908. It is very difficult to keep the two positions separate in one's mind, but this decision cannot directly determine a question arising under a lease dated after 1st January 1898.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Turning to the Act of 1908, section 29 (1) says: "In the case of a holding in respect of which it is agreed by an agreement in writing made on or after the first day of January 1898 that the holding shall be let or treated as a market garden," certain provisions for compensation shall apply. And section 29 (2) says: "Where under a lease current on the first day of January 1898 a holding was at that date in use or cultivation as a market garden with the knowledge of the landlord, and the tenant thereof has then executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, any improvement comprised in the Third Schedule to this Act, the provisions of this section shall apply, in respect of that holding, as if it had been agreed in writing after that date that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden," that is to say, the provisions for compensation shall apply.

I think that four points arose for consideration of the referee.

First. What is the holding to which it is proposed to apply the compensation provisions of the statute?

Second. Was it in use or cultivation prior to 1st January 1898 as a market garden in the sense of the Act?

Third. Have any of the scheduled improvements been timeously executed, so that the condition precedent of the provisions of the section applying has been fulfilled?

Fourth. Was their execution barred from having that effect by prior written notice of dissent from the landlord?

The first two and the fourth of these questions involve, of course, matters of fact, but are, in the circumstances as set forth to us, questions of law. The third is a pure question of fact.

First. What is the holding? It is quite clear that if the holding be regarded as the whole land under the lease it was not in use or cultivation as a market garden at any time prior to 1st January 1898. It is therefore necessary to find whether "holding" is to receive a more restricted meaning. Now "holding" is, section 35 (1), defined as meaning any "piece of land held by a tenant, which is either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral, or in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden." "Market garden" again is, section 35 (1), defined as "a holding" cultivated wholly or mainly for the purpose of the business of market gardening. But to these definitions there is super-added this provision, section 29 (3)—"Where the land to which such agreement relates or so used and cultivated consists of part of a holding only, this section" (that is the provisions of the Act regarding compensation) "shall apply as if that part were a separate holding."

I confess to some difficulty in knowing how to combine these overlapping provisions. They certainly are not a model of perspicuity. But on the best consideration I can give them I think they contemplate two different kinds of holdings, a major holding and a minor holding, a holding and a holding within a holding, and that they apply the term holding both to the holding as a whole and to the particular part of the holding. It is not to prevent a piece of land held by a tenant being a "holding" in the general Jan. 28, 1913. sense that part of it is cultivated as a market garden. If part of the holding is cultivated as a market garden the provisions of the 29th section are to apply to the part as if it were a separate holding. But the whole or the part, the holding in the major sense or in the minor, must, if the clauses providing market-gardening compensation are to apply, be cultivated wholly or mainly as a market garden. This cannot be said of the whole of this holding. Of what, if any, part of it can it be said? I think it must be answered that no part of the holding can be pointed out which prior to 1st January 1898 was, or indeed since that date has been, in use or cultivation as a market garden, because the market gardening such as it has been has been ambulatory, and for such a state of things the Act makes no provision, and probably did not mean to do so. For I am unable to agree with the learned Sheriff that fair and equitable considerations justify the application of the provisions of the Act to what I have called an ambulatory market-garden holding. It seems to me that considerations of equity are out of place in any case in the interpretation and application of a statute, and that a landlord is more particularly entitled to except to their admission where, as here, a statute is attempted to be applied in such a manner as to impose burdens on him in contempt of contract, and to demand that it be strictly interpreted and strictly applied. There is therefore in my opinion no holding, in the sense of the Act, to which the special provisions for market-gardening compensation apply.

Second. Assuming that the Sheriff's view as to the equitable construction is to find acceptance, was this ambulatory area in use or cultivation as a market garden in the sense of the Act? This at once brings one up against the question, Did the Act of 1897, and does this Act of 1908, really throw to the winds a lease such as that in question entered into prior to its date, and empower a tenant, who is by contract under definite restrictions, to contravene such restrictions, grow what crops he chooses, erect what structures he thinks proper, and then come on his landlord at the end of the lease for compensation for the improvements he has thus forced upon the latter? And this question is the more important, in that it is contended, and not without reason if the premise is correct, that erection or enlargement of buildings for market-gardening purposes without the consent of the landlord gives to the tenant of a market garden a right to compensation, whereas if he were tenant of an arable farm he would (section 20) only have a certain limited right of removal.

I do not find that the Act of 1908 goes this length in its interference with contracts already made. I say so for two reasons: First. The Act, section 23, which, notwithstanding that there may be contracts to the contrary, confers freedom of cropping and disposal of produce, only applies to arable lands, and section 29 must be read in the light of section 23. Second. I think that the statutory provisions in question only apply to land used or occupied for market-garden purposes generally, that is, to land which is held under agreement enabling it to be turned to market-gardening purposes without restriction, or to land so held under restrictions, subject to those restrictions. That is to say, in this latter case, where improvements specified in the Third Schedule to the Act or any of them can be compe-

Jan. 28, 1913. tently made by the tenant under the terms on which he holds his lands, and are made, then and then only will the Act give him a right to compensation. This is a different thing from saying that the inclusion of certain improvements in the Third Schedule authorises contravention of the conditions of the holding, and confers a right of compensation in respect of such contravention. As in any view the land in question under rhubarb was in use or cultivation in contravention of the conditions under which it was held, I do not think that it was in use or cultivation as a market garden in the sense of the Act, and therefore that its provisions as to compensation do not apply.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Ld. Johnston.

I pass over for the present the third question.

Fourth. Assuming improvements to have been made which would have brought this holding under the provisions of the Act, were they barred from having that effect by prior written notice of dissent from the landlord? I think they were. A condition in the lease precluding the making of a scheduled improvement is in my opinion sufficient written notice of dissatisfaction to satisfy the condition of bar. The tenant cannot found on a breach of the lease as bringing him under the provisions of this Act, and then plead a continued breach as giving him right to compensation under the Act.

To revert now to the third question. The Act, section 29 (2), makes it a condition precedent to the provisions for compensation applying, in the case of leases current at 1st January 1898, that the tenant "has 'then'" executed, without exception on the part of the landlord, some one or more of the improvements enumerated in the Third Schedule to the Act. The Sheriff has, not unnaturally, interpreted "has then" as meaning "has at or prior to that date"; but he was evidently not aware that the words had, in the case of Smith v. Callander,¹ been construed by the House of Lords as meaning "has thereafter." This decision is binding on us, and as the Sheriff's determination depends entirely upon the interpretation which he puts upon this passage in the Act, it follows that it is not well founded. From the statement of the case I think that we must assume that improvements of the class enumerated in the Third Schedule to the Act were made after 1st January 1898, and therefore that the third of the questions which I have suggested for consideration would fall to be answered in the affirmative. In view, however, of the conclusion to which I have come on the other three questions, this matter is, in my opinion, of no importance.

For the reasons stated I think that the first question in the case must be answered in the negative, and that the second is superseded.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question in this case is whether part of the farm of Easter Drylaw, which was let by lease dated in 1892 (with an addition in 1894), and which the tenant left at Martinmas 1911, is to be held a market garden under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, so as to entitle the tenant to claim compensation for improvements of the nature provided for by the Third Schedule. The special provisions as to market gardens are contained in section 29 of the Act, and the question in the present case arises on subsection (2), which is as follows:—[His Lordship quoted the subsection]—Under this subsection two conditions must be fulfilled before a tenant is entitled to claim compensation for improvements comprised in the Third Schedule. It must be shown—(1) that the holding was at 1st January 1898 in use or cultivation as a market garden with the knowledge of the landlord, and (2) that the tenant thereof has “then” executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, the improvements in respect of which he claims compensation. The facts stated in the present case by the arbiter and the Sheriff-substitute are that from the outset the tenant grew market-garden produce at Easter Drylaw, and that from 1st January 1898 down to the expiry of the lease 50 acres (although not the same 50 acres) were in cultivation as a market garden. No question is raised in the case as to the landlord not having knowledge that 50 acres were being cultivated as a market garden on 1st January 1898, or as to the cultivation as at that date having been in contravention of any of the provisions of the lease. Whether there has been compliance with the first condition of the subsection is purely a question of fact, and upon this question of fact parties are agreed. The provisions of the subsection so far are therefore satisfied.

¹ 3 F. (H. L.) 28.

Jan. 28, 1913
Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The difficulty arises upon the question whether there has been compliance with the second condition of the subsection. The view upon which the Sheriff-substitute has decided against the appellant proceeds upon a construction of the word “then” which he takes to mean as at 1st January 1898. If the Sheriff-substitute is wrong in this—if the word “then” must be construed as “thereafter”—then the rest of his opinion is in favour of the appellant. Now, in coming to the conclusion that he did, it is evident that the attention of the Sheriff-substitute had not been directed to the case of Smith v. Callander.¹ The Act under consideration there was the Market Gardeners (Scotland) Act, 1897, section 4, but the provisions of that Act are so similar to the present, that what was said there applies here. The opinion of Lord Kyllachy in the Court of Session, and the views expressed by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Shand, and Lord Davey, in the House of Lords are distinct authority for construing “then” as meaning “thereafter.” The ground, therefore, upon which the Sheriff-substitute’s opinion rests cannot stand. The word “then” in section 29 (2) must be construed as “thereafter.” There is no question that the improvements for which the tenant here claims compensation were executed after 1st January 1898, therefore so far as this is concerned there has been compliance with the second condition of the subsection.

More serious difficulties, however, remain, one of which is whether, in order to entitle the tenant to compensation, that part of his holding which was in cultivation as a market garden at the expiry of his lease requires to be the same as that which was in cultivation at 1st January 1898. The Sheriff-substitute’s view is that the tenant does not lose his right to claim compensation by changing from one part of his holding to another in the growing of market-garden produce. In this I agree. The definition clause of the Act, section 35, provides that “market garden” means

¹ 2 F. 1140, aff. 3 F. (H. L.) 28.

Jan. 28, 1913. a "holding cultivated, wholly or mainly, for the purpose of the trade or business of market gardening," and that "holding" means "any piece of land held by a tenant, which is either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral, or in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden, and which is not let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment held under the landlord." Subsection (3) of section 29 provides: "Where the land to which such agreement relates or so used and cultivated consists of part of a holding only, this section shall apply as if that part were a separate holding." The respondent's argument was that the statute implied a continuity in cultivation, and that in order to have continuity the tenant was bound to show that he had executed the improvements in respect of which he claimed compensation at the time on the same area as was in cultivation as a market garden at 1st January 1898. The argument was also pressed that in order to give the word "thereon" in the second subsection its proper construction, it must refer to the holding or part of the holding which was in cultivation as a market garden at 1st January 1898. Owing to the phraseology I am unable to say that the matter is free from difficulty, but upon the best consideration I have been able to give to the matter the meaning of section 29 (2) seems to be this: If a holding is stamped as at 1st January 1898, either in whole or in part, with the character of a market garden, and if value is left to the landlord or the incoming tenant in that holding, either as a whole or in part, to an extent not greater than the area which was in cultivation as a market garden at 1st January 1898, then, if the improvements which have created that value are of the character contemplated by the Third Schedule, and if the other conditions of the statute have been complied with, the tenant has a claim for compensation. As regards the necessity for continuity, that question does not really arise for determination here. There was a continual cultivation though not of the same 50 acres. I may say, however, that the necessity for continuity seems to me to be implied from the language of subsection 2 where it says that the provisions of the section shall apply in respect of the holding "as if it had been agreed in writing after that date that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden." Applying this provision to the facts of the present case, it means that the holding must to the extent of 50 acres have been continually treated as a market garden. Accordingly I am not prepared to hold that the tenant's claim fails because the situation of the 50 acres upon the holding has changed from time to time.

I now come to consider what appears to me to be the most difficult point in the case. Section 29 (2) deals with improvements which have been executed by the tenant without previous written notice of dissent by the landlord. If previous to the execution of the improvements the landlord has given notice of dissent, then one of the conditions precedent has not been fulfilled and the tenant can have no claim for compensation. Now the claim in the present case is thus described in the case stated by the arbiter. "The tenant's occupation of the subjects referred to expired on 28th November 1911, and, on 10th November 1911, he intimated a claim under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, in which he claimed, inter alia, the sum of £2163, 17s. 7d., being the value of the improvement claimed to have been

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

effected by him on said holding or parts thereof by the planting thereon of Jan. 28, 1918. the vegetable crops (limited in the claim to rhubarb stools) which continue ^{Taylor v.} productive more than two years, and the erection of buildings for the pur- ^{Steel-} pose of trade or business of a market gardener, all as detailed in schedule 3 ^{Maitland.} of said claim." "In the growing of forced rhubarb it was proved:—(1) That ^{Lord Mac-} the stools are kept in the forcing-house for from six to eight weeks; (2) ^{kenzie.} That thereafter they are removed to the fields from the house; (3) That the stools require from three to five years' nursing in the field to recover their full vigour." Now, the factor on the estate wrote to the tenant on 4th November 1903 in the following terms:—"Dear Sir,—I beg to draw your attention to the terms of your lease of Easter Drylaw Farm, and shall be obliged if you will kindly explain what your intentions are with regard to the brick structure you are erecting on the field to the west of the garden. I may mention that the conditions of the lease will be strictly enforced." He received a reply dated the 5th. "The building I am erecting is a forcing-house for growing rhubarb." Now, the letter of 4th November 1903 was a written notice by the landlord. If there could be any doubt reference may be made to section 35 (3). It is, in my opinion, a notice of dissent within the meaning of section 29, subsection 2, in so far as the improvements by the tenant now claimed for were in contravention of the stipulations in his lease. On the facts of the case it does not appear that any question can arise as to the letter having been received by the tenant previous to the execution of these improvements. Whether the improvements in respect of which the present claim for compensation is made were in contravention of the terms of the lease is in my opinion not a question of law but a question of fact, and must be determined by the arbiter. The lease specially provides that although the farm is let primarily as an agricultural subject, the tenant is to be entitled to use all or so much of the land of the farm as he may think proper for the purposes of a market garden, but subject always to the conditions therein set forth. I do not think it necessary to refer in detail to these, because their application to the facts of the present case is not for the Court but for an agricultural expert. If in executing the improvements in question the tenant has contravened his lease, the result of this is to exclude the application of section 29 (2), and is not merely to found a claim of damages. It was argued by the Dean of Faculty that the effect of section 23 of the Act was to delete from the lease for the purposes of this case all the cropping clauses in it. Section 23, however, does not deal with market gardens but only with arable land. The fact that section 23 does strike out the provisions of every lease regarding the method of cropping arable lands, but says nothing about market gardens, is a strong reason for inferring that the Legislature never intended the Act to have any such effect as that contended for by the appellant. If the appellant's argument were sound, then the provisions of section 29 (2) would apply here as if it had been agreed in writing after 1st January 1898 that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden free from restrictions. I am unable to see how that view can be correct, where, as here, the landlord before the improvements were executed had directed the tenant's attention to the terms of his lease, which contains express restrictions, and had told him they would be strictly enforced. In this view of the case it is right to

Jan. 28, 1913. say as regards the second question put to us, which raises the question of personal bar, that, in view of the terms of the letter I have already referred to, I do not see ground for holding that the landlord can be held to have acquiesced in the execution of improvements contravening the lease when the tenant had express written notice that its terms were to be enforced. Although any point on the second question was given up by the appellant, I think it right, taking the view I do of the case, to express an opinion upon it. On the facts as stated in the case, I do not see how we can give effect to the plea of bar.

Taylor v.
Steel-
Maitland.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The answer to the first question should, in my opinion, be that the Court find that the provisions of section 29 (2) apply to the 50 acres which were under cultivation at the expiry of the lease, but in so far only as the cultivation thereof had not been in contravention of the terms of the lease; further find that the tenant has a claim for compensation for the erection of the forcing-house in question, but only in so far as it was not erected or enlarged in contravention of the terms of the lease; and continue the cause in order that parties may obtain the opinion of the arbiter: and, as regards the second question, that it is unnecessary to answer it, the appellant not having insisted in his plea of bar.

The Lord President intimated that LORD KINNEAR agreed with Lord Mackenzie's opinion.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—

"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 23rd August 1912; find in answer to the first question of law in the case that the provisions of section 29 (2) apply to the 50 acres which were under cultivation at the expiry of the lease, but in so far only as the cultivation thereof had not been in contravention of the terms of the lease; further find that the tenant has a claim for compensation for the erection of the forcing-house in question, but only if and so far as the said forcing-house constitutes an improvement in connection with a cultivation which was not prohibited by the terms of the lease; find it unnecessary to answer the second question of law in the case, and remit to the arbiter to proceed; quoad ultra continue the cause."

GUILD & GUILD, W.S.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 77. JOHN STURROCK, Pursuer (Reclaimers).—Chree, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.
Jan. 29, 1913. GEORGE HENRY CARPHIN (John Logie Robertson's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—Sol.-Gen. Anderson—Kemp.

Sturrock v.
Robertson's
Trustee.

Bankruptcy — Sequestration — Trustee — Personal liability — Adoption of bankrupt's contract by trustee.

The trustee on a bankrupt estate sued the former partner of a dissolved firm, of which the bankrupt had been a member, for a debt due to the bankrupt under the agreement of dissolution. The defender was assoilzied on the ground that the pursuer refused to implement the obligations of the bankrupt under the agreement.

Held that the trustee, by thus raising an action founded on the agreement, had not adopted the agreement so as to make himself personally liable for the obligations of the bankrupt under the agreement.

ON 12th April 1912 John Sturrock, solicitor, brought an action against G. H. Carphin, C.A., trustee on the sequestrated estates of the deceased J. L. Robertson, W.S., as such trustee and as an individual. The action concluded for declarator that the defender "has adopted a memorandum of agreement between the said deceased John Logie Robertson and the pursuer, dated 30th December 1907, providing for the dissolution, as at the 10th day of November 1907, of the firm of Wylie & Robertson, law-agents and conveyancers, Edinburgh, of which the said John Logie Robertson and the pursuer were the partners; and that the said defender is now bound as trustee foresaid and as an individual to implement the obligations therein undertaken by the said John Logie Robertson, and that in particular he is bound to free and relieve the pursuer of all claims and liabilities to which he is subject or which he has paid as a partner of the said dissolved firm of Wylie & Robertson," and for decree ordaining the defender to make payment to the creditors of the dissolved firm of Wylie & Robertson of the firm's outstanding debts, amounting to about £2000, and to the pursuer of a sum of £112, being the balance of firm debts paid by him, for which he had a claim of relief against Robertson's estate under the memorandum of agreement.

Jan. 29, 1913.
Sturrock v.
Robertson's
Trustee.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Ormisdale

The pursuer and J. L. Robertson carried on business in partnership as law-agents under the firm name of Wylie & Robertson until 1907, when the business was dissolved under the memorandum of agreement mentioned in the summons. By this agreement it was arranged that Robertson should take over the whole assets and liabilities of the firm and should relieve the pursuer of all claims against him as partner of the firm. Robertson died in 1908, and his estates were thereafter sequestrated, the defender being appointed trustee.

On 20th March 1909 the defender, Carphin, as J. L. Robertson's trustee, had brought an action* against the pursuer, Sturrock, for recovery of a sum which he alleged was due by Sturrock to the dissolved firm of Wylie & Robertson in respect of profits overdrawn by him, and which accordingly was an asset of the firm belonging to Robertson under the memorandum of agreement. In that action it was ascertained that Sturrock was liable to account for a sum of over £700, but that he had paid, or had been called upon to pay, firm debts to a greater amount, for which he had a claim of relief against Robertson's estate under the memorandum of agreement, and as Carphin refused to implement Robertson's obligation under the agreement to relieve Sturrock of these debts, Sturrock was assoilized.

The pursuer in the present action averred:—(Cond. 5) "The ground of action [in the case Carphin v. Sturrock] was that the sum sued for being a debt due by the present pursuer to his said firm of Wylie & Robertson was one of the assets of that firm to which the said John Logie Robertson acquired right under said memorandum of agreement of dissolution. The defender founded in said action upon said memorandum of agreement of dissolution, and thus adopted it, and he has become liable for the obligations therein undertaken by the said deceased John Logie Robertson." (Cond. 6) "Notwithstanding that under said memorandum of dissolution the pursuer was freed and relieved of all claims and liabilities as a partner of the firm of Wylie & Robertson, claims amounting in toto to a large sum have been made

* This action also depended before Lord Ormisdale, and was decided by him upon the same date as the present case.

Jan. 29, 1913.

Sturrock v.
Robertson's
Trustee.

upon him by the creditors of the said dissolved firm, and he has been compelled to pay large sums to these creditors. . . . In order that the pursuer may be freed and relieved of the remainder of the firm's debts which are still due, it is necessary that the defender should pay to the creditors of the firm whose debts still remain outstanding the sums respectively due to them."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender, Carphin, having enforced the provisions of said memorandum of agreement of dissolution against the pursuer, has thereby adopted it, and is now liable to implement the obligations therein undertaken by the said John Logie Robertson, and in particular to free and relieve the pursuer of all claims and liabilities which remain outstanding against said firm, and the pursuer is accordingly entitled to decree as concluded for.

On 29th June 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced an interlocutor dismissing the action.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 14th and 15th January 1913. In the action between the same parties, in which Carphin was pursuer, a reclaiming note on a question of expenses (with which this report is not concerned) was presented and heard on the same dates.

Argued for the reclaimer;—A trustee on the estates of a bankrupt tenant, who entered upon and managed the subjects, was held to have adopted the lease and to be personally liable for all the prestations¹: a trustee in bankruptcy who sisted himself in an action originally brought against the bankrupt, thereby "adopted the current contract of litiscontestation," and so became personally liable for the expenses of the cause²: and a trustee on the sequestrated estate of a firm of shipowners, who authorised the business to be carried on for behoof of the estate, was personally liable to cargo-owners for damage to cargo caused by the fault of the master of the vessel.³ The principle underlying these cases was that rights and obligations under a contract were inseparable, and that a trustee

* "OPINION.—[After dealing with the case of Carphin v. Sturrock and stating his reasons for assoilzieing the defender]—With regard to the action Sturrock v. Carphin and Another, I cannot hold that it is of the same nature as Doig v. Laurie, 5 F. 295. In that case there was a definite liability as cautioner resting on the pursuer, clearly ascertained by a letter of guarantee, which also bore that the guarantee was to remain in force until recalled in writing. The pursuer had so recalled the guarantee, but the defender took no steps to have his name removed from the cash-credit bond under which the bank had already made advances to nearly the amount of the guarantee. In those circumstances the pursuer was held to be entitled to call in aid an order of the Court. Here the circumstances are totally different. I cannot give relief when there has not been, and may never be, distress, and, as I read the pursuer's averments, that is the position of matters with regard to the majority of the claims which are enumerated in the summons. To the extent of claims actually made I should have been prepared to pronounce such an order as is asked if the conclusions of the summons had been so restricted, or, indeed, capable of being so restricted. This action in my judgment falls to be dismissed."

¹ Ross v. Monteith, (1786) M. 15,290; Nisbet & Co.'s Trustees, (1802) M. 15,268; Kirkland v. Gibson, (1831) 9 S. 596, aff. (1833) 6 W. & S. 340; Dundas v. Morison, (1857) 20 D. 225.

² Torbet v. Borthwick, (1849) 11 D. 694, per Lord Fullerton, at p. 702.

³ MacKessack & Son v. Molleson, (1886) 13 R. 445.

could not enforce the one without accepting liability for the other.¹ Jan. 29, 1913. The same principle should be applied in the present case. The defender could not have adopted the memorandum of agreement ^{Sturrock v. Robertson's Trustee.} more emphatically than by making it the basis of an action against the present pursuer, and it followed that he was now bound to implement all the obligations thereunder. The pursuer was entitled to relief from all claims whether or not there had been distress. He was not bound to remain under any obligation of debt.² He was therefore at least entitled to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons.

Argued for the respondent;—The cases cited by the reclaimer in which trustees had been held personally liable had no application. They were all instances of continuing contracts under which the trustee took up and carried on a business. In the present case the trustee merely founded on an existing contract as giving him a right to a particular asset. His actings did not amount to adoption, but were only an incident in the discharge of his duty of realisation of the estate.³ The cases of *Craig's Trustee*⁴ and *Dingwall*⁵ merely illustrated the principle that a party to a contract could not enforce his rights without being prepared to implement his obligations, a principle which the defender was ready to admit, but which did not support the pursuer's claim in the present action. The defender was entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the summons so far as directed against him personally.

At advising on 29th January 1913,—

LORD SALVESEN.—In this action the pursuer seeks to have it found and declared that the defender, Carphin, adopted a memorandum of agreement between the deceased John Logie Robertson and the pursuer; and that the defender, as trustee on Robertson's estate, is now bound, as such trustee and as an individual, to implement the obligations therein undertaken by the bankrupt; and, in particular, that he is bound to free and relieve the pursuer of all claims and liabilities to which he is subject or which he has paid as a partner of the dissolved firm of Wylie & Robertson. The Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action on the somewhat narrow ground that he cannot give relief where there has never been and may never be distress, and that this is the position of matters with regard to the majority of the claims enumerated in the summons. I cannot agree that that is a sufficient ground for disposing of the action as the Lord Ordinary has done, and it is necessary therefore that we should examine the case upon the merits.

The material facts are as follows:—The late J. L. Robertson carried on the business of a solicitor in partnership with the pursuer under the firm name of Wylie & Robertson from November 1898 to November 1907. The copartnership was dissolved by agreement, the dissolution to take effect as at 10th November 1907. Under the agreement contained in the minute

¹ Craig's Trustee v. Malcolm, (1900) 2 F. 541; Dingwall v. Burnett, 1912 S. C. 1097; Goudy on Bankruptcy, (3rd ed.) 375.

² Cunningham v. Montgomerie, (1879) 6 R. 1333, per Lord Deas, at p. 1339; Doig v. Lawrie, (1903) 5 F. 295.

³ McGavin v. Sturrock's Trustee, (1891) 18 R. 576; Imrie's Trustee v. Calder, (1897) 25 R. 15.

⁴ 2 F. 541.

⁵ 1912 S. C. 1097.

Jan. 29, 1913. of dissolution signed by the partners Mr Robertson was to continue the business for his own behoof, he taking over the whole assets and liabilities of the firm; and it was expressly stipulated that the pursuer should not be liable for any of the debts apart from the firm's liability to the bank, which does not enter into this case. Mr Robertson continued to carry on business until his death on 23rd June 1908. His estates were afterwards sequestrated, and the defender, Carphin, was elected trustee. As such he undoubtedly became bound to implement the agreement of the bankrupt; but the question is whether he has become liable to do so as an individual, in other words, to pay out of his own pocket in the first instance, with such relief as he may have against the estate in his hands, the whole debts of the dissolved firm.

Sturrock v.
Robertson's
Trustee.

Lord Salvesen.

The pursuer maintains that he has become so liable on the ground that he adopted the contract contained in the minute of dissolution. Such adoption is said to be inferred from the circumstance that in another action which we have just disposed of he sued for and established the pursuer's liability to account for a sum of £732, 16s. 7d., representing the extent to which the pursuer had overdrawn his share of the profits of the dissolved firm during its existence. Now, the pursuer has been assoilized in that action on the ground that the defender refused to implement the obligations of the bankrupt under the minute of agreement. The defender has accordingly not recovered any sum from the pursuer for behoof of the estate which he administers; and yet it is said that he has rendered himself personally liable by raising the action for all the debts of the dissolved firm. The Lord Ordinary has given countenance to this view in some of the observations contained in his opinion with reference to the case of Carphin v. Sturrock. He says: "The pursuer" (that is Mr Carphin) "is compelled to seek elsewhere for his title to sue, and finds it only in the minute of dissolution. If that be so, then the ratio of the decision in *Craig's Trustee v. Malcolm*¹ covers the present case. It is only by adopting the minute that the trustee can show that what was once an asset of the firm of Wylie & Robertson had become a part of the bankrupt's estate." I think it would have been more correct to say that the trustee founded upon the contract contained in the minute of dissolution, but that is a very different matter from adopting it in the sense in which the trustee on the sequestrated estate of a farmer adopts a lease so as to make him personally liable for arrears of rent due to the landlord. Such adoption may be inferred from possession being taken of the subjects let when such possession is not merely for the purpose of realisation of the estate. It has been held in a long series of cases, of which *Ross*² was the earliest cited, that such adoption of a lease by a trustee on a bankrupt's estate renders the trustee personally responsible for implement of the tenant's obligations. In such a case, however, the position of the landlord is changed by the action of the trustee, but for which he would be entitled to resume possession of the subjects let; but the principle upon which this legal result has been reached is not applicable to such a contract as we have here, except to the effect (of which the present pursuer has already received the benefit) that the trustee is not entitled Jan. 29, 1913. to enforce the contract unless he is prepared to implement the obligations incumbent on the bankrupt. The trustee erroneously believed that he could do so, but he has had to pay the penalty of his mistake in law by having to submit to a decree of absolvitor and to a partial finding for expenses against him. I know of no authority for holding that such a mistaken course, which is not said to have in any way prejudiced or changed the position of the pursuer, should have the extraordinary result of making the trustee personally responsible for the bankrupt's obligations towards the person whom he unsuccessfully sued. The penalty of his rashness in this case would represent a sum of between two and three thousand pounds payable out of his own pocket, for which he can only partially recoup himself, if at all, out of the estate under his charge.

¹ 2 F. 541.

² M. 15,290.

If the principle contended for by the pursuer were sound it would be capable of extensive application. Thus the trustee on the estate of a bankrupt shipowner sues for a balance of freight due to the bankrupt. He is met with a claim of damages for injury to the cargo largely in excess of the freight sued for. The trustee honestly believes that the claim of damages is unfounded, and that it is his duty to prosecute the action. The contrary is found by the Court; and according to the pursuer not merely must the trustee fail in his action, but because he brought it he must be held to have adopted the charter-party to the effect of becoming personally liable for all the shipowner's obligations under the contract of carriage. One is not surprised to find that there is no authority for such a proposition. Apart from the cases upon current leases to which I have already referred, the nearest analogy was said to be found in the liability of a trustee to pay the expenses of a successful action against the bankrupt to which he has sided himself as a party. The reason for this liability, according to the pursuer, was that he has adopted the contract of liti-contestation. This so-called contract is a mere legal fiction for which no doubt there is respectable authority; but it is not upon this ground that the trustee is rendered personally responsible for such expenses. It is because he has elected to side himself as a party to the litigation, and so must incur all the risks of an ordinary litigant. He has, in short, taken control of the pending suit, which, but for his action, would at once have been decided adversely to the bankrupt. There is really no analogy between such a case and that with which we are now dealing. The decision most strongly founded on, that of Craig's Trustee v. Malcolm,¹ was not one where the personal liability of the trustee was in issue. The sole question was whether the landlord was entitled to set arrears of rent against a claim by the trustee for the price of certain sheep stock as determined by the valuation of arbiters, which in terms of a clause in the lease he had insisted that the landlord should take over at a valuation. The true ground of judgment was thus stated by Lord Moncreiff in a single sentence: "He thus appealed to the contract, and having done so, he cannot enforce the claim which he has thus obtained against the landlord without satisfying or giving credit for the landlord's counter claims under the same contract." That is merely an

¹ 2 F. 541.

Jan. 29, 1913. application of a principle which was given effect to in somewhat similar circumstances in the case of Dingwall.¹ The point now raised might have arisen in *Malcolm's case*² if the valuation of the sheep stock had been less than the arrears of rent due to the landlord, but the decision gives no countenance to the view that in such circumstances the trustee would have been held personally liable for the difference.

Sturrock v.
Robertson's
Trustee.

Lord Salvesen.

I am therefore of opinion that the unsuccessful action of the trustee founded upon the contract contained in the minute of dissolution did not constitute an adoption by him of that agreement so as to infer personal liability. The trustee is therefore entitled to be assoilized from the conclusions so far as directed against him as an individual; and as no question has been raised with regard to his liability as trustee, the action quoad ultra should be dismissed. The pursuer must, of course, pay the expenses of this action.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD DUNDAS, and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, assoilized the defender from the conclusions of the action so far as directed against him as an individual, and quoad ultra dismissed the action.

PURVES & SIMPSON, S.S.C.—WYLIE, ROBERTSON, & SCOTT, Solicitors—Agents.

No. 78.

WILLIAM CLARK AND OTHERS (Sir William Collins's Trustees),
First Parties.—Clyde, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

Jan. 29, 1913.

Collins's Trustees v. Collins.

MRS CORNELIA THOMPSON PATTISON OR COLLINS AND OTHERS (Alexander Glen Collins's Trustees), Second Parties.—Macmillan, K.C.—Strain.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER COLLINS AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—
Macmillan, K.C.—Strain.

MISS CORNELIA PATTISON COLLINS, Fourth Party.—Ingram—Mitchell.

THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER IN BANKRUPTCY, Fifth Party.—
Sandeman, K.C.—J. A. T. Robertson.

JOHN WALTER COLLINS, Sixth Party.—Moncrieff, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Succession—Faculties and Powers—Validity of exercise of power—Separation of valid and invalid provisions—Clause of forfeiture in the event of deed of appointment being impugned—Effect of clause on validity of deed.

Succession—Conditions—Clause of forfeiture in the event of gift being impugned—Impugning—Statement of contentions in special case that conditions of gift invalid.

A deed of appointment containing both valid and invalid provisions concluded with a forfeiture clause, which declared that any of the appointees who impugned the appointment "in any manner of way" should forfeit all interest, "to the same effect" as if they had been expressly excluded from any share in the appointed fund.

In a special case brought to determine the validity of the deed of appointment, held that the effect of the forfeiture clause was to bind the conditions of the deed so closely together that (apart from other considerations) it was impossible to separate the valid provisions from Jan. 29, 1913. those which were ultra vires, and that accordingly the deed was wholly invalid, and that the fund fell to be divided as if there had been no deed. Collins's Trustees v. Collins.

¹ 1912 S. C. 1097.

² 2 F. 541.

Held further that parties to the special case who were appointees under the deed, and who had stated contentions questioning the validity of provisions and conditions affecting their shares, would not thereby, under the forfeiture clause, have forfeited their right to benefit under the deed had the deed been valid.

Observations (per Lord Dundas) on the rules regarding the separation of valid and invalid conditions in a deed of appointment.

SIR WILLIAM COLLINS died in 1895 leaving a will by which he 2D DIVISION. directed his trustees, inter alia, to hold two-tenths of the residue of his estate for behoof of his son, Alexander Glen Collins, in liferent "and his children in fee, in such proportions and under such terms and conditions as the said Alexander Glen Collins may appoint by a writing under his hand, which failing equally among such children."

Alexander Glen Collins died in 1911 survived by five children, William, Godfrey, Charles, Cornelia, and John. He left a deed of appointment, dated 30th June 1910, dealing with the fund in question. By this deed, the exact terms of which are not material to this report, he divided the fund among his children in certain proportions, but he adjected conditions which were ultimately decided to be ultra vires, and conferred rights on persons who were not objects of the power. The deed contained this clause:—"And I do hereby specially provide and declare that should any one of my said sons or my daughter in any manner of way quarrel or impugn the apportionment hereby made or the conditions attached by me to same, or should any person or persons in right of or as representing any of my said sons or my daughter in any manner of way interfere or seek to interfere in the arrangements hereby made by me, then and in that event the son or daughter so quarrelling or impugning the same, or in regard to whose share any interference takes place, shall forfeit all share and interest in the apportionments hereby made, and that to the same effect as if I had entirely excluded him or her from any share in the succession to the said two tenth shares of the residue of my said father's estate: Declaring further, that the share or shares so forfeited or lapsing shall fall and accresce in equal proportions, share and share alike, to and among my remaining children before named and their respective fore-saids, exactly as if the same had been directly given to them along with the sums originally apportioned as aforesaid, and subject to all the conditions applicable to same."

A special case was presented to determine the validity and effect of the deed of appointment. The first parties were Sir William Collins's testamentary trustees; the second parties were trustees nominated by Alexander Glen Collins in the deed of appointment; the third parties were Alexander Glen Collins's sons William and Godfrey; the fourth party was his daughter Cornelia; the fifth party was the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy, as trustee on the bankrupt estate of his son Charles; and the sixth party was his son John.

The fourth and sixth parties contended that certain conditions adjected to their shares under the deed (including the restriction of their right to a liferent and the destination of the fee to strangers to the power) were invalid and should be held pro non scriptis, and

Jan. 29, 1913. further, that they were entitled to state these contentions without forfeiting their rights in terms of the forfeiture clause.

Collins's Trustees v. Collins.

The second and third parties contended, inter alia, that the deed was wholly valid, and further, that the fourth and sixth parties, by impugning it in their contentions, had forfeited all their rights in the appointed fund.

The fifth party contended that the deed was wholly invalid, since it was impossible to separate the valid provisions from those which were ultra vires.

The following questions, inter alia, were stated for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—“(1) Is the appointment of the said two-tenths of residue contained in the said deed of direction and apportionment (a) wholly valid, or (b) only partly valid, or (c) wholly invalid? (5) If the third alternative of the first question be answered in the affirmative does the fee of the said two-tenths share of residue now fall to be divided equally among the five children of the said Alexander Glen Collins? (6) Have the fourth and sixth parties by reason of their contentions in this case quarrelled or impugned the apportionment made by the said Alexander Glen Collins by the said deed of direction and apportionment, or the conditions attached by him to the same, to the effect of forfeiting all right on the part of the said parties to take any benefit under the apportionment contained in the said deed?”

The case was heard before the Second Division on 16th and 17th January 1913.¹

At advising on 29th January 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—[After narrating the facts and dealing with the portions of the deed which were found to be ultra vires].—But it was urged that, assuming parts of the deed of appointment to be ultra vires of the grantor, these could, and ought to be, severed from the rest and treated pro non scriptis. Counsel founded upon the latter branch of the “plain rule” laid down by the Lord Chancellor (Cairns) in M'Donald,² “that if you cannot disconnect that which is imposed by way of condition or mode of enjoyment from a gift, the gift itself may be found to be involved in conditions so much beyond the power that it becomes void. But where that is not so, where you have a gift to an object of the power, and where you have nothing alleged to invalidate that gift but conditions which are attempted to be imposed as to the mode in which that object of the power is to enjoy what is given to him, then the gift may be valid and take effect without reference to those conditions.” The rule thus laid down is authoritative; and the latter branch of it was expressed even more succinctly by Lord Kyllachy in Middleton's Trustees.³ But it seems to me that the present case falls under the first rather than under the second part of Lord Cairns's rule. It is manifest that if one attempts to sever the invalid portions of this deed from the rest, a relatively small part of it would be left standing. This was demonstrated when Mr Moncrieff, in his clear and able argument, indicated Jan. 29, 1913. precisely through what parts of the instrument it would, on his own showing, be necessary to draw one's pen. But what appears to me to afford an un- ^{Collins's Trustees v. Collins.} available basis for the view that this deed of appointment must be regarded as wholly invalid is the remarkable clause by which the granter specially ^{Lord Dundas.} provides and declares that should any of his said sons or his daughter in any manner of way quarrel or impugn his apportionment or the conditions he attached to it, or should any person representing any of his said children seek to interfere in the arrangements made by him, the child or person so quarrelling or impugning, or seeking to interfere, should forfeit all share or interest in the apportionments. The clause is, as far as I know, or as counsel could inform us, unique in an instrument of this kind. Its effect is, to my mind, to remove any doubts one might otherwise have entertained as to the possibility of severing, in the construction of this deed, gifts to objects of the power from invalid provisions, conditions, and declarations with which they are intermingled. The appointer himself has welded the mass of his instrument into an indissoluble whole. I think the provisions and declarations are so coupled and bound up with the gifts, such as they are, as to make their efficacy a condition of the gifts; and the result must be that the whole apportionment is invalid. I am therefore for answering head (c) of the first question in the affirmative.

¹ On the effect of the forfeiture clause the following authorities were referred to:—Webb v. Sadler, (1873) L. R., 8 Ch. 419; Sugden on Powers, (8th ed.) p. 526.

² (1875) 2 R. (H. L.) 125, reversing (1874) 1 R. 794.

³ (1906) 8 F., at p. 1043.

I should here notice a separate argument which it was sought to base upon the forfeiture clause, but which is, in my opinion, quite untenable. It was suggested that the fourth and sixth parties, by reason of their contentions in this case, have quarrelled or impugned the deed of appointment, and thus forfeited all right to take benefit under it. I think the argument is futile. It is obvious that the fifth party, at all events, who takes no benefit under the instrument, and is outside the scope of the clause, could with impunity raise in Court any questions he thought fit as to the construction and meaning of the deed. The trustees also are manifestly entitled to obtain any necessary directions from the Court for their own safety in the matter. I cannot conceive that, if the trustees had raised a multipointing—and a special case of this kind is in substance the same—the fourth and sixth parties could have been held to imperil (indeed, eo ipso, to forfeit) their right to benefit under the deed in question by stating their views as to its proper meaning and construction, and claiming shares of the fund upon the footing that their contentions were well founded. The argument on this head was not very vigorously pressed, and I shall say no more about it.

It would serve no good end to review the numerous authorities referred to at the discussion. Each case of this kind must be decided upon a construction of the particular document or documents involved. Nor, if the view I take of this case is well founded, need we now attempt to define precisely how far the old Scots doctrine has been abrogated, about which Lord Deas, after observing that it was plain that the law of England differed in some respects from that of Scotland on this matter, said¹: "For instance, I agree with your Lordships that, if the deed of appointment is to be set aside at all, it must, according to our law and practice, be set aside in toto,

¹ Baillie's Trustees, (1862) 24 D., at p. 598.

Jan. 29, 1913. and the whole fund be equally divided. It would not be easy for any Scotch lawyer to doubt that"; the reason being, as Lord Curriehill, in the Collins's Trustees v. Collins, same case, explained,¹ "that you cannot tell what appointment the party entrusted with the power would have made, had he known that what he attempted to do was to some extent, at least, inept."² The old rule—clear and simple, though liable perhaps to lead, in some cases, to unfortunate results—was certainly modified by Lord Cairns's "plain rule," already quoted, derived from *Carver v. Bowles*³ and other English cases. Lord Cairns stated this rule to be "beyond all doubt,"⁴ and that it was not in any way disputed at their Lordships' bar; and Lord Selborne observed that the English cases were determined "on principles which, if sound in England, must be equally so in Scotland"⁵; but it is perhaps worth noticing that no Scots counsel seem to have been present. The precise extent to which the old rule was abridged or modified is not so plain. In Gillon's Trustees,⁶ the case of Baikie's Trustees,⁷ and Lord Curriehill's opinion in it were cited by Lord Rutherford Clark as conclusive authority. But the observations of that very learned Judge must, of course, be read secundum subjectam materiam; and the facts of *Gillon's case*⁶ certainly did not admit of the application of the rule of Carver v. Bowles,³ for no part of the fee of the fund there to be "divided" was given to any object of the power. It may be that, as was argued by one of the counsel in the present case, the old Scots rule has never been gone back upon where the whole fee is not apportioned to proper objects of the power but part of it is given to a stranger. However this may be, we are not now called upon, if the view I take of this case is right, to solve a problem which may sooner or later come up for definite determination.

On the whole matter, I think we ought to answer head (c) of the first question, and also the fifth question, in the affirmative; and all the other questions in the negative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD SALVESEN, and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT answered head (c) of the first question and also the fifth question in the affirmative, and the sixth question in the negative.

DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—WATT & WILLIAMSON, S.S.C.—MACKENZIE & FORTUNE, S.S.C.—J. & R. A. ROBERTSON, W.S.—J. & A. F. ADAM, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 24 D., at p. 596.

² See also Watson v. Marjoribanks, (1837) 15 S. 586, per Lord Mackenzie, at p. 591.

³ (1831) 2 Russ. & My. 301.

⁴ 2 R. (H. L.), at p. 131.

⁵ 2 R. (H. L.), at p. 135.

⁶ (1890) 17 R. 435.

⁷ 24 D. 589.

MRS MARGARET COYLE OR BROWN, Pursuer (Respondent).—

No. 79.

Moncrieff, K.C.—Keith.

JOHN WATSON, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—Horne, K.C.—
Carmont.

Jan. 30, 1913.

Brown v.
John Watson,
Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—
"Accident"—Pneumonia following upon chill—Chill due to standing in a draught while waiting to be raised from a mine.

During the working time in a coalpit the miners, owing to a wreck in the shaft of the mine, were ordered to ascend to the surface, and proceeded, in obedience to instructions, to the downcast shaft, where they were compelled to wait at a mid-landing for an hour and a half. During this period the miners, who had been sweating at their work, were exposed to a very strong draught from the air passing down the shaft for the ventilation of the mine, and on reaching the surface one of them complained of a chill. On this chill pneumonia supervened, and resulted in the death of the miner.

In an application by his dependants for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the arbitrator awarded compensation.

In an appeal held that there was no evidence on which it could competently be found that the deceased's death was due to an "injury by accident," and arbitrator's award recalled.

Drylie v. The Alloa Coal Company, Limited, supra, p. 549, distinguished.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in which Mrs Margaret Coyle or Brown claimed compensation for herself and her pupil children from John Watson, Limited, in respect of the death of her husband, John Brown, the Sheriff-substitute at Hamilton (Shennan) awarded compensation, and, at the request of the employers, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—“(1) The deceased John Brown was in the employment of the appellants in No. 2 Pit, Gilbertfield Colliery, on 26th June 1911. On that day he started work as usual about 7 o'clock A.M., and seemed to be in his usual good health. (2) The place where the deceased worked was dry, and had a good current of air passing through it. (3) Between 8 and 9 o'clock A.M., in consequence of a wreck in the shaft, all the men in the pit where Brown started work were ordered to ascend to the surface. (4) Brown and the men who were working beside him proceeded towards the shaft of No. 2 Pit, by which they were usually raised to the surface. Under ordinary circumstances they were raised within a short time of reaching the bottom. On this day they were met on their way by an official who told them to proceed by the communication road to the shaft of No. 1 Pit. Here they had to wait at a mid-landing for about an hour and a half until the men from the lower seam, who usually ascended by this shaft, had been raised. (5) No. 1 shaft is the downcast shaft for the air current which ventilates the pit, and the current of air which entered the workings at the mid-landing passed round Brown's working place. No. 2 shaft is the upcast shaft. (6) The only evidence tendered regarding temperature related to 13th May 1912 (the day of the proof), when the manager found it 52½° at the mid-landing where Brown and his fellow-miners had been kept waiting, 53½° at Brown's working place, and 61° at No. 2 Pit bottom. There is no evidence as to the temperature at these places on 26th

Jan. 30, 1913. June 1911. (7) At this mid-landing of No. 1 shaft on 26th June 1911 a very strong current of air blew in on Brown and his fellow-miners who were waiting there to be raised. They had been sweating at their work (though their clothes were not wet from any other cause), and felt the down draught very cold, and complained of it at the time. After the men reached the surface Brown complained of feeling cold, his teeth were chattering, he complained of his feet being cold, and ran part of the road home to try to recover warmth. He remarked to a fellow-workman who accompanied him, 'I doubt I'm sent for.' (8) The next morning Brown went down the pit but he was unable to start work on account of illness, due to the chill incurred on the previous day. He returned home and went to bed, pneumonia supervened, and he died therefrom on 3rd July 1911."

Brown v.
John Watson,
Limited.

The case further stated:—"In these circumstances I found that the deceased John Brown died from the effects of injuries by accident received by him on said 26th June, while in the course of his employment with the appellants, and awarded compensation to the respondents."

The question of law was:—"Whether there was evidence upon which it could be competently found that the said John Brown sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on 26th June 1911?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 30th January 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—There was no accident in this case. The current of air which blew in on Brown was normal and was designedly introduced into the mine. The wreck in the shaft was certainly an abnormal circumstance; but that could not be regarded as the accident causing Brown's death. This wreck was in the same position as the stoppage of the pump in Drylie v. Alloa Coal Company, Limited,¹ and there the Court held that the accident was not really that stoppage but the immersion of the miners in an unusual accumulation of water. Both that case and Kelly v. Auchenlea Coal Company, Limited,² were decided on the ground that the workman was exposed to certain exceptional circumstances. Here all that could be said was that the deceased, in obeying an order of the employers, was exposed to the ordinary conditions prevailing in the mine.

Argued for the respondent;—The circumstances of this case were identical with those of Drylie's case.¹ In both cases there was a breakdown in the machinery of the pit which disturbed the pit management; and in both cases the men had to leave the pit, and in doing so were kept waiting and suffered from exposure during that time. The only difference in the cases, viz., that in *Drylie*¹ the men were immersed in water while here they were immersed in cold air, was immaterial. The decision in Drylie,¹ therefore, ruled the present case. The accident here was the abnormal exposure of the deceased to the current of air in consequence of the wreck in the shaft. M'Millan v. Singer Sewing Machine Company, Limited,³ was distinguishable, because in that case there was no abnormal occurrence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case which has been referred to by counsel—the case of *Drylie*¹—is certainly the nearest to the one that is before us that can be referred to. But I think it is very clear that there is a marked distinction between that case and the present. In both cases, undoubtedly, Jan. 30, 1913. something abnormal happened in the pit. In the one case what happened was that a pump broke down, and in the other case what happened was that a shaft got out of order. Now in Drylie,¹ as a consequence of the accident in the pit, a state of things was produced which was quite out of the ordinary working of the pit. There occurred an alarming accumulation of water, and that accumulation was obviously an abnormal thing, for although the pit was a wet one, that does not mean that water was allowed generally to accumulate so as to be dangerous. The accumulation of water caused alarm and induced the men who were working to quit their work and to go to the bottom of the pit, to be ready as soon as they could get into the cage to ascend to the surface; and while they were there the water, which was icy-cold, rose upon them up to their knees.

¹ Supra, p. 549.

² 1911 S. C. 864.

³ Supra, p. 346.

Brown v.
John Watson,
Limited.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

That state of matters is quite different from the state of matters in the present case except in one particular element, namely, that in both cases the men who suffered had to stand in the pit for some time. But what appears to me to make the cases absolutely different is this, that in the one case the men were exposed to something which was entirely different from anything that they ever had to encounter in the pit before, whereas in this case there was nothing of that kind at all. There was no abnormality as regards the place at which they had to stand. The ventilation was working just as it usually worked, the air was coming down the shaft just as it usually came down, and there was nothing as regards the place where this man was standing which could be called an accident from any point of view. Is it to be said in these circumstances that the deceased has suffered from an accident because he caught a cold which ultimately developed into pneumonia, resulting in his death? I am quite unable to perceive how that can be held. It seems to me that the case is absolutely distinguished from that of *Drylie*¹; and therefore that the judgment of the arbitrator in this case was erroneous, and that we ought to answer the question accordingly.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. The question really comes to be whether or not this case is ruled by the case of Drylie,¹ which was decided last Saturday by a fuller bench than this. I have formed, with your Lordship, a clear opinion that the case is materially different from that of Drylie.¹ Drylie's case¹ was regarded by all the Judges as one lying very near the line of demarcation between liability and non-liability; but the majority of the Court refused to interfere with the arbitrator's decision, which put the case on the side inferring liability. The present case is, I think, plainly on the other side of the line. It was laid down quite clearly in Drylie,¹ as it had been in previous cases, that, if an applicant is to succeed, he must show, to start with, a definite accident of some sort, an occurrence involving something unusual, unexpected, and undesigned, with which the illness or death can be definitely connected. In *Drylie*¹ the majority of the Court thought that there was such an occurrence, namely, an unusual accumulation of ice-cold water at the pit bottom, in which, as an incident of his employment, the unfortunate Drylie found himself immersed up to

¹ Supra, p. 549.

Jan. 30, 1913. his knees, with the result that pneumonia and death followed. With regard to some observations made at the bar during the argument in this case, I should like to say that I did not consider that the breakdown of the pump in Drylie's case,¹ though it was a historical fact, explanatory of the unusual accumulation of water, was an essential point in the case. The accumulation of water might have arisen from some other cause. I find in the present case no proper analogue of any such occurrence. I cannot find here any accident. It looks to me very like the case of a man who, having got into a sweat in the course of his ordinary work—no uncommon occurrence—catches a cold which, unfortunately, develops into pneumonia, and he dies. At the most, it can be said that there was a wreck in one of the shafts—a fact, as it seems to me, of no particular importance in itself, and bearing no relation of physical causation to any injury the man sustained; that the men were ordered to leave the pit; and to leave it, instead of, as usual, by the upcast shaft, No. 2, by the downcast shaft, No. 1; that they had to wait at the mid-landing, while the men from the lower seam, who usually ascended by this shaft, were lifted up; and that Brown unfortunately caught a chill, which resulted disastrously. In all this, I cannot see any accident, within the meaning of the statute or the cases. The mere fact that the men were ordered to make their exit by one shaft instead of another will not do; and the surrounding facts, as your Lordship has pointed out, were normal, and not abnormal, so far as one can see. I think we must keep in view two things; first, that it is not every deviation from the normal routine of employment in a mine or elsewhere that will be sufficient to introduce the element of accident; and second, that an ordinary disease like pneumonia is not an accident, although it may arise from or be contracted by an accident. If one is to refer to cases, although I am not sure there is here much advantage in doing so, I should say that this case bears more resemblance to that of *M'Millan*² than it does to Drylie.¹ I confess the only hesitation I have felt about this matter is that one is differing from the conclusion of so experienced and able an arbitrator as Sheriff Shennan; but I am satisfied that his conclusion was not warranted by the facts found. Therefore, with your Lordship, I am for answering the question in the negative.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I am glad your Lordships have been able to reach the result which has just been expressed; because it indicates that the consequences of the decision of Drylie's case¹ are not so far reaching as I apprehended. At the same time I cannot see the distinction between this case and *Drylie's*¹ so clearly as your Lordships. Indeed I think there is a very close resemblance between the facts of the two cases.

In each case there was a breakdown of some machinery in the mine. In each case, as the result of that breakdown, the men required to leave the pit; and it makes no difference that in the one case they reached the pit bottom of their own accord, and that in the other the foreman, for the safety of the men, ordered them all out of the pit. In each case they were incidentally exposed to circumstances that were likely to produce chill; and in each case one man suffered from chill, which afterwards developed Jan. 30, 1913. into pneumonia from which he died. I quite appreciate the distinction ^{Brown v.} that your Lordships have drawn—that the medium in which the man in ^{John Watson,} this case was immersed was a current of air, and in that of *Drylie*¹ gradually ^{Limited.} rising water. But in reality what caused the man's death was in each case Lord Salvesen. accidental exposure to cold. Indeed, in some respects, Drylie's case¹ is not so strong as the present; because I think a man is more likely to catch pneumonia from being detained for an hour and a half in a cold current of air than from standing twenty minutes even in what is described as ice-cold water up to his knees.

¹ Supra, p. 549.

² Supra, p. 346.

But I need scarcely say that there being, as your Lordships rule, a clear distinction between the two cases, I should be the last to desire to push Drylie's case¹ any further. I think it was Lord Dundas who said it was very near the line. I think it was across the line. He thought it was on the other side. But certainly I think this case is one in which it cannot be said in any popular sense that this man met with an accident; and on that ground I am clearly of opinion, with your Lordships, that we should reverse the determination of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. Under the statute it is necessary for the applicant to show that the injury in question was a personal injury by accident. In this case it cannot be said that at the place where the man received the injury, which led to his death, anything happened of the nature of accident. It does not appear what the temperature was or what was the relation between it and the temperature at other places on the day in question. But it is not said that, however that stood, there was anything whatever at the place where he got the injury that was abnormal, unexpected, or likely to lead, in ordinary circumstances, to anything untoward.

It is said, however, by the applicant that there was an accident, because at the shaft there was a breakdown—what the case calls a wreck; but it is not said that that accident had any direct effect whatever as producing any change at the place where the man got the injury—no increase or change in the very strong current of air which led ultimately to pneumonia and death. In the end the necessary element of accident was attempted to be found in the fact that he was unexpectedly at this place and for an abnormal period. Now, it seems to me that such connection is not so direct as to bring the case within the scope of what Lord Macnaghten expressed when he said you must find the elements of something unexpected and untoward; it rather comes under the category of an event fairly incident to his employment.

It is admitted that, if the man had gone to the shaft in ordinary course, and had stood an hour and a half, in consequence of an order from one of his superiors, there would be no claim whatever; but it is said that, if that superior, having given an order that he should go to this particular place intending at once to relieve him, had forgotten that he gave the order, in consequence of which the man had remained there for an hour and a half, there would have been an accident. It seems to me that would be

¹ Supra, p. 549.

Jan. 30, 1913. extending the result of the Drylie decision¹ very considerably; and I think your Lordships are all of opinion that the Court in that case went about as far as it would be inclined to go. It seems to me in the case of *Drylie*¹ there were two elements which are wanting in the present case—the element of the place itself being in an abnormal condition, and also the element of the accident to the pump having been the direct cause which produced the abnormal condition in the place where the man stood and received the injury which led to his death.

I concur in thinking that this case is not within the rule of Drylie,¹ and that the arbitrator has come to a wrong decision.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, recalled the award of the arbitrator, and remitted to him to dismiss the claim.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 80. JOHN W. M'CRINDLE AND ANOTHER (Ponton's Executors), Pursuers (Appellants).—Morison, K.C.—Wark.
Jan. 31, 1913. ARCHIBALD C. PONTON, Defender (Respondent).—Sol.-Gen. Anderson
—Hamilton.

Ponton's
Executors v.
Ponton.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Reconvention—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907
(7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 6 (h)—Foreigner suing as executor.

The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, sec. 6, enacts that "any action competent in the Sheriff Court may be brought within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff . . . (h) where the party sued is the pursuer in any action pending within the jurisdiction against the party suing."

Held that the institution of an action in a Sheriff Court by a foreigner suing as an executor did not, under the section, give that Court jurisdiction in a counter action against him as an individual.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

JOHN W. M'CRINDLE, residing in England, and Archibald R. Maclean, residing at Edinburgh, as trustees and executors of the deceased Mrs Jane Ponton, who resided in England, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against Archibald C. Ponton, residing at Tunbridge Wells. The pursuers' claim was for payment of sums due by the defender to Mrs Ponton, or to the pursuers as representing her.

The pursuers set forth that the defender was subject to the jurisdiction of the Court (1) ex reconvention by virtue of section 6 (h) of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907*; and (2) by virtue of arrestments used to found jurisdiction. They averred—and the defender admitted—that an action was then depending in the same Court against them at the instance of the defender as sole surviving executor of Mungo Ponton (Mrs Ponton's husband) in which he sought decree for the delivery of certain furniture liferented by Mrs Ponton under her husband's will, or for payment of its value. With regard to the arrestments, parties were at issue as to whether any funds belonging to the defender had been attached.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction.

¹ Supra, p. 549.

* Quoted in the rubric.

On 11th December 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the defender so far as directed to jurisdiction alleged to be founded on reconvention; quoad ultra and before further answer of said plea in law allows to both parties a proof of their averments relating to the question of jurisdiction so far as alleged to be founded upon arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and to each a conjunct probation."

Ponton's
Executors v.
Ponton.

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Maconochie) who, on 22nd December 1911, adhered, and remitted the cause to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed therein.*

After further procedure, in which it was admitted that nothing had been arrested to found jurisdiction, the Sheriff-substitute sustained the defender's first plea in law to the full extent and dismissed the action.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 31st January 1913.

At the hearing the authorities noted below were referred to.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am glad that we carried the debate so far and heard senior counsel, because Mr Morison has said as much as can be said in support of his view. He has not, however, altered the impression I had from the first. We now have it that the case is solely maintained on the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, and it is said that the

* "NOTE.—I concur in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute with regard to the question of reconvention. I think that the plea is bad on two grounds. (First) The action at the instance of the defender on which the plea is founded was one for delivery of furniture, and failing delivery for the value of the furniture whatever that might be. The present action is a pecuniary claim at the instance of the executors of a deceased person against the pursuer in the former action. I do not think that it can be said that those two claims arise in eodem negotio, or that they are ejusdem generis, and if that be so, it is settled law that the plea founded on reconvention fails—Thompson v. Whitehead, (1862) 24 D. 331. (Second) I think that the pursuer in the former action was suing in a totally different capacity—that of executor—from that in which he is being sued here, and that being so, I cannot hold that the jurisdiction can be upheld. How widely the two capacities differ from each other is shown by the cases of Smith v. Stoddart, 12 D. 1185, and Turnbull v. Veitch, 16 R. 1079, in which it was held that it was incompetent to amend a summons brought at the instance of a widow in her individual capacity to the effect of altering the instance so as to enable her to sue as executrix of her husband. In my opinion the jurisdiction could not have been sustained on the ground of reconvention before the passing of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, and I cannot hold that that Act has made any alteration on the law with regard to that matter."

¹ For the appellants.—Macadam v. Macadam, (1873) 11 Macph. 860; Thompson v. Whitehead, (1862) 24 D. 331; Hurst, Nelson, & Co., Limited, v. Spenser Whatley, Limited, 1912 S. C. 1041. For the respondent.—Longworth v. Yelverton, (1868) 7 Macph. 70, per Lord Kinloch, at p. 76; Allan v. Wormser, Harris, & Co., (1894) 21 R. 866, per Lord Young, at p. 872; Thompson v. Whitehead, 24 D. 331; Turnbull v. Veitch, (1889) 16 R. 1079; Smith v. Stoddart, (1850) 12 D. 1185; Graham Stewart on Diligence, p. 107, and cases there cited; Bell's Prins. (10th ed.) sec. 573 (4); Executors (Scotland) Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. 55), secs. 6 and 7. Sec. 6 (d) of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, was also referred to.

Jan. 31, 1913. definition of "pursuer" * and the terms of subsection (h) of section 6

Ponton's
Executors v.
Ponton.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

make it perfectly plain that all the protection hitherto given to a party suing as executor in the only Court in which he can sue, as regards his personal estate, is gone. Now, in the first place, I should expect, if that were the intention of the Act, that it would be very clearly expressed, and not left to be inferred from the general language of the clause. The real question is—whatever the Act may say about a pursuer—Is the party who is suing the same party who is being sued as a defender in the other case? Now if he is not suing for himself, but in the exercise of an official duty to sue, his own persona is not involved. The fact that something may be decreed for against him as an individual, such as expenses, does not alter the case. Any decree against him on the merits of the case can only be against him in his fiduciary capacity. As regards his liabilities, his official position is quite different from his individual position, and when section 6 (h) speaks of a party suing, I take it that party means person as he sues, e.g., as executor or trustee. In a case such as this the executor is not, as an individual, a party to the suit at all. If Mr Morison's view were sound, then, if a body of five or six trustees were under the necessity of suing here for something due to the trust-estate, each trustee would be liable to an action for his own personal debts. I do not think any expression in the Act leads to this result. A foreign defender owes no obedience to the Scottish Courts, unless he is found in the position of asking the Court to give him its services for his own ends. Here, on the contrary, he is only fulfilling a duty he is called on to perform, and can get no decree beneficial to himself, or such as will provide a money compensation in his own action. That being the state of matters, I can see nothing to indicate that the ordinary consequence has been changed in any way by the Act, and I cannot read those portions of sections 5 and 6 as necessarily implying any such result as is maintained by the pursuers.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. The first plea for the defender is stated in two words, "no jurisdiction." I should like to say that that is not a proper way of stating the plea. A plea in law ought to be a proposition in law. The two words "no jurisdiction" were here designed to support two different legal propositions, based upon separate grounds. I do not like such pleading.

The Sheriff-substitute has sustained the defender's first plea so far as directed to reconvention, and it is now admitted that the other branch of the plea is out of the case. The learned Sheriff on appeal adhered, and thought that the plea was bad on two grounds. I prefer not to proceed on the first of these grounds; as at present advised, I should be disposed to differ from the Sheriff in regard to it; but it is unnecessary to say more about that, because I entirely agree with the second reason which he gives. He says: "I think that the pursuer in the former action was suing in a totally different capacity—that of executor—from that in which he is being Jan. 31, 1913. sued here, and that being so, I cannot hold that the jurisdiction can be upheld.” I think this view is plainly right, apart from the Sheriff Courts ^{Pontons’} Executors v. Act, 1907; indeed, Mr Morison conceded that it was so according to the ^{Pontons’} law and practice before that Act, and based his argument on the Act Lord Dundas. alone. I do not think, however, that section 6 (h) has made any material alteration in the law upon the point we are dealing with. Reading the words according to their natural meaning it seems to me that “the party sued”—viz., Mr A. C. Ponton, an individual—is not “the pursuer in” the “action pending”—who is the executor of the deceased Mungo Ponton. The section, if it was intended to alter the law and practice, ought to (and presumably would) have made that plain, by using such words as “the party sued, in whatever capacity he is so sued.” I am not satisfied that the statute intended to make, or has made, the sweeping change Mr Morison maintains it has. On these short and simple grounds, I think we should affirm the interlocutors appealed against.

* The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 3 (n) defines "Pursuer" as meaning and including "any person making a claim or demand, or seeking any warrant or order competent in the Sheriff Court."

LORD SALVESSEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion on what forms the ratio of judgment in this case, viz., that it is not a ground of jurisdiction against an Englishman as an individual that he has, in a representative capacity, sued an action in a Sheriff Court of Scotland which is still in dependence. I think the reasons assigned by Lord Dundas are unanswerable, and I have nothing to add on that point.

I desire, however, to say with regard to the first ground on which the learned Sheriff has sustained the plea of no jurisdiction, that, as at present advised, I do not agree with him. I think, even under the law as we have to apply it in this Court as laid down in Thompson v. Whitehead,¹ and affirmed in Hurst, Nelson, & Company, Limited, v. Spenser Whatley, Limited,² the two claims here would be held to be ejusdem generis if the actions had been between the same parties. But, even if there had been any doubt on the matter, it is removed as regards actions in the Sheriff Court by section 6 (h) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, which confers jurisdiction “where the party sued is the pursuer in any action pending within the jurisdiction against the party suing.” These words are so wide that they admit of no qualification, and amount to a practical abrogation of the restrictions affecting the jurisdiction ex reconvensione of the Court of Session as defined in Thompson v. Whitehead.¹ I think it right to make these observations for the guidance of the learned Sheriff as the question is very likely to arise on some future occasion.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. As to the Sheriff’s first ground of decision, I think he was perhaps misled by the fact that the action in which Mr Ponton is pursuer is, in its present shape, not for delivery of furniture or for its value, but for payment of a sum of money from the executry estate. On the second ground, Mr Morison argued, in the first place, on what he maintained was the probable intention of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1907, viz., the removal of all former restrictions on jurisdiction founded ex recon-

¹ 24 D. 331.² 1912 S. C. 1041.

Jan. 31, 1913. ventions, and, in the second place, on the meaning of the words of section 6 (h) of the Act read in light of the interpretation clause. He said that it was clear that at least one restriction was swept away, viz., that the claims must be in eodem negotio or ejusdem generis. On that point, I do not think it necessary to express an opinion, because, even if he is right, it does not follow that all other restrictions are also swept away. It is still necessary to consider whether the requirement that the actions shall be between the same parties is also removed. As to this, Mr Morison was not able to suggest any reason to make his contention probable, or any principle for the rule for which he contends. In Whitehead's case,¹ the Lord Justice-Clerk enunciated a principle the justice of which is obvious, but which is now inapplicable if Mr Morison's contention be sound, namely, that the foreigner is not entitled to recover money in the Courts of this country from a subject of this country and refuse to furnish his antagonist with the means which may be necessary to enable him to pay his debt. The wording of the statute seems to me inconsistent with Mr Morison's contention. Taking the Act in its plain meaning, I am of opinion that here the "party suing" in the one action is not the "party sued" in the other, in the sense in which these words are used in section 6 (h) of the Act. Mr Morison pointed out that the earlier action was one in which Mr Ponton had an interest not only as an executor but also as an individual; but that is a mere accident, and even so, it might very well turn out that the whole executry estate was required for the payment of debts, and that in fact he had no individual interest at all.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

P. MORISON & SON, W.S.—J. S. MORTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 81.

THE DARGAVIL COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—

Jan. 31, 1913.

Murray, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Dargavil
Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Inland
Revenue.

S. H. FRANCIS (Surveyor of Taxes), Respondent.—

Sol.-Gen. Anderson—J. A. T. Robertson.

Revenue—Income-tax—Profits of trade—Deductions—Hire of wagons with option of purchase—Deduction of part of payments representing hire.

Under a hire-purchase agreement, between a coal company and a wagon company, the latter agreed to let on hire to the former a number of wagons for a fixed period of years in return for an annual payment, an option being conferred on the coal company to purchase the wagons at the end of the period at a nominal price.

Held that the portion of the annual payments which represented the hire of wagons, but not the portion which represented the price of the option to purchase, fell to be allowed as a deduction in arriving at the assessable profits of the coal company for the purpose of income-tax.

Exchequer
Cause.
1ST DIVISION.

On 23rd December 1912 a case was stated for the opinion of the Court by the Commissioners of Income-tax at the request of the Darngavil Coal Company, Limited, which had been assessed for Jan. 31, 1913. Income-tax, under Schedule D of the Income-tax Acts, in certain sums in respect of the profits of the business of the Company as coal-masters. The Company claimed deductions from the assessments in respect of payments made under certain agreements, in the circumstances set forth in the case as follows:—

Darngavil
Coal Co.,
Limited, v
Inland
Revenue.

“(1) The appellant Company carry on the business of coalmasters, and in the course of such business they have to convey the coal from the collieries to their customers in railway wagons.

“(2) In order to obtain wagons for this purpose the appellant Company has from time to time entered into agreements in the form of the agreement between them and the Scottish Wagon Company, Limited, of which a copy is annexed hereto and forms part of the case.*

* The agreement was in the following terms:—

“I. The Wagon Company hereby agrees to let on hire to the lessees, and the lessees agree to take on hire from the Wagon Company 100 railway wagons . . . and that for the term of ten years from the 23rd day of February 1909.

“II. The lessees bind and oblige themselves and their successors whomsoever to pay to the Wagon Company the yearly sum of £801, 5s. sterling, without deduction, as rent or hire for the use of said wagons, and that by quarterly payments . . .

“III. The lessees hereby agree at their own expense to maintain the said wagons in good repair and working order throughout the said term of ten years, and if any accident or other damage shall happen to any of them during said term, the lessees agree to have the same repaired or rebuilt to the satisfaction of the Wagon Company, who shall neither be bound to repair or rebuild any of said wagons, nor to supply other wagons in lieu of any which may be damaged or rendered unfit for use. The wagons are to be at the risk of the lessees, who shall not be entitled to any deduction from the rent or hire in respect of damage to or destruction of wagons, and the lessees shall be bound to relieve the Wagon Company of all claims for damages or otherwise arising from or connected with the said wagons or their use.

“IV. The Wagon Company shall be entitled twice in every year during the said term of ten years to inspect the said wagons . . . and in case the Wagon Company shall find, upon such inspection, that any of the said wagons are not maintained in good repair and working order, or that any of them are deficient, they shall be entitled to require the lessees to do such repairs as are necessary . . .

“V. If any quarterly payment, or any part thereof, shall remain unpaid by the lessees for one month after the same shall become payable, the Wagon Company shall be entitled immediately thereafter to seize and take possession of all the said wagons . . .

“VI. Immediately on the expiration of the said term of ten years the lessees shall be bound, unless they shall exercise the option of purchasing the said wagons and shall pay the price thereof as aftermentioned, to deliver . . . the whole of the said wagons in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear only excepted) . . .

“VII. Instead of delivering up the said wagons to the Wagon Company at the expiration of the said term, as provided in article VI. hereof, the lessees shall have the option of purchasing the same from the Wagon Company at the price of one shilling sterling for each wagon . . . and upon . . . the price being paid and the whole quarterly payments before specified being also paid with any interest due . . . the said wagons shall become the property of the lessees . . .”

Jan. 31, 1913. " In particular, they have entered into the following agreements with the Scottish Wagon Company, Limited, viz. :—

Darnagavil
Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Inland
Revenue.

No.	Date.	No. of Wagons.	Period of Years.	Annual Payments.
1	19th Feb. 1902	50	7	£550. This agreement was duly carried through, and the wagons in due course became the property of the Company.
2	30th Aug. 1906	25	10	£223, 4s. 7d. This agreement is still running.
3	30th March 1909	100	10	£801, 5s. This agreement is still running.

" These agreements were in existence during the years on the profits of which the assessments under appeal fall to be computed.

" (4) The wagons comprised in the three agreements referred to above were all new at the date of the respective agreements, and they have not been the subject of any prior or subsequent agreement.

" (5) At the termination of the respective agreements the various wagons, the subject thereof, having regard to the average life and rate of depreciation applicable to such wagons had or will have a substantial value in excess of the one shilling referred to in clause VII. of the agreements.

" (6) In the appellant Company's own accounts the whole of the annual payments paid under the agreements have been treated as an expense of carrying on the business and have been debited to the wagon revenue account. . . . No portion of the said payments has been debited to capital, and there is no asset in the Company's balance-sheet in respect of the wagons to which the said agreements refer.

" (7) In the returns for income-tax assessment, however, the appellant Company have divided the said payments between revenue and capital, and have deducted as a trading expense that portion only of the annual payments which the Scottish Wagon Company, Limited, certified had been treated by them as revenue, and had entered into the computation of their profits for income-tax assessment. . . .

" (9) Prior to 29th May 1909, at which date the Secretary of Inland Revenue, Somerset House, London, issued to H.M. Surveyors of Taxes, the circular of which a copy was produced to the Commissioners, it was the practice of H.M. Surveyors of Taxes to allow to the taxpayer as a deduction in ascertaining profits chargeable under Schedule D of section 100 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, that portion of the payments made under agreements similar to the one annexed hereto which the Wagon Finance Companies certified that they had treated as revenue, depreciation being allowable on that portion of the payments which had not been so treated as revenue. Subsequent, however, to that date, no such deduction in ascertaining profits has been admitted, the whole payments under the agreements having been regarded by the Crown as payments of capital which should be treated as part of the cost price to be taken into consideration in calculating the annual allowance for wear and tear. The present appeal has been taken in consequence of the departure indicated in the circular from the practice which formerly prevailed." Jan. 31, 1913.

The Commissioners being of opinion that the transaction was a purchase by instalments, refused to allow the deductions. Darnagavil
Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Inland
Revenue.

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Kinnear) on 31st January 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The agreement was purely one of hire,¹ and the yearly sums paid were purely rent, the wagons remaining the property of the Wagon Company until the option to purchase was exercised by the appellants. That being so, it followed that they were entitled to deduct the whole payments as a necessary expense of their business. (2) Alternatively, part of the yearly payments was in respect of hire, and only part in consideration of an option to purchase, and the appellants were at any rate entitled to deduct the former.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellants' agreement with the Wagon Company was not one for hire but for purchase by instalments, subject to a suspensive condition until all the instalments were paid. If, however, it was one for hire with an option to acquire the property, deductions should be allowed only for such part of the payments as represented the hire of the wagons.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case raises a question under the Income-tax Acts as to the deductions which are to be allowed for necessary expenses before striking the profits of a coal company. The Company claims a deduction in respect of payments which were made by them to a wagon company under a hire and purchase agreement under which they get wagons. Hitherto there does not seem to have been any difficulty in adjusting this matter, because the practice of the Crown has been to split the payment,—to allow a deduction of such portion of it as they thought fairly represented the hire, and, on the other hand, not to allow any deduction for the portion that represented a payment towards the eventual purchase. But matters were altered by a circular which was sent by the Secretary of the Inland Revenue to surveyors of income-tax, and which gave instructions, in very dogmatic terms, that no deduction was to be allowed at all, because such instalments were in no part hire but were merely payments towards purchase. I think it is very much to be regretted that circulars of that sort should be sent forth without taking the advice of the law officers; and the proof of that has come in this case, where the law officers have found themselves practically unable to support the contention of the circular.

I think the case is too clear for argument. Here is a company which gets its wagons under what is known as a hire-purchase agreement. It pays so much a year. It undertakes to keep the wagons in repair. It pays

¹ Helby v. Matthews, [1895] A. C. 471, Lord Chancellor Herschell, at pp. 475-6 and 477-8, Lord Watson, at p. 479, as distinguished from Lee v. Butler, [1893] 2 Q. B. 318; Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co. v. Maclure, (1882) 21 Ch. D. 309; Marston v. Kerr's Trustees, (1879) 6 R. 898; McEntire v. Crossley Brothers, [1895] A. C. 457; Cropper & Co. v. Donaldson, (1880) 7 R. 1108; Murdoch & Co., Limited, v. Greig, (1889) 16 R. 396.

Jan. 31, 1913. so much a year for a period of years and at the end of that period of years it has an option, if it chooses, to make what is practically a nominal payment and then the wagons belong to it. It is perfectly clear, on the decided cases, that during the course of that period of years the wagons are the property of the wagon company and not of the coal company. But the coal company wishes to use them; and accordingly an extra payment is made in respect of that. No discrimination is made between the two kinds of payment; it is a slump sum that is paid. There are accordingly two things going on concurrently: there is the sale and purchase agreement on certain terms—not a sale at the moment, but an option to buy the wagons on certain terms at a future date—and, on the other hand, there is also a hiring agreement. It is clear that, so far as the coal company have the use of the wagons during that time, the hire is an expense which they are entitled to deduct, just as if they owned no wagons at all but simply hired them from day to day. It is equally clear that they could not claim to deduct the whole of what they paid to the wagon company, because a large portion of what they pay is really a payment for an option, at a future date, to get a wagon at a sum far under its real value.

Darngavil
Coal Co.,
Limited, v.
Inland
Revenue.

Ld. President.

We have not before us in the case the materials for splitting up the payment and saying what is truly hire and what is truly payment towards eventual purchase. The practice in the past has been to deal with this upon the indication that is given by the way that the wagon company choose to treat these payments in their accounts. That was quite a fair basis, if the parties choose to adopt it; but it is obvious that what the wagon company choose to do in their accounts is not a real criterion in a question as to what is the true nature of the coal company's payments. The question, however, is merely an accountant's and an actuary's question, and I should hope that the parties will be able to agree. But I think the proper course for your Lordships is to remit to the Commissioners with an instruction that they are bound to allow as a deduction such portion of the yearly payments made by the coal company under these wagon agreements as represents the hire of wagons which are not yet their property, and that the Commissioners must take up the question of apportionment and decide it for themselves if the parties do not agree.

LORD JOHNSTON and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the determination of the Commissioners and remit to them to proceed in the case, with instructions that they are bound to allow as deduction that portion of the yearly payments made in respect of the wagon agreement referred to in the case which represents the consideration paid for being allowed to use the wagons which, under the contract, are not yet their property . . ."

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—SIR PHILIP J. HAMILTON GRIERSON, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Agents.

DON BROTHERS, BUIST, & COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).— No. 82.
Sandeman, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

THE SCOTTISH INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS AND ANOTHER, Defenders Feb. 5, 1913.
 (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Anderson.—T. G. Robertson.

Insurance—National Insurance—Rates of contributions—Determination by Limited, v. Commissioners—Competency of reducing determination—Jurisdiction—Scottish Insurance Exclusion of jurisdiction by statutory remedy—National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55), sec. 66 (1). Commis- sioners.

The National Insurance Act, 1911, enacts, by section 66 (1) (c), that questions as to the rates of contributions to be paid by an employer and his employee respectively shall be determined by the Commissioners. An appeal is provided with regard to certain determinations of the Commissioners, but not with regard to their determinations under section 66 (1) (c).

The Court dismissed an action for the reduction of a determination by the Commissioners under this subsection, holding that, in the absence of averments that they had acted ultra vires, the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere with their decision.

ON 29th October 1912 Don Brothers, Buist, & Company, Limited, 1st DIVISION.
 jute spinners, Dundee, brought an action against Jessie Anderson, Lord Hunter.
 and the Scottish Insurance Commissioners for reduction of a decision by the Commissioners as to the contributions payable under Part I. of the National Insurance Act, 1911,* by the pursuers and the defender Jessie Anderson respectively.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuers are jute spinners and manufacturers in Dundee, and employ a large number of hands in connection with their business. The defender Jessie Anderson is one of the pursuers' employees." (Cond. 2) "The said Jessie Anderson is twenty-three years of age, and is a person employed by the pursuers within the meaning of Part I. of the National Insurance Act, 1911. By section 4 (1) of the Act it is provided that 'The contributions payable in respect of employed contributors shall be at the rate specified in Part I. of the Second Schedule to this Act (hereinafter referred to as the "employed rate"), and shall comprise contributions by the contributors and contributions by their employers at the rates specified in that part of that Schedule, and shall be payable at weekly or other prescribed intervals. . . . ' Section 4 (2) enacts that 'The employer shall, in the first instance, pay both the contributions payable by himself (in this Act referred to as the "employer's contributions"), and also on behalf of the employed contributor the contributions payable by such contributor, and shall be entitled to recover from the contributor by deduction from his wages or otherwise the amount of the contributions so paid by him on behalf of the contributor in accordance with the rules set out in the third Schedule to this Act.'" (Cond. 3) "Part I. of the Second Schedule of the Act settles the rates of contributions, and the proportions thereof payable respectively by the employer, the employee, or contributor, and out of moneys provided by Parliament. Inter alia, Part I. of said Schedule provides:—'Where the rate of remuneration exceeds 1s. 6d. but does not exceed 2s. a working day:—

* 1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55.

Feb. 5, 1913.

Don Brothers,
Buist, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

'To be paid by the employer . . .			a week.
	for women		4d.
do. contributor	"		1d.
do. out of monies
provided by Parliament	"		1d.
Where the rate of remuneration exceeds 2s., but does not exceed 2s. 6d. a working day :—

'To be paid by the employer . . .			a week.
	for women		3d.
do. contributor	"		3d.*"

(Cond. 4) "It is, inter alia, provided by section 66 of the said Act that if any question arises :—(b) As to the rate of contributions payable by or in respect of any insured person ; or (c) As to the rates of contributions payable in respect of an employed contributor by the employer and the contributor respectively :—the question shall be determined by the Insurance Commissioners in accordance with regulations made by them for that purpose" (Cond. 5) "Questions having arisen between the pursuers and the defender as to the rate of contribution to be paid by the pursuers in respect of the defender, and as to the proportion thereof recoverable by the pursuers from the defender under the Act, the pursuers on 6th July 1912 made application to the said Scottish Insurance Commissioners in terms of the regulations made by the said Commissioners dated 14th June 1912, with a view to the determination by the Commissioners of the said questions. The questions as put in the said application were in the terms following :—'Whether the value of stamp to be affixed by employer is 6d., and the amount recoverable from the worker 3d., as the rate of remuneration is 2s. 1½d. for a working day of ten hours, being the period of employment for each day except Saturday, fixed in accordance with the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, section 24 (1).'" (Cond. 6) "The said Commissioners fixed a hearing on said application to take place at Dundee on 2nd October 1912. At said hearing the pursuers were represented, and the defender was present. Witnesses were examined, and it was proved by evidence which was not contradicted, and it is in accordance with fact, that the said defender's employment with the pursuers was liable to be terminated without previous notice by either party ; that when working full time the defender was employed for fifty-five hours in each week ; that the said full working week was made up of ten hours in each day of the week from Monday to Friday, and five hours on Saturday, being the statutory maximum, in terms of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901 ; that the defender's remuneration in any one week depended upon the number of hours which she might work, and was calculated at the rate of 11s. 7d. for fifty-five hours ; that when the defender worked the full fifty-five hours in each week she was entitled to receive, in addition to the said 11s. 7d., a bonus of 3d. ; and that if the defender should be absent from her employment or not working during any part of any week, she was not entitled to the said bonus of 3d., and her remuneration for that week suffered a diminution calculated on the time during which she might not be working at the said rate of 11s. 7d. for fifty-five hours." Feb. 5, 1913. (Cond. 7) "The said Commissioners, of 21st August 1912, issued a decision on the questions submitted by said application, by which they pretended to determine:—'That in respect of the employment by the applicants of Jessie Anderson, 17 Dallfield Walk, Dundee, the contributions payable under Part I. of the National Insurance Act are as follows:—4d. a week by the employer, and 1d. a week by the employee.' . . ." (Cond. 8) "It was proved to the said Commissioners, and is the fact, that the working day of the said Jessie Anderson in the pursuers' employment consists of 10 hours; and her remuneration for each such working day at the said rate of 11s. 7d. for 55 hours is in fact 2s. 1½d. By said Part I. of the Second Schedule to the Act the contributions in the case of a female employee whose rate of remuneration exceeds 2s., but does not exceed 2s. 6d. per working day, are fixed at 3d. to be paid by the employer and 3d. by the employee. The said decision of the Commissioners, which purports to decide that the contributions payable by the pursuers and defender are 4d. a week by the pursuers, and 1d. a week by the defender, is accordingly contrary to the express provisions of the statute, and is thus ultra vires of the Commissioners. Their good faith is not called in question. In these circumstances, the pursuers have been obliged to bring the present action."

* The provisions of this section are more fully stated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, infra.

Don Brothers,
Brist, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

The pursuers pleaded;—The rate of remuneration of the defender being 2s. 1½d. for each working day, and the contributions to National Health Insurance for a female employee where the working day's remuneration exceeds 2s. but does not exceed 2s. 6d. being fixed by the National Insurance Act at 3d. for the employer, and 3d. for the employee, the pretended finding of the Commissioners that the said contributions are 4d. a week by the pursuers and 1d. a week by the defender is contrary to the provisions of the statute, and should be set aside.

The defenders the Scottish Insurance Commissioners, who alone appeared to defend the action, pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The Commissioners having in good faith and intra vires determined the question raised by the pursuers under section 66, subsection (1) (c), of the Act, the Court has no jurisdiction to set aside the said determination, and the action should accordingly be dismissed.

On 13th December 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) sustained the first plea in law for the comparing defenders and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the facts]—These Commissioners are a statutory body appointed under the Insurance Act, to whom very ample powers both of an administrative and of a judicial character are entrusted by the Legislature. Inter alia, section 66 (1) of the Act provides that 'If any question arises—

"(a) As to whether any employment or any class of employment is or will be employment within the meaning of this part of this Act, or as to whether a person is entitled to become a voluntary contributor; or

"(b) As to the rate of contributions payable by or in respect of any insured person; or

"(c) As to the rates of contributions payable in respect of an employed contributor by the employer and the contributor respectively; the question shall be determined by the Insurance Commissioners, in accordance with regulations made by them for the purpose.' In virtue of the proviso which follows, provision is made for appeal in special form so far

Feb. 5, 1913.

Don Brothers,
Buist, & Co.,
Limited, v.
Scottish
Insurance
Commissioners.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Kinnear) on 5th February 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—Contributions payable by employers and employed contributors were to be determined according to rates of remuneration per "working day,"¹ and it was for the Court, and not for the Commissioners, to determine the legal question of what, in the sense of the statute, was a "working day." A working day in the present case was not a sixth part of the working hours of the week, because Saturday was only half a working day. The working day was truly a day of ten hours, and, as the remuneration for that period exceeded two shillings, the decision of the Commissioners was contrary to the rates prescribed by Part I. of the Second Schedule to the Act. As the Commissioners had gone outwith their province, and had in this way misinterpreted the provisions of the Act, their decision fell to be reduced.²

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

as a question under (a) is concerned; and the Commissioners may allow a question under (b) to be determined by an approved society. Nothing, however, is said in qualification of the absolute right of the Commissioners to decide a question under (c), and, as the decision now challenged was pronounced under that subsection, it is maintained in defence that the Court has no jurisdiction to set aside the determination of the Commissioners.

"The pursuers say :—[His Lordship then quoted the pursuers' averments, and continued]—

"It is not said that the Commissioners refused to hear any evidence or argument tendered to them, or that they did not act in good faith in determining the question submitted to them as they did. As I understand the pursuers' case, it is maintained that the Commissioners had to consider, first, what was an ordinary working day of the defender, and second, what remuneration she in fact received for such a day. So considered they say that the working day of the said defender was a day of 10 hours, and that her remuneration was 2s. 1½d. For the Commissioners to take any other view of the facts as proved was to act perversely and in excess of the powers entrusted to them by the statute.

"I do not find that the statute has prescribed any regulations for determining what in any particular case is the rate of remuneration per working day. It is obvious that where the employee works for different periods of time on different days and earns different sums in respect of each day's work, the rate of remuneration per working day will, or may have to, be arrived at by some system of averaging. It appears to me to be quite possible to construe the words of the statute in the case of the defender's employment by taking as her rate of remuneration per working day the amount which she earns upon an ordinary working day, or by taking the whole amount which she in fact earns during the 6 days which she works and dividing by 6. Now, it appears to me that, if two constructions of the language of Part I. in the Second Schedule are possible, the Legislature has entrusted the Commissioners with the duty of interpreting the language, and it is not for me to interfere even if I were of opinion that they had reached a wrong conclusion. In a recent case—Board of Education v. Rice, [1911] A. C. 179—the Lord Chancellor, at page 182, made, with reference to the powers of the Board of Education to determine questions under the Act, a number

¹ 1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55, Second Schedule, Part I.

² Caledonian Railway Co. v. Glasgow Corporation, (1905) 7 F. 1020, Lord President, at p. 1027; The King v. Board of Education, [1910] 2 K. B. 165, Farwell, L.J., at p. 177, aff. sub nom. Board of Education v. Rice, [1911] A. C. 179, Lord Chancellor (Loreburn), at pp. 181 and 185.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I confess I think this is an exceedingly plain case. Feb. 5, 1913.
 The National Insurance Act of 1911 provides for certain contributions being made by employers and employees, and those contributions vary according as the rate of remuneration exceeds eighteenpence and does not exceed two shillings a working day, or exceeds two shillings and does not exceed two shillings and sixpence. By section 66 of the Act it is provided that if any question arises—(a) and (b) I leave out—(c) “As to the rates of contributions payable in respect of an employed contributor by the employer and the contributor respectively; the question shall be determined by the Insurance Commissioners.” Then there is a proviso giving a certain limited appeal in the cases of (a) and (b), but not in the case of (c).

Don Brothers
 Buist, & Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Scottish
 Insurance
 Commissioners.

Now, a question did arise between the pursuers in this action, who are jute spinners, and one of their hands as to whether the contributions should be in respect of remuneration at a rate between eighteenpence and two shillings or at a rate between two shillings and two shillings and sixpence; and accordingly the present pursuers made an application to the Commissioners with a view to the determination of the question which had arisen. The actual form of the question put to the Commissioners was, if I may say so, absolutely futile, because it contained its own answer and did not raise, in its terms, the question that had to be decided at all. It asked “whether the value of stamp to be affixed by employer is sixpence, and the amount recoverable from the worker threepence, as the rate of remuneration is 2s. 1½d. for a working day of ten hours.” Well, if that question is to be answered, it is really asking if two and two make four. But although the question was put in that futile form, there was no real doubt between the parties as to what their dispute was about, because they had a hearing before the Commissioners, and examined witnesses on both sides. In that inquiry they went into the whole question of how much the employee was paid, and how she was paid, in order to raise the real question, namely, what was the true meaning of “working day” in the Act of Parliament; the trouble being that the employee was employed for a ten hours’ day on five days of the week, and a five hours’ day on the sixth, and the real question between the parties being whether the rate of remuneration per working day was to be taken on what she got for a full working day of ten hours, or what she got upon what we may call the average working day, which day you arrive at by adding the five days at ten hours to the sixth day at five hours, and then dividing by six.

Now, upon that the Commissioners gave a determination that the work-of remarks which appear to me to be applicable to the powers of the Commissioners under the Insurance Act. Inter alia, his Lordship said,—‘The Board have, of course, no jurisdiction to decide abstract questions of law, but only to determine actual concrete differences that may arise, and as they arise, between the managers and the local Education Authority. The Board is in the nature of the arbitral tribunal, and a Court of law has no jurisdiction to hear appeals from the determination either upon law or upon fact.’ I do not see how I can decide in the pursuers’ favour without reviewing the determination of the Commissioners upon an actual difference which had arisen between the pursuers and the female defender under section 66 (1) (c) of the Insurance Act. As I hold I am not entitled to do so, I sustain the first plea for the Commissioners and dismiss the action.”

Feb. 5, 1913, ing day here gave a rate of remuneration at less than two shillings, and that in respect of that the employers had to contribute fourpence a week and the Don Brothers, Buist, & Co., Limited, v. Scottish Insurance Commissioners. employee a penny per week. In other words, they determined just the question that had arisen, in terms of the Act, "as to the rates of contributions payable in respect of an employed contributor by the employer and the contributor respectively." The Commissioners having done so, I am quite unable to see how this Court is entitled to touch their determination.

Ld. President. It may be very unfortunate that an appeal was not given upon this matter, because it may be that the Commissioners have taken a wrong view of how the working day ought to be struck, but it seems to me that, when the Act of Parliament said that they were to fix "the rates of contributions payable in respect of an employed contributor by the employer and the contributor respectively," it handed over to the Insurance Commissioners a question which may be of pure fact, but may be of fact and of law also in so far as a question of construction is always a question of law. In other words, I think it is exactly the same as if that determination had been on a question arising in a private contract, and referred to arbitration. This Court could not have interfered with the arbiter however grossly wrong they thought him. I have quoted again and again the case of Holmes Oil Company v. Pumpherson Oil Company,¹ which was a case of as wrong a determination by the arbiter as might well be, but the Court could not interfere.

Here, I think also we cannot interfere, because, if this is a question which is meant by the Act of Parliament to be determined by the Commissioners, undoubtedly they have not acted ultra vires. There is no complaint that they did not hear parties, or departed from the rules of justice in any way. Consequently, I think there is no real case made out for reduction of their award. I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's judgment was right and ought to be adhered to.

LORD JOHNSTON.—This question raises, undoubtedly, a matter of wide application and of considerable importance to employers and employed, and it is unfortunate that, the question being one of the construction of a schedule which is made part of the statute, it is impossible to obtain the judgment upon that question of a judicial tribunal. What is meant by "a working day" is not a matter of the Commissioners' discretion, but of the Legislature's intention as disclosed by the provision of the schedule. It is difficult to understand why a question such as that should have been withheld from the Court, looking to the sort of question which is referred to it, namely, the question whether any employment, or any class of employment, is employment within the meaning of the Act. That does not seem to me to be so much a question of law as the question raised in this case. But I agree with your Lordship that the terms of the statute preclude that question being raised in the form in which it has been raised before this Court.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—JAMES WATT, W.S.—Agents.

¹ (1891) 18 R. (H. L.) 52.

MRS JANE HASTIE OR RITCHIE AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents). No. 83.

—Moncrieff, K.C.—Fenton.

WILLIAM KERR, Defender (Appellant).—Constable, K.C.—MacRobert.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Ritchie v. Kerr.
Injury by "accident"—Death due to heart failure.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator found that a farm labourer, apparently in good health, died suddenly while engaged, in the course of his ordinary work, in lifting baskets of corn to feed a bruising machine; that the cause of death was "failure of the heart"; and that "a contributing cause of the failure of the heart's action was the strain arising from the exertion made by the deceased in repeatedly stooping to fill the basket with corn and then lifting it when full up to the level of his shoulders in order to feed the bruiser."

Held that there were no facts stated from which the arbitrator could competently infer that the death was due to injury by accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, since there was no particular event or occurrence to which the death could be attributed.

Clover, Clayton, & Co., Limited, v. Hughes, [1910] A. C. 242, distinguished.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the 2ND DIVISION. Sheriff Court at Wigtown between Mrs Jane Hastie or Ritchie and Sheriff of others, the widow and children of the deceased Thomas Ritchie, farm Dumfries and labourer, and William Kerr, farmer, the Sheriff-substitute (Watson) Galloway. awarded compensation, and at the request of the employer stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth the following facts as admitted or proved:—On 8th March 1912, shortly after his mid-day meal, Ritchie was engaged in defender's employment feeding corn into a bruising machine in the barn at Millisle. While so engaged he had repeatedly to shove a wooden basket into a heap of corn which was lying on the floor of the barn, lift the basket filled with corn on to the top of the bruising machine, which was 4 feet 6 inches from the ground, and then tilt over the basket so as to empty the corn into the hopper of the bruising machine. It was usual to bruise four bags of corn at a time, each containing 5 bushels, and the bruising of the 20 bushels usually took about half an hour, the bruising machine being fed continuously by the corn emptied into the hopper. The deceased began the operation of feeding the bruiser about 1.30 P.M., and there were then working along with him in the barn, but at different work, the witnesses Dalziel, Lockhart, and James Ritchie (son of deceased). After the deceased had been working at the bruiser for about a quarter of an hour, the witnesses Dalziel and James Ritchie both observed that he was holding up his left hand as a signal of distress, and at the same time lying upon, or leaning against, a full sack of corn that was at hand. These men, along with Lockhart, at once went to the assistance of the deceased, and did what they could to revive him. His breathing was laboured and wheezy, and he never spoke nor moved from the time he was observed to be holding up his hand until he died, which was about a quarter of an hour after. In the short time during which the deceased had worked at the bruiser he lifted at least 320 lbs. of corn into the hopper, filling the basket probably ten or eleven times, the weight of a basketful being 31 lbs. The deceased had frequently done the same work before, and nothing unusual or unexpected occurred in the course of his work that afternoon until the sudden attack of illness. The deceased was forty-seven years of age, and his height was something between 5 feet 6 inches and 5 feet 8 inches. He was apparently a strong and healthy man, and during the past fifteen years he had never been a day off work from illness nor required any medical attendance. His master (the defender) and his fellow-workers on the farm never knew him to be the worse of drink. The cause of his death was failure of the heart. There was no post-mortem examination of the internal organs, but the body was seen by Dr Welsh about forty minutes after death. The body was fairly well nourished, and gave no indication of any exhausting disease. A contributing cause of the failure of the heart's action was the strain arising from the exertion made by the deceased in repeatedly stooping to fill the basket with corn and then lifting it when full up to the level of his shoulders in order to feed the bruiser. On these facts, having in view the decision of the House of Lords in Clover, Clayton, & Company, [1910] A. C. 242, I deemed myself bound to find that the injury from which the deceased died was an injury by accident; and I further held that the accident was one arising out of and in the course of his employment with the defender. Accordingly I found the respondents entitled to compensation, and decerned against the appellant for the sum of £150, and also found him liable to the respondents in the expenses of the process."

Feb. 7, 1913.

Ritchie v.
Kerr.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—“(1) Whether the death of Thomas Ritchie was due to an injury by accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) Whether the death of the said Thomas Ritchie was due to an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of said Act?”

The case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 7th February 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—There was no evidence to support the arbitrator's finding. The case of *Clover, Clayton, & Company, Limited, v. Hughes*¹ was clearly different. In that case it was proved that the injury happened at a definite time and as the result of a specific act, namely, the screwing up of a nut. In this case nothing was proved except that the man died of heart disease while at his work. There was no evidence either of an “accident” or that the injury was the result of anything which arose out of his employment. The man was engaged at his usual work, and nothing untoward or unexpected had happened to him. There was a reference in the case to “the strain arising from the exertion,” but if this were intended to be a finding in fact that the work had strained his heart, there was nothing to support such an inference.²

¹ [1910] A. C. 242.

² Coe v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, 1909 S. C. 393; Walker v. Hockney Brothers, (1909) 2 Butterworth's W. C. C. 20; Barnabas v. Bersham Colliery Co., (1910) 48 S. L. R. 727; Hawkins v. Powells Tillery Steam Coal Co., Limited, [1911] 1 K. B. 988; Spence v. William Baird & Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 343; Beaumont v. Underground Electric Railways Company of London, Limited, (1912) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 247; Farmer v. Stafford, Allen, & Sons, Limited, (1911) 4 Butterworth's W. C. C. 223; Ashley v. Lilleshall Co., Limited, (1911) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 85; Martin v. Manchester Corporation, (1912) 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 259. Lord Dundas referred to Euman v. Dalziel & Co., supra, p. 246.

Argued for the respondents ;—There was a direct finding that a contributing cause of death was the strain arising from the exertion of the work. A strain was an “accident” within the meaning of the Act, because it was an untoward event, neither expected nor designed.¹ The case was ruled by the authority of Clover, Clayton, & Company, Limited, v. Hughes.² The strain was none the less an accident because it happened in the course of the man’s ordinary work.

Feb. 7, 1913.
Ritchie v.
Kerr.

LORD DUNDAS.—In this stated case the question which we have to decide is whether, upon the facts found, there was sufficient to justify the learned arbitrator in holding that there was here personal injury by accident within the meaning of the Act. The deceased, Ritchie, was forty-seven years of age. He had the appearance of a strong and healthy man, and seems to have been of healthy habits. He was a farm-labourer employed by the defender. On 8th April 1912, shortly after his mid-day meal, he was engaged in his employment in feeding corn into a bruising machine in a barn. He had to shove a wooden basket into a heap of corn on the floor, lift the filled basket up four or five feet, and tilt the corn out of it into the hopper of the machine. He began the operation of feeding the bruiser about 1.30 P.M.; there were three men working in the same barn, but at different work, namely, Dalziel, Lockhart, and James Ritchie, a son of the deceased. After the deceased had been working at the bruiser for about a quarter of an hour, Dalziel and James Ritchie both observed that he was holding up his left hand as a signal of distress, and at the same time lying upon, or leaning against, a full sack of corn that was at hand. The men went to Ritchie and did what they could, but his breathing was laboured and wheezy, and he never spoke nor moved again, but died after about a quarter of an hour. The Sheriff-substitute found in fact that the deceased had frequently done the same work before, and that nothing unusual or unexpected occurred in the course of his work that afternoon until the sudden attack of illness. The cause of death was failure of the heart. There was, perhaps unfortunately for the respondents, no post-mortem examination of the body, although a doctor saw the man after he was dead. The body was fairly well nourished, and gave no indication of any exhausting disease.

After these findings in fact the Sheriff-substitute says: “A contributing cause of the failure of the heart’s action was the strain arising from the exertion made by the deceased in repeatedly stooping to fill the basket with corn and then lifting it when full up to the level of his shoulders in order to feed the bruiser.” I have some little difficulty in knowing what the Sheriff-substitute means when he alludes to “the strain arising from the exertion.” He has not up to that point alluded to any strain, and he has not told us of any violent exertion likely to have produced a strain. On the contrary, he has merely told us that this man was working in the usual routine of his not strenuous business, and that nothing unusual

¹ Fenton v. J. Thorley & Co., Limited, [1903] A. C. 443; Stewart v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Limited, (1902) 5 F. 120; Ismay, Imrie, & Co. v. Williamson, [1908] A. C. 437; Borland v. Watson, Gow, & Co., 1912 S. C. 15.

² [1910] A. C. 242.

Feb. 7, 1913. occurred on the occasion. I cannot help thinking that one must rather regard the phrase used as meaning "a strain which must have arisen," or Ritchie v. Kerr. "a strain which I should think probably arose," or something of that nature; at all events, I cannot regard the words I have quoted as a finding Lord Dundas. in fact of any definite strain causing lesion to the heart, or causing the heart to give out. The Sheriff-substitute concludes the case by saying: "On these facts, having in view the decision of the House of Lords in Clover, Clayton, & Company,¹ I deemed myself bound to find that the injury from which the deceased died was an injury by accident, and I further held that the accident was one arising out of and in the course of his employment with the defender."

On a general purview of the facts I have summarised one is struck by this, that nowhere is there found any particular event or occurrence to which death can be attributed. On the contrary, one finds a course of ordinary labour (and, as I have said, not strenuous labour) being pursued until the distress signal by the man, the cause of which we do not know, was observed. There is no evidence of any lesion, and the Sheriff-substitute expressly negatives the suggestion of any unusual or unexpected occurrence in connection with the death. I certainly have no desire to renew the attempt to create a definition of "accident" in this perplexing statute; but I think I can say negatively, with a good deal of confidence, that here we have not the elements which have been held necessary for an "accident."

The learned Sheriff-substitute has frankly stated that the reason he came to his conclusion was that he deemed himself bound by the case of Clover, Clayton, & Company.¹ That case seems to me to be easily distinguishable from the present, and just on the point I have mentioned. Here there is not what there was there—a definite particular occurrence to which death could be attributed and was attributed. It was held there as matter of fact that the aneurism burst just after the turning of the spanner by the man. I think the case of *Beaumont*² has a good deal of resemblance to the present case. There the County Court Judge disbelieved the man, who said that he had sustained the injury to his heart on a certain particular occasion to which he deponed. There was, therefore, no particular occasion and no particular occurrence to which death could be attributed. The County Court Judge nevertheless held that he must have suffered a strain to which his work had contributed, and that it was an accident arising out of the employment. I think that is a good deal like what the Sheriff-substitute has done here; but the Court of Appeal had no difficulty in saying that that would not do, because it really must always be a matter of fact, or of legitimate inference from fact, whether the injury (or death) ensued from the accident with which it was said to be connected. And here, as I have said, I cannot find any particular event or occurrence of the nature of an accident.

The case of *Clover, Clayton, & Company*¹ being, as I think it is, distinguishable from the present case, the ground of the learned arbitrator's decision is gone; and one has the less difficulty in differing from him when one sees that the ground upon which he proceeded is, as I think, the erroneous application of a case which he thought bound him. I must say Feb. 7, 1913.

¹ [1910] A. C. 242.

² 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 247.

 that I consider there were no facts here from which the learned arbitrator Ritchie v.
 could competently find that Thomas Ritchie's death was due to injury by Kerr. accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act; and I Lord Dundas. propose to your Lordships that we should so find in answer to the questions, which are not well stated.

LORD SALVESEN.—I concur, though I should not have been sorry in this case if I could have reached the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute. There are some observations made by Lord Kinnear in the case of Coe v. The Fife Coal Company,¹ which are very apposite to the facts we have here, and practically decide the matter in favour of the employer. In dealing with the various definitions of the word "accident," which have emanated from the House of Lords, he says:—"It seems to me that all these interpretations of the word point to some particular event or occurrence which may happen at an ascertainable time, and which is to be distinguished from the necessary and ordinary effect upon a man's constitution of the work in which he is engaged day by day. So defined the word 'accident' seems to me to exclude the anticipated and necessary consequence of continuous labour." Now, in this case the arbitrator has not found any particular event or occurrence, happening at an ascertainable time, which could be called an accident. What happened was that a man engaged in his ordinary work—work which was not unusually hard or difficult—suddenly died from heart disease. It would be confounding effect with cause if we were to hold that the mere circumstance that a man when doing his ordinary work suddenly dies from heart disease necessarily infers that he has met with an accident. There is nothing in the decided cases to support such a view, and there are many which are substantially indistinguishable from the present upon the facts.

If one looks at the facts found in the case of *Coe*¹ one finds that they were very much more favourable to the claims of the workman than the facts here, although no doubt there is this distinction, that the arbitrator there had found in favour of the employer, whereas here, on what I agree with your Lordships in holding is a misreading of the *Clover, Clayton, & Company*² case, he has come to an opposite conclusion. I find nothing in his findings in fact which constitutes evidence of any "unexpected personal injury resulting to the workman in the course of his employment from any unlooked-for mishap or occurrence," to adopt the language of Lord Shand in the case of Fenton v. Thorley & Company.³ I therefore agree with your Lordships in the result at which you have arrived.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. Both parties have founded upon statements in the arbitrator's findings, which they think are conclusive in their favour. The appellant founded on the statement that the deceased had frequently done the same work before, and that nothing unusual or unexpected occurred in the course of his work that afternoon until the sudden attack of illness. The respondents, on the other hand,

¹ 1909 S. C. 393.² [1910] A. C. 242.³ [1903] A. C. 443.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Ritchie v.
Kerr.

Lord Guthrie.

founded on the statement that a contributing cause of the failure of the heart's action was the strain arising from the exertion made by the deceased, in repeatedly stooping to fill the basket with corn, and then lifting it, when full, up to the level of his shoulders in order to feed the bruiser.

The statement founded on by the appellant I do not think can be conclusive in view of several of the cases, and in particular the case of Fenton.¹ In that case Lord Macnaghten criticised adversely certain opinions which had been given in a Scottish case—Stewart v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company,² in which certain of the Judges had founded on the fact that the occurrence was fortuitous, as if that were conclusive proof that the occurrence was an accident. Lord Macnaghten pointed out that that was not a good ground of judgment, and that "what the miner did in replacing the hutch he certainly did deliberately and in the ordinary course of his work. There was nothing haphazard about it." In the case of Fenton,¹ what the man was doing was by no means an unusual act, and did not involve any unusual exertion, although it necessitated exertion greater than he might use in many parts of his work. But the result was that he ruptured himself, and the moment the act took place, he called out that he had "got a tear in his inside." Now here I do not find anything similar. We do not know exactly what happened, because the man was not in view of anybody at the time, and he said nothing; when he was seen he was lying against the side of the sack. There was no post-mortem examination to ascertain the condition of matters, and it seems to me that the facts themselves do not prove that what the respondents here found upon did actually take place—namely, that there was any strain of the heart whatever. The respondents, however, maintain that the Sheriff-substitute has so found; I agree with your Lordships that he has not so found. He has not found that there was a strain. What he has said is that a contributing cause of the failure of the heart's action was the strain arising from the exertion made by the deceased in repeatedly stooping. As Lord Dundas has pointed out, that is the first use of the word "strain"; and, as I read it, the Sheriff-substitute simply means that the man was exerting himself at the time, and that the consequence of his exertion, which he had been repeatedly making, was to produce the result that unfortunately happened. If the Sheriff-substitute had found, as the result of a post-mortem examination, that it appeared that the heart had been at that particular moment subjected to a special strain, the result might have been different. As the case stands, I agree with your Lordships in holding that the Sheriff-substitute has gone wrong, and that the case of *Clover, Clayton, & Company*³ does not rule this case.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in answer to the questions of law that there were no facts from which the arbitrator could competently infer that the death of Thomas Ritchie was due to injury by accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

LANGLANDS & MACKAY, W.S.—BONAR, HUNTER, & JOHNSTONE, W.S.—Agents.

¹[1903] A. C. 443.

²5 F. 120.

³[1910] A. C. 242.

MRS HELEN CAVERS OR THOMSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—

Wilson, K.C.—D. Anderson.

MUTTER, HOWEY, & COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—

Moncrieff, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

No. 84.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Thomson v.
Mutter,
Howey, & Co.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule

(1) (a)—Where death "results" from the injury—Death from heart weakness set up by operation—Operation not confined to injury caused by accident—Novus actus interveniens.

A workman accidentally ruptured himself in the course of his employment and was obliged to undergo an operation for hernia. In the course of the operation he was discovered to be suffering also from another hernia of long standing, and both hernias were operated upon at the same time. He subsequently died, the cause of death being found to be heart weakness and degeneracy "set up by the strain of the operation." In defence to a claim for compensation the employers maintained that, death being due to an operation part of which only was rendered necessary by the accident, the operation was a novus actus intervening to break the chain of causation between the accident and the death.

Held that, on the facts stated, there was evidence to justify the arbitrator in finding that death was the result of the accident the workman had sustained in the course of his employment.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Hawick between Mrs Helen Cavers or Thomson, widow of the deceased William Lockie Thomson, railway lorryman, and Mutter, Howey, & Company, railway contractors, the Sheriff-substitute (Baillie) awarded compensation, and at the request of the defenders stated a case for appeal.

The statements in the case, so far as relevant to the questions with which this report is concerned, were as follows:—"Evidence was led before me, and I have had the assistance of the medical referee with reference to the medical evidence. I held the following facts to be admitted or proved:—(1) The deceased William Lockie Thomson was a lorryman in the service of the appellants, and was sixty-four years of age. (2) On Thursday, 26th October 1911, he went to his work in good health, and on his last journey that day he was engaged at Weensland Mill in loading skips of yarn to his lorry. (3) On Monday, the 30th, he consulted Dr Hamilton, who found him to be suffering from sprain and injury to the abdominal muscles, and hernia, and in answer to Dr Hamilton's inquiries as to how it had happened, he informed him that he had slipped when catching or steadying a skip, but had not thought it was much. (4) Dr Hamilton was satisfied that a slip of this nature would be quite sufficient to produce a hernia. (5) Dr Hamilton sent him to bed, and on that and the following few days, he, and his son, Dr Oliver Hamilton, endeavoured to reduce the hernia, but though able to almost reduce it, found that it was impossible to retain it in this reduced position, and an operation was accordingly rendered necessary. (6) On 7th November Thomson was operated on in the Cottage Hospital at Hawick by Professor Alexis Thomson, and this operation disclosed the existence of a femoral hernia of recent origin (which was the cause of the trouble at the time), and also disclosed the

Sheriff of Roxburgh,
Berwick, and Selkirk.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Thomson v.
Mutter,
Howey, & Co.

existence of an inguinal hernia of long standing. (12) This inguinal hernia had been in existence for about twenty-four years, during which period Thomson had regularly worn a truss, and it had not in any way interfered with his work as a carter. Its existence did not indicate any constitutional predisposition to hernia, and the femoral hernia originated from a cause quite independent of it. (13) Both hernias were operated upon, and in the case of the inguinal hernia, adhesions were cut which were found to exist in the inguinal canal. (14) At the operation it was ascertained that the reason why the femoral hernia could not be absolutely reduced, or retained in a reduced condition, was that it was attached to a piece of omentum, the further end of which was itself tied down by adhesions in the inguinal canal, and, in consequence, prevented the femoral hernia being pushed sufficiently up to remain retained in the abdomen. (15) The operation was completely successful, and on 30th November Dr Hamilton reported in writing to appellants that Thomson had almost recovered, and that he anticipated he would be able to resume work in a few weeks. (16) Subsequent to 26th October, and prior to the operation, Thomson's heart had been repeatedly examined both by Dr Hamilton and Dr Oliver Hamilton, and it was found, so far as examination could disclose, to be in a perfectly healthy condition. (17) Thomson was confined to bed in the hospital for about a month. One day, subsequent to the operation, while in bed, he complained of palpitation of the heart, and on a later day, when getting out of bed, suffered from heart palpitation. (18) These palpitations were caused by heart weakness and heart degeneracy, and this heart weakness and heart degeneracy were set up by the strain of the operation. (19) This heart weakness and heart degeneracy gradually increased, and were the cause of death on 30th May 1912, Dr Hamilton certifying death to be due to strain of the abdominal muscles and heart failure. . . ."

"In these circumstances, I held—(1) That Thomson's death was the result of an accident, arising out of and in the course of his employment"

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were, inter alia:—" (1) Whether there was evidence upon which it could competently be found that the said William Lockie Thomson sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on 26th October 1911, and that death was the result of said accident? (2) Whether the operation was a novus actus interveniens taking the case outside the Act?" The points raised by the other questions in the case were not insisted in by the appellants' counsel at the debate.

The case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 7th February 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—The arbitrator had found the cause of death to be heart weakness set up by the strain of "the operation." "The operation" was an ambiguous term, because in truth there were two operations, one on the old and one on the new hernia. There was no finding either (a) that the operation on the new hernia by itself would have caused death, or (b) that the operation on the old hernia was made necessary by the accident. There was thus a missing link in the chain connecting the death with the accident, namely, the absence of proof that death was due solely to the operation on the hernia which arose from the accident. The arbitrator had not excluded the possibility of the operation on the old hernia being a novus actus interveniens, which would have been fatal to the claim.¹ Admittedly Feb. 7, 1913.

 the right to compensation was not extinguished merely by proof that Thomson v.
 the death was accelerated by a pre-existing disease.² On the other Mutter, hand, it was not enough for the arbitrator to find that, but for the Howey, & Co.
 accident, the death would not have occurred when it did,³ and on the facts stated, that was all he was entitled to find here. There was no evidence on which he could find affirmatively that the death was due to the accident. It was due to the effect of an operation, the necessity for which in part did and in part did not arise out of the accident. Death or incapacity due to concurrent causes, one of which causes arose out of the accident while the other did not, was not a valid ground for granting compensation.⁴

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon.

LORD DUNDAS.—It is not necessary to call upon the respondent's counsel. The facts in the case are set forth at considerably greater length than is usual; but I am not at all complaining of that, because I think that the fulness and care with which the learned arbitrator has stated the facts are commendable, and not too frequent in practice. The sphere of decision has been narrowed by certain concessions made, no doubt wisely enough, by the appellants' counsel.—[His Lordship then referred to the questions which, by the appellants' concession, the Court was not called upon to answer.]

Then, as to the first question, an admission was also made, which one should notice at the outset. Counsel said that they did not wish now to contest that Thomson did sustain, on the date in question, an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment; and I have no doubt that admission was a well-considered one. Accordingly, the first question really reads:—"Whether there was evidence upon which it could competently be found that death was a result of said accident?" The second question, upon which the bulk of the argument turned, is:—"Whether the operation was a novus actus interveniens taking the case outside the Act?" It was further admitted at the bar that the accident caused a femoral hernia, which, as I understand, is a hernia very high up, close to (though not in) the groin. It was also matter of concession that the existence of this hernia necessitated an operation. We approach more controversial ground when we come to deal with what happened in the way of operation. That is set forth in finding 11 and in the following findings:—[His Lordship then quoted findings 11 to 14, supra]. It is further matter of admission that the strain of the operation—the appellants say there were two operations—caused heart weakness, and that the heart weakness resulted in death.

Now, that is the alleged chain of causation between the accident and the death; and it is said by the appellants that it is not complete, that there is a flaw in it, and that there was a novus actus interveniens in the shape of the operation. It is said that there is nothing to show us that the accident

¹ Dunham v. Clare, [1902] 2 K. B. 292, per Collins, M.R., at p. 296. Lord Dundas referred to Charles v. Walker, Limited, (1909) 2 Butterworth's W. C. C. 5.

² Golder v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1902) 5 F. 123.

³ Dunnigan v. Cavan & Lind, 1911 S. C. 579.

⁴ Hargreave v. Haughhead Coal Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 70.

No. 85.

MARION MACLEOD, Pursuer.—Sandeman, K.C.—MacRobert.
 THE EDINBURGH AND DISTRICT TRAMWAYS COMPANY, LIMITED,
 Defenders.—G. Watt, K.C.—Macmillan, K.C.—Black.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Macleod v.
 Edinburgh
 and District
 Tramways
 Co., Limited.

Reparation—Negligence—Contributory negligence—Accident—Proximate cause—Passenger stepping out from behind tramway car without looking.

Process—Jury trial—Motion for new trial—Entering judgment for party unsuccessful at trial—Jury Trials Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V. cap. 31), sec. 2.

A passenger who had alighted from a northward bound car, and who had passed immediately behind it with the object of crossing to the farther side of the street, was knocked down and injured by a southward bound car at the moment when she reached the nearest rail of the line on which it was travelling. In an action for damages against the Tramway Company she admitted in evidence that she had not looked to see if any traffic was approaching from the north, but contended that the defenders were liable in respect that the driver of the southward bound car had neither sounded his bell nor slowed down in passing the stationary car, as he was bound to do.

The jury having returned a verdict for the pursuer, the Court set aside that verdict and assoilzied the defenders, holding that, even on the assumption that the driver was to blame as alleged, the pursuer's evidence showed that the accident was due to her own negligence in failing to take the ordinary precaution of looking for approaching traffic, it being clear that the southward bound car must have been so close to the pursuer when she stepped into the danger zone that neither sounding the bell nor slowing down could have prevented the accident.

Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co. v. Slattery, (1878) 3 App. Cas. 1155, distinguished.

1st DIVISION. ON 30th June 1911 Marion Macleod, a domestic servant in Edinburgh, brought an action against the Edinburgh and District Tramways Company, Limited, in which she claimed the sum of £1000 as damages in respect of personal injuries which she had sustained owing to the alleged fault of the defenders.

The following statements were made on record:—(Cond. 2) "On the forenoon of Sunday, 26th February 1911, the pursuer, who was on her way to the forenoon service at United Free St Columba's Church, Cambridge Street, Edinburgh, travelled by one of the defenders' cars from the corner of Merchiston Avenue and Polwarth Gardens to opposite the Caledonian Railway Goods Station in Lothian Road, where she got off. She then passed behind the car, and proceeded to cross the street towards the church, and, while so doing, was knocked down by a tramway car belonging to the defenders which was proceeding in a southerly direction, at full speed, i.e., about 12 miles an hour. The wheels of the car passed over the pursuer's left leg." (Cond. 4) "The said accident was due to the fault and negligence of the driver of the south-going car, for whom the defenders are responsible. The said car was not slowed down when passing the car by which the pursuer had travelled, although the driver saw, or ought to have seen, that the said car had stopped to let down passengers. Further, the driver of the said south-going car did not give any warning of his approach by ringing his bell or otherwise. It is the duty of the driver of a car, when passing another car which is stationary, to slow down and ring his bell, to prevent any risk of accident to Feb. 7, 1913.

 persons who may be crossing the street behind the stationary car. By his failure to do this, the driver of the said south-going car caused the Macleod v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited. said accident to the pursuer. The explanations and statement in answer, so far as not coinciding herewith, are denied." (Ans. 4) ". . .
 The accident was due to the fault and negligence of the pursuer herself. . . . The driver of the south-going car, which was proceeding at a moderate speed, duly rang his bell when coming up to the car from which the pursuer had dismounted, but she took no notice either of this warning or of a warning addressed to her by the conductor of the car she had left. On the contrary, she rushed across the street without looking where she was going, and with complete disregard for her own safety. Had she attended to the warnings given, or taken reasonable care in crossing the road, the accident would not have occurred."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The accident to the pursuer having been caused, or materially contributed to, by her own fault or negligence, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

On 7th December 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) approved of an issue in ordinary form for the trial of the cause.

The trial took place on 29th June 1912 before Lord Hunter and a jury.
 The jury found for the pursuer and assessed the damages at £350.

On 19th July 1912 the Court granted a rule on the pursuer to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside as being contrary to the evidence, and a new trial granted. The purport of the evidence, so far as material to this report, will be found set forth in the opinion of the Lord President, infra.

Counsel were heard on the rule before the First Division (without Lord Kinnear and with Lord Hunter) on 23rd January 1913.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer was entitled to rely on the driver of the southward bound car giving warning of his approach by sounding his bell and slowing down as he passed the car from which she had alighted. There was admittedly a duty upon him to sound his bell in such circumstances. There was evidence in the case from which the jury were entitled to hold that as a fact the driver had omitted these necessary precautions, and that, had he not committed this fault, the accident would have been avoided. In these circumstances the jury had found, and were justified in finding, that the causa proxima of the accident was the fault of the driver, and that the pursuer had not contributed thereto by her negligence.¹

Argued for the defenders;—It was immaterial whether the driver of the southward bound car had or had not been guilty of negligence, as the pursuer's own evidence clearly disclosed a case of contributory negligence, in face of which she could not succeed.² It was her duty

¹ The following authorities were referred to:—Grant v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1870) 9 Macph. 258; Ramsay v. Andrew Thomson & Sons, (1881) 9 R. 140; Frasers v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., (1882) 10 R.
 264; Jardine v. Stonefield Laundry Co., (1887) 14 R. 839; Cass v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited, 1909 S. C. 1068; Campbell v.
 Train, 1910 S. C. 556. The Lord President referred to Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co. v. Slattery, (1878) 3 App. Cas. 1155.

² Frasers v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., 10 R. 264, per Lord President Inglis, at pp. 266-7; Grant v. Caledonian Railway Co., 9 Macph. 258;
 Barnett v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., (1891) 28 S. L. R. 339.

Feb. 7, 1913. on coming out from behind the stationary car to take the ordinary precaution for her own safety of looking to see whether any traffic was approaching,¹ and she had neglected to take this precaution. In the circumstances judgment should be entered for the defenders in pursuance of the provisions of section 2 * of the Jury Trials Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910.

Macleod v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.

At advising on 7th February 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have come to the conclusion that this verdict cannot be allowed to stand, and I have come to that conclusion entirely upon the case made by the pursuer herself. The history of the accident is simple enough. The young lady was a passenger in a tramway car which was going north. In this country, when tramway cars meet, the right-hand side of one car is next the right-hand side of the other, and the cars are so arranged that the only exit for passengers is at the rear of the car and at the left side, the side next the pavement of the street. The pursuer's object was to go to a church which was situated almost directly opposite a tramway stopping-place. Accordingly she descended from the tramway car at that stopping-place. There was a controversy as to whether she descended before the car had actually stopped or not; but, as I have already said, I am taking the case entirely upon her own evidence and not upon the evidence of the other side, and accordingly I take it as proved that the car had stopped before she alighted. In order to get to her church she had to cross the street; that is, after getting out of the car she had to go across behind the rear of her own car, then cross the space between the two sets of tramway rails, which is called the four-foot way, and then cross the other tramway line and finally get over to the pavement on the other side. She proceeded to do so without stopping at all, and was knocked down by another car going in the opposite direction the moment that she arrived at the side of the rail upon which that car was travelling. Unfortunately her foot went under the car and she sustained a very serious injury. In one sense I regret the conclusion to which I have come. I think the pursuer was perfectly honest and frank, and indeed it is upon her own evidence that I think she loses her case. But, on the other hand, while one has that feeling of sympathy with the pursuer, the fact remains that it is not just to mulct the Tramway Company shareholders in damages where there is no legal ground for doing so.

Now, the reason that I have come to this conclusion is that I think it is clear, upon her own evidence, that it was the pursuer's own negligence that led to the accident. The only negligence that is alleged against the Tram- Feb. 7, 1913.

¹ Watson v. North British Railway Co., (1904) 7 F. 220; Jardine v. Stonefield Laundry Co., 14 R. 839, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 840.

* The Jury Trials Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII and 1 Geo. V. cap. 31), enacts:—Sec. 2. "If after hearing parties upon (a) a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted . . . on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence . . . the Court are unanimously of opinion that the verdict under review is contrary to evidence, and, further, that they have before them all the evidence that could be reasonably expected to be obtained relevant to the cause, they shall be entitled to set aside the verdict and, in place of granting a new trial, to enter judgment for the party unsuccessful at the trial."

way Company is that the passing car did not ring its bell, as it ought to have done, and did not slow down. There is, however, conflicting evidence ^{Macleod v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited.} about the bell, and therefore, although I for myself would have come to the conclusion that the evidence that the bell was rung was better than the evidence that it was not rung, still I do not go upon that, because the jury ^{Ld. President.} were perfectly entitled to come to the conclusion that the bell was not rung. I also think they were entitled to come to the conclusion that the car was going at the ordinary pace of the cable. Of course with the cable car it is not possible to have an unduly increased pace as it is with motors and other vehicles, because naturally the car cannot go faster than the uniform pace of the cable. But taking it that the car was passing at the ordinary rate and that the bell did not ring, I think it is quite clear that this accident could not possibly have happened if it had not been for the carelessness of the pursuer herself. And I come to that conclusion from these facts : first, that upon her own showing she passed out from the rear of her own car over the little space which may be called the four-foot way and into the danger zone without ever looking at all ; and second, that she was knocked down at such a place as proves conclusively that the approaching car must have been so close to her when she stepped into the danger zone that no bell or anything else would have had the slightest effect.

If the case had been that she had nearly got across the track of the approaching car, then I should have come to the conclusion that, whatever I thought myself, the jury at least were entitled to say that if the car had not been going at its ordinary pace, but had been going at a slower pace, as it ought to have been, the accident might not have happened, and that therefore the true cause of the accident was the negligence of the defenders.
But, struck as she is the moment she gets upon the other track, it is perfectly clear that the car must have been so close upon her that nothing could have saved her except that precaution which every pedestrian is bound to take when, in broad daylight, he steps from behind one car and goes into what he knows is the track of another, the precaution of looking whether anything is coming. There is not the slightest difficulty in doing that. It is not as if this accident had been one with a carriage, because a carriage may go anywhere, and there is no place of absolute safety against a carriage or a motor ; but against a tramway car there is a place of safety, you cannot be run over by a tramway car unless you put yourself on the rails on which that car runs, or, to be perfectly accurate, within the few inches that the tramway car projects over the rails.

Now, that this is the state of the evidence is perfectly clear from what the lady herself said. Having described how she crossed, she is asked,
"And you did not look for it?"—that is for the traffic going the other way.
And she replies, "Well, I had not time to look. . . . There was nothing to prevent me standing behind the car or on the four-foot way to look and see if the traffic was coming. . . . I never saw the car until I was actually struck." "(Q.) So that you had not looked to see if traffic was coming, but had walked on to the set of rails where the car was ; is that so?"
"(A.) Yes." Now, that is her own evidence, and then there is the evidence of a very close eye-witness, Mr Murray, who was in the same car with her,

Feb. 7, 1913. descended at the same place, and was just behind her. He says this: "She just walked behind the car and struck the front corner of the south-going car. That is the corner next the inner rail. By the 'inner rail' I mean the centre track. Her leg was run over." And then again: " . . . she just walked straight behind the car, round the car, and the other car coming up caught her. She never hesitated from the time she started to walk till she was struck, and thus walked into the front corner." Then he describes how she was lying on the four-foot way, behind the car which had knocked her down, with her leg just over the rail.

Macleod v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

Under these circumstances I think the jury could only come to one conclusion, that it was the pursuer's own negligence that was the true cause of the accident, and I do not think that they were entitled to come to any other conclusion upon that evidence.

In these circumstances it would have been necessary, under our former practice, to grant a new trial; and I may say that the only case that has given me any cause for consideration in this matter is the well-known case of Slattery.¹ I have considered that case in all its bearings most carefully, and I think it would be possible, if it were necessary, to distinguish the case of *Slattery*¹ upon the ground that this accident happened in broad daylight and the accident in *Slattery*¹ at night; that ground of distinction would seem to be pointed at by some of Lord Cairns's remarks in the case. But the real distinction between this case and *Slattery*¹ seems to me to be this: in Slattery's case,¹ owing to what I may call peculiarities of Irish procedure, it was not open to their Lordships to grant a new trial, a situation which could not have arisen here, or, I believe, in England. As it was, the Judges in the minority thought the verdict ought to have been entered for the defendants, and every one of the Judges in the majority thought that the verdict was contrary to evidence, and indicated that if they could have given a new trial they would have done so. Now, all we could have done under our old practice would have been to grant a new trial, but we have got a new power under the Jury Trials Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1910—a power that I may say I think is most beneficent, because I cannot but feel that such a result as would have been reached in Slattery,¹ if the matter had been open, would have been most disastrous. According to Lord Cairns and the other Judges in the majority, they would have given a new trial and very likely the same verdict would have followed, and they would have had to go on giving new trial after new trial.

It was to avoid such a situation that the Act of Parliament was passed, and it only gives us power to enter judgment for the unsuccessful party when two conditions are fulfilled: first of all, when there is unanimity in the Court; and, secondly, when we are satisfied that there could really be no other evidence produced which could affect the result. Now, it is perfectly clear that there could be no other evidence produced which could affect the result in the case before your Lordships. We have had the evidence of the only two real eye-witnesses of the scene, and also one piece of hearsay evidence, that of the deceased cabman, which, I think, may be entirely disregarded. As I understand your Lordships are entirely of the same opinion as I am, I think the proper course will be to enter judgment for the Feb. 7, 1913. defendants.

¹ 3 App. Cas. 1155.

Macleod v.
Edinburgh
and District
Tramways
Co., Limited.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I entirely concur.

LORD MACKENZIE.—If the verdict is one which cannot from any reasonable point of view be reconciled with the weight of the evidence, it cannot stand. The question put to the jury was whether the pursuer was injured through the fault of the defenders, and this they have answered in the affirmative.

I regret to say that, in my opinion, the jury were not entitled to come to this conclusion. On her own evidence it clearly appears that the pursuer never looked before she attempted to cross the rails on which the tramway car that struck her was travelling. From the evidence of the passenger who followed her, she just walked behind the car she had left and struck the front corner of the south-going car. It is therefore clear that the pace at which that car was going is not of moment in this case. I say so, because I am of opinion that when the foot-passenger has a clear view he is entitled to rely upon the fact that the car is not going at an excessive speed. There is evidence that the driver of the south-going car failed to take the necessary precaution when passing the other car of sounding his bell. Though evidence upon a point of this kind is open to criticism, still the jury were entitled to believe it. Under certain circumstances this might raise a question which would properly be left to the jury, viz., whether the failure to sound the bell or the want of reasonable care on the part of the foot-passenger was the causa causans of the accident. Such a case is put by Lord Cairns, L.C., in Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company v. Slattery.¹ But in that case the accident happened not in the daytime but at night. Here it was daylight, and had the pursuer looked she would have seen the on-coming car. It was her unfortunate omission to do so that was the cause of the accident. The verdict, therefore, in my opinion, cannot stand.

LORD HUNTER concurred.

THE COURT set aside the verdict, and assoilzied the defenders.

M'LEOD & ROSE, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ 3 App. Cas. 1155, at p. 1167.

No. 86.

ALEXANDER GOODALL, Pursuer (Reclaimers).—Horne, K.C.—Macquisten.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Goodall v.
Shaw.SIR ARCHIBALD M'INNES SHAW AND OTHERS (Members of the Licensing Court at Glasgow), Defenders (Respondents).—*Clyde, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.*SIR ARCHIBALD M'INNES SHAW AND OTHERS (Members of the Licensing Appeal Court at Glasgow), Defenders (Respondents).—Morison, K.C.—D. M. Wilson.Public-house—Certificate—Renewal—Objections—Title to object—Objection by mandate—Averment that objections in reality those of mandatary—Competency of general objection that district over-licensed.Public-house—Licensing authority—Discretion—District over-licensed—Mode of selecting certificates to be refused.

A licence-holder, who had been refused a renewal of his certificate, brought an action for the reduction of the deliverance of the Licensing Court on the grounds (1) that the objections which had been taken to his certificate were not in reality the objections of the ostensible objectors, but those of a vigilance association (with no locus standi) to whose agent the objectors had been induced to give a mandate; (2) that no specific objection had been taken to his certificate, but merely a general objection that the district was over-licensed; (3) that the only objection to the pursuer's certificate being that general one, the magistrates, by the procedure which they had adopted at the Licensing Court, viz., first granting all the certificates which were not objected to by the agent, and only thereafter proceeding to consider those to which he had taken objection, had made it impossible for them to exercise a proper judicial discretion with regard to the renewal of the pursuer's certificate.

Held that none of the grounds of reduction were relevant; but observed with regard to number (3) that, had the Licensing Court resolved beforehand to reduce the licences in the district by a certain number, the result would have been different, seeing that in that case the magistrates would no longer have been able (as they were in the circumstances averred by the pursuer), to consider impartially and, if it seemed desirable, to renew all the licences objected to; diss. Lord Johnston, who was of opinion that the pursuer's third ground was relevant, in respect that justice could only be done by considering all the licences in the district, and thereafter deciding which fell to be disallowed.

Opinion (per the Lord President) that the method adopted by the magistrates was unfortunate, and that, if they thought the number of licences should be reduced, they should have obtained a report from a trustworthy source, and thereafter considered the questions raised by the report.

1ST DIVISION. ON 27th July 1911 Alexander Goodall, wine and spirit merchant, Glasgow, brought an action against (1) Sir Archibald M'Innes Shaw and others, being the whole members of the Licensing Court for the city of Glasgow, as such members and also as members of the Licensing Appeal Court for the city; (2) Sir Samuel Chisholm, Bart., LL.D., and others being, with the defenders first called, the whole members of the Licensing Appeal Court for the city of Glasgow; (3) Adam Whitson Myles, Town-clerk of Glasgow and Clerk to the Licensing Court; (4) Thomas Fleming Wilson, Clerk of the Peace for the county of the city of Glasgow and Clerk to the Licensing Appeal Court; and (5) John Brown and others, being the parties in whose names objections were lodged against the renewal of the pursuer's certificate of licence for a public-house. The pursuer sought reduction of (1) a Feb. 7, 1913. deliverance of the Licensing Court refusing him a renewal of a licence for premises situated at 68 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow, for the year from 28th May 1911; (2) a deliverance of the Licensing Appeal Court refusing his appeal against the decision of the Licensing Court. Goodall v. Shaw.

The pursuer held a certificate of licence for a public-house for premises situated at 68 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow.* At the Licensing Court held at Glasgow in April 1911 objections to the renewal of the pursuer's certificate were lodged by Mr Robert Kyle, the paid solicitor of an association known as the Citizens' Vigilance Association, one of whose principal objects was to effect a reduction of the number of public-house licences in Glasgow. The objections were lodged in the names of the defenders John Brown and others, who were owners or occupiers of property in the neighbourhood of the pursuer's public-house,† and were in the following terms:—"To the Licensing Court of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow.—Glasgow, 5th April 1911.—John Brown, [here followed the names of the other objectors] who are owners or occupiers of property in the neighbourhood of the after-mentioned premises, do hereby give notice that they object to the granting of the renewal of the certificate of licence for a public-house applied for by Alexander Goodall for premises situated at 68 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow, for the ensuing year, commencing on 28th May next, in respect:—(1) There are more licensed premises in the neighbourhood where the said premises are situated than are necessary to meet the requirements of the inhabitants, as is shown by the following facts, viz.:—That there is in the Broomielaw ward, where the said premises are situated, one licence to every 92 persons, and that in the Brownfield area of the Broomielaw ward, in which the present premises are situated, excluding the main thoroughfare of Argyle Street, there are 14 licences, while for the supplies of the necessities of life to the inhabitants there are 3 grocers, 1 butcher, 2 bakers, and 3 dairies. (2) The population in the Broomielaw ward in 1905 was 7147, and in 1910 was 6460, showing a decrease of 687, and there has not been a proportionate reduction in the number of licences. (3) The physical, social, and moral tone of the district is very low, as is shown by the following facts, namely:—That the

* The history of the certificate was as follows:—On 9th April 1907 the Licensing Court granted Goodall a renewal of his certificate. On 8th May 1907 the Licensing Appeal Court recalled the judgment of the Licensing Court. Goodall then brought an action of reduction of the judgment of the Appeal Court in the Court of Session, in which he was successful (Goodall v. Bilsland, 1909 S. C. 1152). Thereafter in April 1908 his application for a new certificate was granted, and it was renewed annually until April 1911.

† The Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 25), enacts:—Sec. 19. "Any person or the agent of any person owning or occupying property in the neighbourhood of the house or premises in respect of which any certificate or renewal of any certificate shall be applied for, may object to the granting or renewal of such certificate by lodging at any time not less than five days before the general meeting of the Licensing Court, with the clerk to such Court, a notice in writing to that effect, signed by such person or his agent, specifying the grounds of such objection, which objection shall be heard at the then ensuing general meeting; and if such objection shall be considered of sufficient importance by the Court in such general meeting, and shall be proved to their satisfaction, the said certificate shall not be granted or renewed. . . ."

Feb. 7, 1913.

Goodall v.
Shaw.

death-rate in the Broomielaw ward in 1910 was 19·50 per 1000 of the population, as against 15·66 for the city generally; that the death-rate in the said Brownfield area was in the year 1909 26·8 per 1000 of the population, as compared with 17·95 for the city generally; that the death-rate among infants under one year in the Broomielaw ward for the year 1910 was 141 per 1000 births, as compared with 119 for the city generally; and that the percentage of irregularity in school attendance and of children requiring to be fed by the School Board is very high, and this condition of matters is largely due to the fact that there are more licences in the said ward than are meet and convenient. (4) In view of the facts above narrated it is not meet and convenient that this application should be granted. For ROBERT KYLE, Agent for Objectors, JOHN MACKAY Jun., Pror." On 12th April 1911 the Licensing Court refused to renew the certificate. The pursuer thereupon presented an appeal to the Licensing Appeal Court. On 9th May 1911 the Appeal Court refused the appeal. In the present action the pursuer sought to reduce these deliverances.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 6) "For a number of years there has existed in Glasgow a society known as the Citizens' Vigilance Association. The sole or principal purpose of said Association is to oppose the granting and renewing of licences. For this purpose it has employed and employs law-agents and others, whose charges and expenses have been and are defrayed from its funds. The operations of the said Association are controlled, and the funds for carrying on its operations are provided, by the voluntary subscriptions of a few individuals holding extreme views on the liquor question, who believe, or profess to believe, that by obtaining a reduction in the number of licensed premises in the city, they are advancing the cause of temperance. In conducting their campaign against licences the practice of the said Association is for a committee thereof to take up, prior to each half-yearly Licensing Court, consideration of the whole licensed premises in the city; to select and decide on the licences to be objected to at the ensuing Court; and to instruct their salaried law-agent and other paid officials to take steps to obtain, from parties owning or occupying premises in the neighbourhood of the particular licences to be objected to, ostensible mandates or letters of authority in order to give the Association's said law-agent a colourable title to appear at the Licensing Courts and to press for the taking away of the licences. In pursuance of these instructions the said law-agent or others, acting for and on behalf of the said Association, then proceed to search for parties who, if they desired to object on their own account, would have the necessary statutory qualification. Having obtained the signatures of a few such persons who, in many cases, have no idea of the procedure to follow on their signature, or even of the purpose for which it is obtained, the said law-agent then prepares and lodges in their names written objections. These are not the objections of the persons who sign the mandates, but are in reality the objections of the said Association. Thereafter the law-agent of the Association takes complete charge of the proceedings, and conducts the same to their conclusion, solely at the expense and in the interests of the Association, and without further reference to the parties in whose names the objections are professed to be made, none of whom appear or give evidence at the Licensing Court. Said parties are never at any time or in any sense clients of the said law-agent. The said objections are not in reality bona fide objections to the licences within the meaning of section 19 of the said statute, but in substance constitute an attempt by the said Association to acquire a right to object and prosecute objections to licences, which under the statute is a right personal to persons owning or occupying property in the neighbourhood of the licences to be objected to. The said Association are fully aware that they cannot competently obtain in their own names an assignation of the said personal right, but adopt the procedure above explained in order to evade the provisions of the statute, and thus carry on an organised and systematic attack on all or any licensed premises in any part of the city. In this manner the said Association has been in the practice of lodging objections to as many as 100 to 200 licences at each Licensing Court and carrying to the Appeal Court the deliverances of the Licensing Court in cases in which the licences are renewed." (Cond. 7) "The objections so lodged by the law-agent of the said Association are usually in a stereotyped form. Prior to about the year 1908 the practice of the Association was to state specific objections to specific licences. . . ." (Cond. 8) "Since about the year 1908, the practice of the said Association has been to limit their objections to general statements averring that there are too many licensed houses, and that a comparatively higher death-rate in the crowded and poorer districts of the city is in some unexplained way due to the large number of licences." (Cond. 9) "Prior to the Licensing Court for April 1911, the said Association procured, in the manner mentioned in article 6 of the condescendence, documents professing to be mandates in favour of the said Robert Kyle, and lodged objections to the renewal of 98 licences in the city, including that of the pursuer. In the Calton ward of the city there were 103 applications for renewals, and 35 of these were so objected to; in the Broomielaw district there were 67 applications, and 20 of these were objected to; and in the Cowcaddens district there were 113 applications, and 27 were so objected to. The other 16 objections were to licences in other parts of the city. The whole of said objections were substantially in similar terms to those stated in the four heads of objections against pursuer's licence, with the exception that in some of the cases a fifth head of objection was added, namely, that the applicant was interested in another licence or other licences, and could not therefore give that personal supervision to the licence objected to which the Court was entitled to demand. The names of the same parties were put forward as objectors to many of the licences. . . ." (Cond. 12) "At the said Licensing Court the total number of applications for licences amounted to 1631, of which 19 were for hotels, 1329 for public-houses, and 283 for grocers' licences. When the Court met on 11th April, the agent for the Vigilance Association appeared in support of the said 98 objections, and made a general statement to the Court, in the course of which he referred to the views which had been urged upon the Magistrates by . . . deputations, and he pressed for a large reduction in the number of licensed premises in the said three districts. Counsel for the applicants whose licences were objected to was then heard, and pointed out to the Court that, as was well known to them, the objections, although ostensibly in the names of the owners or occupiers of property in the district, were in reality the objections of the Vigilance Association, and maintained that these objections were incompetent and irrelevant, were not com-

Feb. 7, 1913.

Goodall v.
Shaw.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Goodall v.
Shaw.

petently before, and ought not to be considered by, the Court. The Court refused to give effect to these contentions, and thereafter the various applicants for licences were called in their order. In every case in which no objections were lodged or taken, the renewal of the licence was immediately granted. In the cases in which objections had been lodged by the Vigilance Association as aforesaid, none of the nominal objectors in whose names objections were pretended to be taken appeared in Court, and no evidence of any kind was led on their behalf. In each case the Court reserved judgment. At the conclusion of the hearing on 11th April the members of the Court retired for a short interval, and on returning they announced that of the 35 licences in the Calton ward to which objections had been lodged by the Vigilance Association as aforesaid, they had sustained the objections to 12 licences, that 2 applications were continued till the following day, and that the remainder of the 35 had been granted. At the conclusion of the Court on 11th April there remained to be disposed of the said objections by the Vigilance Association to licences in the Broomielaw and Cowcaddens districts, and these, which included the pursuer's application, were continued till the next day. . . . (Cond. 13) "When the meeting of the Court was resumed on 12th April the procedure adopted was similar to that of the previous day. The individual cases objected to were dealt with separately, and again none of the nominal objectors appeared, and no evidence was submitted in support of the objections. At the conclusion of the hearing the members of the Court retired, and on returning announced that in the Broomielaw district 10 (including that of the pursuer) out of the 20 applications objected to had been refused, and 10 granted; that in the Cowcaddens district 3 out of 27 applications objected to had been refused and the remainder granted; and that the applications from the Calton district, which had been continued from the previous day, had been refused." (Cond. 14) "The pursuer, and a large number of other licence holders whose applications for renewal were refused as aforesaid, lodged appeals to the Licensing Appeal Court against the said refusals. . . . The Appeal Court met on 8th May 1911, and the law-agent for the Vigilance Association attended to oppose the appeals against the refusal of renewals by the Licensing Court. . . . A proportion of the appeals were dealt with on said 8th May, and at the conclusion of the sitting on that date the Court adjourned until the following day, when the remainder of the appeals were disposed of. . . ." (Cond. 15) ". . . Amongst other appeals refused by the Appeal Court on 9th May was that of the pursuer." (Cond. 16) ". . . The procedure adopted at the said Courts made it impossible for the members of these Courts to exercise a judicial or impartial discretion in disposing of the [objections]. As already explained, the objections were solely directed against an alleged excess of licensed premises in the district, and that question could only have been determined fairly and equitably, as between all the licence holders in the alleged congested district, if the Court had dealt with all the applications for licences in the district at the same time, and having in their discretion determined that a certain number of licences were to be taken away, had then decided, on a consideration of the merits of the whole applications, which of the competing applications should not be granted. Instead of so proceeding, the said Courts, as already explained, granted, without exception, and without consideration, every licence to which no objections had been taken, and afterwards dealt Feb. 7, 1913. with the licences objected to. In other words, the Licensing Court, instead of themselves selecting from the whole applications the licences to be taken away, dealt only with the selection of the Vigilance Association and refused a certain number of these. As a result of their said proceedings the Court not only failed in their duty to exercise their discretion under the statute, but in substance delegated or surrendered the exercise of that discretion to the objectors, that is, in reality to the said Association. Their said proceedings were accordingly irregular and illegal and in violation of all rules of reason and justice, and contrary to the duties and powers conferred upon them by the licensing statute. The proceedings in the Licensing Appeal Court are also vitiated on the like grounds. . . .”

Goodall v.
Shaw.

Defences were lodged by (1) the members of the Licensing Court (other than Sir Archibald M'Innes Shaw) and the Clerk of the Court; and (2) the members of the Licensing Appeal Court (other than Sir Archibald M'Innes Shaw) and the Clerk of the Court.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The objections to the pursuer's application for a renewal of his licence certificate having been irrelevant and incompetent, et separatim not having been competently before the Court, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) The said objections having been taken and insisted in for and on behalf of the said Citizens' Vigilance Association, and said Association having no right or title to appear as objectors to the renewal of pursuer's certificate, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (4) The actings of the members of, and the proceedings of, said Licensing Courts, as condescended on, having been irregular and illegal, and contrary to the principles of reason and justice, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, and the action should accordingly be dismissed.

On 14th March 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.*

* [There were also before his Lordship several other actions at the instance of other pursuers against the same defenders raising substantially the same questions.] “OPINION.—I have to dispose of a group of fifteen actions of reduction brought at the instance of wine and spirit merchants in Glasgow, who were refused a renewal of their licences for the year from 28th May 1911 by the Licensing Court or the Licensing Appeal Court for the city of Glasgow. In the meantime I shall confine myself to the action at the instance of Mr Goodall, who, a few years ago, successfully prosecuted a somewhat similar action, which is reported as Goodall v. Bilsland, 1909 S. C. 1152. It appears from the report of that case that on 9th April 1907 the Glasgow Licensing Court granted Mr Goodall a renewal of his licence for a public-house for premises at 68 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow. The renewal was granted in spite of the objections of certain owners or occupiers of property in the neighbourhood who had been induced to sign mandates in favour of a Mr Kyle, authorising him to sign, lodge, and support objections to the renewal of Mr Goodall's licence. Mr Kyle was the paid solicitor of the Citizens' Vigilance Association, one of whose principal objects was to effect a reduction of the number of public-house licences in Glasgow. Mr Kyle appealed to the Licensing Appeal Court on behalf of his nominal clients and obtained a judgment refusing the renewal of Mr Goodall's licence.

Feb. 7. 1913.

Goodall v.
Shaw.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Kinnear) on 15th and 16th January 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer ;—(1) The objections which had been taken to the renewal of the pursuer's certificate were general objections, being founded on an alleged excess of licensed premises in the district in which the pursuer's public-house was situated, and were in no sense objections to the pursuer's house in particular. There was no suggestion that it was the pursuer's house which was the cause of the evils mentioned in the objections. Being general, the objections could not be competently stated by private objectors under section 19 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903.¹ That section and section 20 contemplated only particular objections against the granting or renewal of certificates in respect of individual public-houses. Since the attention of the Court had been focussed on individual public-houses, and not on the whole houses in the locality, the Court could

This latter judgment was set aside by the Court of Session upon the ground that the mandates in his favour did not authorise Mr Kyle to appeal from the Licensing Court to the Appeal Court, and also upon the separate ground that two members of the Appeal Court who voted had been absent from the bench for a substantial part of the hearing. Mr Goodall's licence was renewed in the years 1908-1910. In the present action he alleges that at the Licensing Court held in April 1911 he was again subjected to opposition nominally at the instance of neighbours who had granted mandates to Mr Kyle ; that the Licensing Court on 12th April refused to renew his licence ; and that on 9th May the Licensing Appeal Court refused his appeal. He asks for reduction of these judgments.

" I. The first ground of reduction is based upon the alleged actings of the Vigilance Association and of Mr Kyle in promoting and carrying to a successful conclusion the opposition to the renewal of the pursuer's licence. The pursuer's averments as regards this somewhat delicate matter are so framed that they could not be sent to proof as they stand. He has made voluminous averments in condescendences 6-8 as to the usual practice of the Vigilance Association in promoting opposition to licences, while his averments in condescendence 9 as to what the Association actually did in this particular case are wanting in necessary specification. This defect could be easily amended, but I do not invite the pursuer (and the fourteen pursuers in similar actions) to incur the expense of rewriting their pleadings, and of precognosing a number of witnesses. The pursuer's counsel explained that in the present action his client did not maintain (as he did in the former case, but unsuccessfully on the evidence) that the persons who signed the mandates in favour of Mr Kyle did not understand the meaning and effect of what they were doing. The pursuer's complaint, as explained by his counsel, is that the objections as framed and lodged by Mr Kyle on behalf of the objectors were the objections of the Vigilance Association and of no one else, in respect that the nominal objectors had not authorised him to state these particular objections, and did not in their own minds object to the renewal of the pursuer's licence upon the particular grounds stated by Mr Kyle. I find nothing in section 19 of the Act of 1903 which forbids an owner or occupier who objects to having a public-house in his vicinity from instructing his solicitor to search for and allege every objection which can be honestly stated, even though such objection may be unknown to his client. On the other hand, I have great sympathy with the view presented by the pursuer's counsel to the effect that section 19 was designed to protect the interests of individuals, and that it is contrary to the intention of the statute that temperance reformers disguised as neigh-only refuse to renew the certificates for these individual houses if they did so on the ground of particular objections against them. (2) The objections which had been lodged against a renewal of the pursuer's certificate were not the objections of persons who had a right under the Act to object; they were the objections of an association which had no locus standi. Mr Kyle, who appeared as the agent of the nominal objectors, was not really their agent; his true clients were the Vigilance Association. The right to object to the grant or renewal of a licence was a personal franchise, and the mandate by the nominal objectors in favour of Mr Kyle was, in effect, an assignation of a personal franchise, and was an abuse of the statute and illegal. It was a device on the part of the Vigilance Association to acquire a right which the statute did not give them. The pursuer was ready to prove that Mr Kyle, in objecting to the renewal of the pursuer's licence, was really acting on behalf of the Vigilance Association, and

¹ 3 Edw. VII. cap. 25.

Feb. 7, 1913.
Goodall v.
Shaw.

bours should appear and object to the granting or renewal of particular licences. Such reformers have ample opportunity by way of deputations and otherwise of impressing on the Licensing Magistrates their views on the general temperance question, and particularly their opinion that a certain district is over-licensed. Accordingly, if the question had arisen for the first time, I should have given the pursuer an opportunity of amending his pleadings by alleging with proper specification that the mandates were not intended (as they profess) to constitute Mr Kyle the law-agent of the granters, but were intended to cover a secret and illegal assignation in his favour as agent of the Vigilance Association. In other words, they were mandates in rem suam, and were intended to confer upon Mr Kyle an irrevocable right to oppose the pursuer's licence in the interests and for the purposes of the Vigilance Association, and that in return for and in consideration of the expenses incurred and to be incurred by the Association in connection with the opposition. If the proceeding contemplated by the mandates had been an ordinary litigation which was to be carried on in name of the signatories, but in the interest of and by the Vigilance Association, these averments would not have affected the competency of the action, but would have been relevant merely to prove that the Association was the dominus litis and responsible for the expenses of a litigation in which it was truly the principal. The Vigilance Association, as assignee, might competently sue in name of its cedents. I should have thought, however, that in a question as to the valid exercise of a statutory privilege conferred upon certain specified classes of persons, the allegation was relevant that the right to object to a licence had been illegally transferred to a third party. I do not read the opinions of the Judges in the former case as expressing any different view of the law, but merely as declining to draw the inference in fact that the mandates were intended to accomplish more than their ostensible purpose—per Lord President, 1909 S. C., pp. 1165-7, per Lord Ordinary (Johnston), pp. 1173-4. Although, in the words of the Lord President, Mr Kyle 'acted entirely as if the litigation were his own,' his Lordship does not say that, in his opinion, the granters of the mandates so intended. It is, of course, open to the pursuer to ask the Court to draw a different inference from the facts in the present case; but as these facts seem to be substantially the same as in the former case, his prospect of success would probably not justify the expense of amending the record.

"II. [The second ground of reduction (the reception by the Magistrates of deputations composed of members of the Vigilance Committee) dealt with by the Lord Ordinary was not maintained in the Inner House, and is not reported.]

"III. The pursuer alleges (Cond. 16) that the objections to the renewal of his licence, which were framed and lodged by Mr Kyle on behalf of

Feb. 7, 1913.

Goodall v.
Shaw.

not of any persons having a right to object. (3) Where the only objections against the renewal of certain public-house certificates were objections founded on redundancy, every applicant for renewal must be heard before the case of any could be determined¹; and so the Licensing Court before refusing to renew the pursuer's certificate, in consequence of a general objection that the district in question was over-licensed and that a reduction of the number of licences was necessary in the public interest, ought to have taken into consideration the whole licences in the district and only thereafter decided which should be refused. The Magistrates had failed to do so, and, indeed, the procedure which they had adopted at the meeting of the Licensing Court had made it impossible for them to do so, and they had thus acted unfairly towards the pursuer, against whose conduct of the premises for which a renewal of certificate was refused there was no complaint or objection. Also, instead of themselves determining certain neighbours 'were not competent or relevant objections within the meaning of section 19 of the statute, and in any event were not competently before the Court in respect that they were not specific objections to pursuer's licence, but general objections directed against alleged congestion of licensed premises in the district in which the pursuer's premises are situated.' The ground of reduction resolves into a criticism of the objections stated in the record, to which the pursuer's counsel proposes to apply a stricter standard of relevancy than is applied now to pleadings in the Court of Session. He pointed out that the first three paragraphs simply go to support the opening statement that 'there are more licensed premises in the neighbourhood where the said premises are situated than are necessary to meet the requirements of the inhabitants'; while the last paragraph states that 'in view of the facts above narrated, it is not meet and convenient that this application should be granted.' Logically there is here a non sequitur, because the pursuer's licensed house might be necessary for the accommodation of the public notwithstanding that the number of licensed houses in its neighbourhood was excessive. But I construe the objections as impliedly stating that the pursuer's licensed house was unnecessary owing to the number of similar houses available in the neighbourhood for the use of the public.

"IV. The next ground of reduction is founded upon the procedure adopted by the Licensing Courts in disposing of the applications for renewals of licences in the Broomielaw district where the pursuer's house is situated. The pursuer alleges that in every case in which no objection had been taken the renewal was immediately granted, 'without exception and without consideration' (Conds. 12 and 16); and that the Court reserved for subsequent consideration the applications to which objections, mostly on the ground of congestion, had been lodged. As it may be assumed that the policy of the Magistrates was to diminish the number of licensed houses, the victims of this policy fell, according to the procedure adopted, to be selected not from the whole body of licence holders in the district, but from a black list of which the Vigilance Association were truly the authors. Further, it was impossible for the Magistrates to 'exercise a judicial or impartial discretion in disposing of' these objections without considering at the same time the position and advantages or disadvantages of the whole licensed houses in the district. The pursuer's counsel based his argument principally upon the dicta of Lord Alverstone, C.J., and of Lawrence, J., in Raven v. Southampton Justices, [1904] 1 K. B. 430. This case was which licences should be renewed, and which reserved for consideration, with a view to the reduction of their number, the Magistrates had, in effect, allowed the Vigilance Association to do that for them, and so had failed to discharge the duty laid upon them by statute. The case of *Walsh v. Magistrates of Pollokshaws*¹ was distinguishable from the present. In that case there was a specific objection in addition to the general one, and the Magistrates were there acting in an administrative capacity under section 11 of the Act.

¹ Raven v. Southampton Justices, [1904] 1 K. B. 430; Rex v. Howard, [1902] 2 K. B. 363; Sharp v. Wakefield, [1891] A. C. 173.

Feb. 7, 1913.
Goodall v.
Shaw.

Argued for the respondents the members of the Licensing Court;— (1) Section 19 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, in no way limited the grounds of objection that might be put forward by private objectors. All that was necessary under that section was that the objections should be stated against a particular licence, and that had been done in the present case. The Magistrates were themselves acquainted with the locality, and were of opinion that there were too many public-houses; and that was sufficient to entitle them to reduce the number of licences. (2) The objectors here were occupiers of houses in the neighbourhood of the pursuer's premises, and so had a right to object.² There was nothing illegal in their employing as their agent the agent of the Vigilance Association.³ (3) In refusing to renew the pursuer's certificate the Magistrates had exercised their discretion judicially. The pursuer's own averments were inconsistent with his argument that the Magistrates had failed to do so. In determining which of the public-house certificates should be renewed and which refused, the Magistrates had taken into consideration the fact that the renewal of some had been objected to and the renewal of others had not. That was the principle of selection on which the Court had proceeded, and, in granting a renewal in the case of those certificates to which no objections had been taken, they had, in effect, determined that those certificates were "meet and convenient"⁴ to be renewed. With regard to the certificates objected to, which were held over, the Magistrates had retained their full discretion. It was still open to them to refuse or renew them all, and in point of fact many of them had been renewed. The Magistrates were entitled to make up their minds beforehand on the general question of whether or not in a particular ward there should be a reduction of licences, and they commented upon by the Lord President in Walsh's case, 7 F. 1009, at pp. 1019-20, and is certainly not an authority in Scotland. While the dicta referred to are entitled to respect, there is also force in the reasoning of the dissenting Judge, Kennedy, J. I do not need to choose between these conflicting views, because I have no right and no duty to instruct the Licensing Courts as to the way in which they ought to exercise the discretionary powers committed to them by the statute. On this point it is sufficient to refer to the opinion of the Lord President in Walsh's case (7 F., pp. 1017-18), and to the authorities there cited. All I need say is that the procedure adopted does not strike me as being unjudicial and capricious. I therefore hold this ground of judgment to be irrelevant.

"The decision in Goodall's case rules all the other cases.—[His Lordship then referred to one or two special points in these cases.]

"I accordingly dismiss all the actions as irrelevant."

¹ (1905) 7 F. 1009, aff. 1907 S. C. (H. L.) 1.

² Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 19.

³ Goodall v. Biland, 1909 S. C. 1152, per the Lord President, at pp. 1164 et seq., and Lord Johnston, at foot of p. 1173.

⁴ Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 11.

Feb. 7, 1913. were further entitled to select in that ward the area within which, if there was to be a reduction, that reduction should take place. Such selection was a question of administrative policy, and an applicant for the renewal of his certificate had no right to be heard on a general question of administrative policy.¹ That being so, the pursuer in the present case, while he was entitled to be heard in regard to his own particular licence, was not entitled to say, "You must not dispose of A's application until you have considered mine."

Goodall v.
Shaw.

Counsel for the respondents the members of the Licensing Appeal Court adopted the argument put forward on behalf of the members of the Licensing Court.

At advising on 7th February 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer in this case being, in 1911, the holder of a licence for a public-house situated at 68 M'Alpine Street, Glasgow, applied to the Licensing Court for a renewal, and that renewal was refused. He then appealed, and the judgment of the Licensing Court was affirmed. The present action is an action for reduction of this deliverance, and the Lord Ordinary has held that the action as laid is irrelevant, and has therefore dismissed it.

The matter arises out of circumstances which, in a certain aspect of them, have already been before this Court in a previous action at the instance of the same pursuer. There is a society in Glasgow called the Vigilance Association which tries to prevent the granting of certain licences. It goes round and finds objectors who, by their local position, have a locus standi under the statute; it assists those objectors, and, indeed, practically conducts their cases for them. In the present instance that procedure had been followed, and objections were put in at the instance of certain objectors who had allowed the agent for the Vigilance Association to conduct their cases. These objections, as stated, were entirely of the nature of general objections,—that is to say, the objectors did not make any particular complaint of the way in which the pursuer's public-house was conducted, or of the unfitness of the pursuer to conduct it; but they put forward, as forcibly as they could, the redundancy of licences in the neighbourhood and the inadvisability of those licences being kept at the same number, the sequitur being that the pursuer's licence ought to be refused. The agent for the Vigilance Association was heard upon these objections, and the first objection of the pursuer is that the voice that was heard in Court was truly the voice of the Vigilance Association and not of the particular objector. I do not wish to waste your Lordships' time by repeating what I said in the case of Goodall v. Bilsland.² I think it clearly follows from what I there said that, however much the true moving spirit may have been the Vigilance Association, and however much the oration of the agent for the objector may have been coloured by the views of the Society, there was nothing illegal about that, and if the objector chooses to employ the agent of the Vigilance Association as his agent and to allow him to conduct his case, that is not a ground for reducing the deliverance Feb. 7, 1913. that may be afterwards pronounced.

¹ Walsh v. Magistrates of Pollokshaws, 1907 S. C. (H. L.) 1, per Lord Davey, at p. 4.

² 1909 S. C. 1152.

The case of insufficiency of mandate, which wrecked the proceedings in Goodall v. Shaw, the former case, is not really presented in this case. There is something Ld. President. said about the getting of the mandates, and so on. But the case was not pled in that way before the Lord Ordinary, and was not pled in that way before your Lordships. To sustain a case of that kind it would have been necessary to allege specifically that the mandates, in their terms, did not cover the appearance, and nothing of that sort has been urged.

But the next objection—and it is a more formidable one and has given me some anxiety, more especially as I know that there is a difference of opinion among us upon the subject—is founded on the way in which the Licensing Committee proceeded in this matter. The Vigilance Association had, I think I may say, found objectors in a certain number of cases, and in a certain number of cases they had not. Now, it is said—and this being upon relevancy, I must take it that the statement of the pursuer is true—it is said—[His Lordship read condescendences 12 and 13]. Upon that statement the pursuer argues thus. He says: "There was here no objection to me individually at all; the only objections were general objections founded upon the advisability of reducing the number of licences. And the licensing body so handed themselves over to the Vigilance Association that they took from them the position that licences to which they had not objected could safely be granted; and thus allowed them to select, so to speak, for the Court those licences against which it was proposed to execute the general purpose of reducing the licences." The pursuer says that by that method of proceeding the Magistrates never did, and never could, consider the case judicially, but assumed that the pursuer's licence was a proper one to be refused; first, because they had already granted de plano a large number of licences; and secondly, because, so far as the others were concerned, they had not made that selection by any consideration of their own, but simply had taken what is tantamount to a list handed in by the Vigilance Association.

I certainly am not without hesitation upon this matter, because I do think it was a very unfortunate method of proceeding. I cannot understand why the licensing body, who, I presume, want to act fairly as between all persons, if they are of opinion that there should be a reduction of licences in a certain district, should not themselves go into the matter by getting a report from the police or someone in whom they have trust; and then—directing their own minds to the questions raised in that report—avoid acting in such a manner as, at any rate, gives the appearance of being unduly influenced by the views of a set of persons who, although I am perfectly willing to give them credit for good motives, still have no real locus standi in the matter, and are not people whom one can believe to be very prone to act in a judicial spirit. But although I feel that very strongly, I do not think that what the licensing body did is sufficient to allow us, as a Court of law, to set aside their deliverance. Here again, I do not propose to make any general observations, because I said all I have to say in the case of Walsh,¹ and I

¹ 7 F. 1009, aff. 1907 S. C. (H. L.) 1.

Feb. 7, 1913.
Goodall v.
Shaw.
—
Ld. President.

believe that what I said there was approved in the House of Lords. I cannot myself say that it was wrong for the Licensing Court, if they came to the conclusion that there were too many licences in the district, to say to themselves, "We will, in selecting those that are to be refused, be influenced by the fact that A, B, and C are objected to by their neighbours, and that D, E, and F are not." However much the Vigilance Association may have been the prime movers in the matter, still that is the eventual result. After all, the Vigilance Association were able to find the neighbours of A, B, and C who did put in objections, and it does not alter the situation that the objections of the neighbours of A, B, and C were not very spontaneous. So that I do not feel that the licensing body did anything wrong in saying, "When we consider this question we shall take it that, if any licences are to go, those had better go to which the neighbours object." Then you come to the next stage. The Licensing Court take up the objections and they hear the parties, and they take the cases into consideration. Now it seems to me that the licensing body had still kept it in their power to grant every one of those licences. Their hearing parties upon those cases to which objections were lodged did not prevent them granting one and all of them, and up to the last moment, until they pronounced judgment, they were able to select as they chose between them. Of course we cannot tell what were the precise reasons which led them to think that the pursuer's licence should be refused while somebody else's should not. But it has been held again and again that in this matter the Licensing Court are entitled to make use of their own knowledge. They are not bound to consider only what they hear in Court brought before them as evidence; and accordingly I think they were entitled to discriminate as they chose.

If there had been a general resolution by which the licensing body had bound themselves to reduce the licences by a certain number, then, I think, they would have put themselves into a position in which it would be impossible to do justice as between A, B, C, D, and so on, without considering each and every case. But they did not do that. They had heard depositions upon the matter, but there was nothing in their procedure up to this moment which prevented them granting every one of those licences if they chose.

Accordingly, on the whole matter, I think that no relevant case here has been made out against what the Court did. I have expressed myself as strongly as I am entitled to as to what I think ought fairly to be done when licences are to be refused upon the ground of numbers alone, because, although in one sense the question arises as a new one upon each particular person's application, still anyone with any common sense of fairness would feel that if there are twenty licences in a district which are to be reduced to fifteen, there ought to be consideration as to which five should be taken. On the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I regret that I am unable to arrive at the same conclusion as your Lordship and my brother Lord Mackenzie, as I think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment as regards the fourth head of his very lucid and exhaustive opinion is not well founded. The ground of my dissent may be shortly stated. I recognise that under the Licensing Act of 1903, section 11, the Licensing Court at their general half-yearly meetings are Feb. 7, 1913. empowered to grant certificates for the keeping of public-houses for the Goodall v. ensuing term, "to such and so many persons as the Court then assembled Shaw. at such meeting shall think meet and convenient." The Court therefore Ld. Johnston. has conferred upon it a very wide discretion, but it is a discretion which, I think, it is now fully accepted, must be exercised fairly and reasonably, and not arbitrarily. It is a public fact that large capital is embarked in the licensed house business, and—while I am far from suggesting that the licence holder has any vested interest, far less any right of property, in his licence,—this publicly recognised fact calls for fair and reasonable, if not judicial in the higher sense, treatment of their business by the Licensing Court.

If I thought that the present was on all-fours with the case of *Walsh*¹ I should feel bound to concur with your Lordships. But I think that in its circumstances it is not in pari casu with that of Walsh,¹ and that it differs from it precisely in such a way as to lead to a different conclusion. I do not detain your Lordships by a comparison of the circumstances of the two cases. The distinction between them is at once apparent.

In this relation it is, I think, not without pertinence to advert to the different way in which applications for new certificates and for the renewal of old certificates is treated by the Act. I refer to sections 13 and 23 as compared with section 22.

Against the granting or renewing of any certificate objection may be taken, without notice, by any member of the Court or by certain public officials in the public interest (section 20); and also by any person or the agent of any person owning or occupying property in the neighbourhood of the premises for which a certificate or the renewal of a certificate is applied, but this only on notice, specifying the grounds of objection, and such objection shall be heard by the Court, and if it is considered by them of sufficient importance and proved to their satisfaction, the certificate shall not be granted or renewed (section 19). Though the last part of this clause is not repeated in section 20, I think that it is implied. Provision is also made for the obtaining and leading of evidence on behalf of any party interested in relation to applications for the granting and renewing of certificates (section 21).

Now, objection may be either general or particular, as, for instance, on the one hand, that a district or neighbourhood is over-supplied with public-houses, or, on the other, that an individual house is insanitary or ill-conducted in its construction, or that it has been badly conducted. It is rare that a purely general objection, as that there is a congestion of public-houses in a neighbourhood, is taken to an individual public-house, except in conjunction with a particular objection to that house. But I do not think that it is incompetent for such general objection only to be taken, or for it to be taken by a private objector under section 19. But I think that it is incumbent on the Court, if it is to act fairly and reasonably and not arbitrarily, to proceed somewhat differently in disposing of such general objection, and such general objection only, than where it is dealing with a particular objection. And the question in the present case is, whether the

¹ 7 F. 1009, aff. 1907 S. C. (H. L.) 1.

Feb. 7, 1913. Court has so dealt fairly and reasonably and not arbitrarily with this pursuer's licence. It has been subjected to a general objection only, and at the instance of private objectors, as disclosed in the notice of objection. Goodall v. Shaw. Nothing could be more general. The objection states merely that there are more licensed premises in the neighbourhood, where the said premises are situated, than are necessary to meet the requirements of the inhabitants, as is said to be shown by a comparison of the population with the number of public-houses, and by the fact of reduction in the population without a proportional reduction in the number of licences. And, further, reference is made to the low physical, social, and moral tone of the district, as proved by the high death-rate, and particularly the high infantile death-rate, and by the high percentage of irregularity in school attendance, and of the number of children requiring to be fed by the School Board. It may be true, and if the facts alleged are correct I think must almost be admitted to be true, that the district is over-licensed. But, then, why is this particular public-house, in preference to others, selected as one the licence of which is to be cancelled, it having subsisted for a great many years, and there being no particular objection stated to it in conjunction with this general objection? I do not suggest that the Licensing Court, if they are of opinion that a district is over-licensed, are not entitled under the Act to reduce the number of licences and to refuse any particular certificate without having in addition some particular objection which they can sustain, not as per se sufficient to justify them in refusing a renewal irrespective of the consideration of congestion, but as pointing to the propriety of selecting the individual house as the one to be suppressed where in their opinion there is congestion. I only maintain that in making their selection they must act fairly and reasonably and not arbitrarily. And if the statements in cond. 12 are proved, the Licensing Court in the present case, at their spring sitting in 1911, by their course of procedure precluded themselves, in my opinion, from acting fairly and reasonably, and did act arbitrarily.

The case as presented to this Court is mixed up with very lengthy averments as to the action of a certain body known in Glasgow as the Vigilance Association. There is no question that this Association instigated these general objections to the pursuer's and a number of other licences, and entirely controlled the objections in each case. But I put out of sight all these allegations as unnecessary for the pursuer's true case. Mr Kyle, the agent for the Vigilance Association, produced to the Court sufficient mandates to appear for the alleged nominal objectors, and for my purpose I assume that he was quite entitled to be heard, and was heard, on behalf of these individual objectors. Now, at the Licensing Court in question the total number of applications for licences amounted to 1631, the objections amounted to 98, and the objections were all supported by Mr Kyle, as agent for the nominal objectors, and were all, as alleged, substantially in the same terms as those which I have summarised above. The Court met on 11th April, and it is said that, after hearing and repelling objections to Mr Kyle's right to appear, they called the various applicants for licences in their order. In every case in which no objections were lodged or taken, it is alleged that the renewal of the licence was immediately granted. But in the cases in which objections had been lodged, and in which Mr

Kyle appeared for the objectors, without evidence led, the Court reserved Feb. 7, 1913. judgment. At the conclusion of the sitting of 11th April the Court, after retiring for consultation, are said to have announced that of thirty-five licences in the Calton ward, to which the above general objection had been lodged, they refused the renewal of twelve and granted the remainder, and then adjourned to the following day. It is then further alleged that on the 12th of April similar procedure was followed. The cases objected to were dealt with separately. None of the nominal objectors appeared personally, but Mr Kyle was heard, and at the conclusion of the hearing the Court, after consultation, announced that in the Broomielaw district they refused ten licences (including that of the pursuer) out of the twenty applications objected to, and granted the remaining ten.

Goodall v. Shaw.

Ld. Johnston.

In so acting the Court did, as it appears to me, preclude themselves from judging fairly and reasonably, and did proceed arbitrarily. They had nothing before them but the alleged over-licensing of the district. If they were satisfied of this, they were bound to make a fair and reasonable selection of licences to be withdrawn, after a survey or consideration of the district or neighbourhood. By granting on 11th April all those licences to which no objection had been taken, they had precluded themselves from making such selection.

If they had made up their minds, on consideration of the general question prior to their sitting, that there ought to be a reduction in the number of licences, I do not think that inquiry could be demanded into the method they took to determine their selection of the licences to be cancelled, unless something very flagrantly partial could be alleged. The matter is one committed to their discretion. But when they had not, so far as appears ex facie of their proceedings, considered the general question, and had, on entering upon their duties, proceeded to grant renewals of the great majority of the licences brought before them, they had, I think, debarred themselves, in course of the sitting of the Court—for they could only then proceed to carry any determination on the general question into effect—from selecting from the licences left those which they would cancel. Whether they had or had not considered and come to any determination upon the general question, they had already surrendered to others the function of making a short list for them, and then they applied themselves solely to the consideration of the houses entered in that short list. This, in my opinion, was arbitrary and not fair and reasonable. For these reasons, while the record contains a large amount of matter which I may term surplusage, there is, in my opinion, in conds. 12 and 13 a relevant case stated for reduction of the deliverance or finding of a Licensing Court. If the proceedings of the Licensing Court were thus vitiated, I do not think that their deliverances could be set up by any affirmance of the Licensing Appeal Court, particularly if, as is alleged, Mr Kyle, representing the nominal objectors, stated to the Court that he had no specific objection against the character of any of the applicants, and that his objections were entirely on the ground of congestion of licences.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

The only ground of reduction in regard to which I desire to say anything

Feb. 7, 1913.

Goodall v.
Shaw.Lord Mac-
kenzie.

is that founded upon the procedure followed at the Licensing Court. The pursuer's averments on this point are contained in articles 12 and 16 of the condescendence, which may be summarised thus :—The Licensing Court refused to renew Goodall's licence in consequence of a general objection that there were more licensed premises in the neighbourhood than were necessary to meet the requirements of the inhabitants. Before coming to this conclusion it was necessary for the Court to take into consideration the position of the whole licences in the neighbourhood. This, however, they could not do, because all the licences to which no objection had been stated were immediately granted, and it was only thereafter that the Magistrates proceeded to deal with the licences which had been placed on a black list by the Vigilance Association, by means of objections taken under section 19 of the 1903 Act; therefore the Court had debarred itself from exercising a judicial discretion.

Now, no doubt, the objection as stated involves a non sequitur. The fact that there are too many licences in the district is not per se a reason why the licence of A should be taken away. On the other hand, I do not think that the fact of the objection being stated in these terms makes the procedure invalid. If the true question was whether in the public interest the licence of A should go, the form of the objection is not material, provided the pursuer cannot aver facts which show that it was not possible that the true question was considered and decided. The grounds upon which the Licensing Court may proceed in coming to a conclusion are pointed out by the Lord President in the case of Walsh.¹

It is evident from the terms of cond. 12 that if, after the whole cases had been called, and parties had been heard in those where there were objections, avizandum had been made with all the cases, the pursuer could not have said anything against the procedure. The averments in cond. 16 could not have been made. As the averments stand in cond. 12 I think they lack one essential element to make them relevant. There is no averment that when the Licensing Court came to deal with Goodall's licence they had as a Court prejudged the question whether there should be any reduction of licences on the ground of redundancy. The fact that a large number of unopposed licences had previously been granted did not debar the Court from exercising a judicial discretion when they came to those that were objected to. From the figures given it appears that a large proportion of the licences objected to were granted. In these circumstances I agree with the view taken by the Lord Ordinary.

As regards the English cases of *Raven*² and Howard,³ these were decisions under a different statute.

I desire to say in addition to what the Lord President has already said that in dealing with the question of the redundancy of licences, it is most desirable that the Licensing Court should proceed so as to avoid any appearance of unfairness.

THE COURT adhered.

ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—
CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 7 F. 1009, aff. 1907 S. C. (H. L.) 1.

² [1904] 1 K. B. 430.

³ [1902] 2 K. B. 363.

ROBERT BARCLAY PEARSON AND OTHERS (William Burton Stewart's Marriage-contract Trustees), Petitioners.—Hon. W. Watson. No. 87.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Trust—Trustees—Resignation—New trustees—Appointment of Canadian trust company as trustees. Stewart's Trustees.

The trustees acting under a Scotch antenuptial contract of marriage and an English marriage-settlement, made on the marriage of a Scotsman to an Englishwoman, were the same parties, viz., the spouses themselves, who had left Scotland and settled in Canada, and two other persons who resided in England. The trustees presented a petition to the Court to appoint as trustees, in place of the petitioners, a Canadian trust company incorporated by special Act of Parliament of the Dominion, and having power, inter alia, to undertake the office of trustee; and to authorise the petitioners to transfer the trust funds to the company and to resign. The company entered into a formal obligation, in the event of their appointment, to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session in all matters relating to the trust and to obey all orders of the Court thereanent, and assigned the chambers of a firm of Glasgow writers as their domicile of citation.

The Court refused the prayer of the petition.

Simpson's Trustees, 1907 S. C. 87, distinguished and doubted.

ON 19th July 1912 a petition was presented by the trustees acting 1ST DIVISION. under two deeds granted in contemplation of the marriage, which was afterwards solemnised, between William Burton Stewart and Rachel Westmacott, craving for the appointment of new trustees under each deed, and for authority to assign the trust funds and to resign.

The deeds in question were:—(1) An antenuptial contract of marriage in Scotch form entered into between the said William Burton Stewart, of the first part, and the said Rachel Westmacott, afterwards Stewart, with consent of her father, Percy Graham Buchanan Westmacott, of Rosemount, Sunninghill, Berkshire, of the second part, dated 10th April, and registered in the Books of Council and Session 4th May 1899, and (2) a deed of settlement in English form entered into between the said Percy Graham Buchanan Westmacott, of the first part, the said William Burton Stewart, of the second part, the said Rachel Westmacott, afterwards Stewart, of the third part, and John Westmacott, Robert Barclay Pearson, the said William Burton Stewart, and Rachel Westmacott, afterwards Stewart (together therein called the trustees), of the fourth part, dated 10th April 1899. The trustees appointed under both these deeds were the same, viz.:—the petitioners, who were Robert Barclay Pearson, sometime advocate, Edinburgh, now of No. 6 Austin Friars, London; John Westmacott of Woodlands, Mitcham, in the county of Surrey, stockbroker; and the said William Burton Stewart and Rachel Westmacott or Stewart.

The antenuptial contract of marriage dealt with property placed in trust by the husband, who was a domiciled Scotsman. Its main provisions concerned a sum of £25,000 which he bound himself to assign and convey to the trustees to be held on certain trusts for the benefit of the spouses and their issue. It contained a declaration that the trusts thereby constituted should be construed and administered according to the law of Scotland and that the rights of parties should be regulated thereby. The deed of settlement dealt with a sum of £8500 which Percy Graham Buchanan Westmacott, Mrs

Feb. 7, 1913.

Stewart's
Trustees.

Burton Stewart's father, covenanted to pay to the trustees, to be held on certain other trusts for the benefit of the spouses and their issue.

There were two children of the marriage.

It was stated in the petition:—"That the said Mr and Mrs William Burton Stewart, who, at the date of their marriage, were respectively domiciled in Scotland and England, now reside in Canada, and have residences in Vancouver and Montreal, Mr William Burton Stewart being managing director of Norton, Griffiths, & Company, Limited, engineers and public works contractors in these two cities. Mr Stewart, by letter dated 29th June 1912, herewith produced, intimated to the petitioners that he fully intends to remain in Canada and establish his permanent home and residence there, although his intention might in the future be somewhat altered by the course of his business. Mr and Mrs Stewart state in the said letter that at present they are definitely resident in Canada, and that in all probability they will remain there permanently. That in said letter Mr and Mrs Stewart also state that they find it inconvenient to have their marriage trust administered by trustees (of whose number they themselves form two) resident in England; and that they desire their marriage-trust investments and affairs as well as their own to be attended to in Canada where they reside. They moreover state that, as it would be more satisfactory to them and be in the interests and for the benefit of themselves and their two children that their marriage trustees should reside in Canada, they accordingly desire that the trust funds should be transferred to and invested in Canada, where trust securities yielding a higher rate of interest than similar securities in this country are in ordinary course obtainable, and that the petitioners should resign the office of trustees. With this view Mr and Mrs Stewart therefore asked the petitioners to crave the Court to (1) appoint as their new trustees, under the said antenuptial contract of marriage and deed of settlement, The Prudential Trust Company, Limited (of Canada), a strong trust company, incorporated by special Act of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, whose head office is in Montreal, and who are licensed in the provinces of Quebec and British Columbia, and others, to execute the business that can be done by a trust company, and also authorised to undertake inter alia the office of trustee, and who are in the opinion of Mr and Mrs Stewart fit and proper persons to be appointed trustees, and (2) authorise the petitioners to assign, transfer, and make over the existing trust securities and investments, or to realise the same and pay over the proceeds thereof to the said company, and thereafter to resign the office of trustee. That the petitioners have asked the said company to state in writing their willingness to be appointed a trustee under the said antenuptial contract of marriage and deed of settlement, and to grant their obligation that, should they be appointed trustees thereunder, they will submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the Court in all matters relating to the trust, and the obligation when received will be produced in the course of these proceedings."

On 1st August 1912 the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills (Lord Kinneir) remitted to Mr Keith R. Maitland, W.S., to inquire into the circumstances set forth in the petition and to report.

On 10th January 1913 Mr Keith Maitland submitted his report. This report contained the following passages:—

"Certain particulars as to the financial position and the powers of the said Prudential Trust Company, Limited (of which the said William Burton Stewart is a director) are given in the petition, and there has been produced in process a copy of the prospectus of the said company. The petitioners say that 'the said company is, so far as is known to the petitioners, a fit and proper person to be appointed trustee.'

Feb. 7, 1913.
 Stewart's
 Trustees.

"Since the presentation of the petition there has been lodged in process a formal obligation, dated 29th July 1912, executed by the said Prudential Trust Company, Limited, under which the said company consent to act as trustee under the said antenuptial deeds, and in the event of being appointed 'bind and oblige ourselves to submit to the jurisdiction of the said Court (Court of Session) in all matters relating to the trust created by the said antenuptial contract of marriage and deed of settlement, and to obey all orders of the said Court made upon us thereanent, and for that purpose we assign the chambers of Messrs Watt, Son, & Company, writers, 183 St Vincent Street, Glasgow, as our domicile of citation.' There have also been produced (1) a notarially certified extract from the minute-books of the said company of a meeting of the board of directors, held on 13th December 1912, under which Farquhar Robertson and B. Hal Brown, two of the directors, and James Elmsly, the secretary of the company, are authorised, inter alia, to sign all deeds and instruments which the company in its capacity as trustee may require to sign, and to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session in all matters relating to the trust; and (2) a print of the Act of Incorporation of the company, which contains, inter alia, the following clauses." The reporter here quoted certain sections from the Act of Incorporation of the company.*

The report proceeded:—

"It is necessary for the petitioners to obtain the authority of the Court to enable them to carry out the course proposed, and there is precedent for an application of the kind so far as relating to a Scotch marriage-contract trust. In the case of Simpson's Trustees (reported in 1907 Session Cases on page 88) authority was granted to the trustees under a Scotch antenuptial contract of marriage to resign, and the Court appointed certain individuals resident in Canada to be trustees, subject to their granting an obligation to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session very much in the same terms as the

* The sections quoted by the reporter were to the following effect:—

The company were authorised (section 8) (a) to receive money in trust for the purposes specified in the Act and to invest the same, and "(b) to accept and execute all such trusts of every description and nature as are entrusted to it by any Government or person, or committed or transferred to it by any order, judgment, or decree of any Court in Canada or elsewhere; execute the offices of executor, administrator, trustee. . . ." (Section 9) to invest trust moneys in certain specified investments and, inter alia, "(c) in such securities as are authorised by the terms of the trust"; and to hold securities of any other kind which formed part of any estate coming into their hands, subject to the trusts and legal obligations attached thereto. It was provided (section 10) that moneys and securities of any such trust should always be kept distinct from those of the company and in separate accounts; (section 11) that trust property should not be liable for the debts of the company; (section 13) that accounts should be rendered of any trust to which the company was appointed trustee by the Court from time to time as the Court should direct; (section 16) that an annual statement of the company's accounts should be given to the Minister of Finance.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Stewart's
Trustees.

obligation which has been produced in the present process, and also authorised the trust funds to be transferred to Canada. In the present case it may be noted that under the investment clauses in both deeds the present trustees have full powers of investment in colonial securities.

"The reporter has, however, considerable difficulty in the present case upon two points.

"The first is with regard to the trust created by the deed of settlement. This deed, as before stated, is in English form, and it appears to the reporter that the law of England might require to be invoked in order to regulate the carrying out of the trust. The trustees under the two deeds are the same, but the trust funds are distinct, and the provisions in the two deeds regarding the disposal of the respective trust funds are different. They constitute in effect separate trusts, and the funds have been kept separate. The ultimate beneficiaries under the deed of settlement will in certain events require to be ascertained according to English law. The reporter is in these circumstances doubtful as to the power of the Scotch Courts to alter the administration of the trust created by the deed of settlement, and he thinks it proper to bring the point before your Lordships.

"The second point arises in connection with the appointment, suggested by the petitioners, of the Prudential Trust Company, Limited, as trustee. So far as the information before the reporter goes, the company would appear to be financially sound, but, on the information at his disposal, he does not feel himself in a position to state any definite opinion on this subject. As regards its powers, the reporter has examined the Act of Incorporation, of which a print has been lodged in process, and he refers to the clauses therein, which are quoted above, which show that under its Act it is authorised to act as a trustee on estates either under deeds or under appointment by any Court. So far as the reporter is aware, however, there is no precedent in Scotland for the appointment by the Court of an incorporated company as trustee under a private trust. There is no recognition of such a principle under the Trusts Acts, and it seems to the reporter that in a Scotch trust to be administered in Scotland such an appointment may be incompetent, although the principle of an incorporated company acting as trustee is recognised in England and also in Canada. The point is one which the reporter also thinks it necessary to bring before your Lordships.

"Apart from these points which the reporter has thought it necessary to bring before your Lordships, the reporter has no further remarks to make. The procedure has been properly carried out, and the only objections to the granting of the prayer of the petition seem to be those stated."

Counsel were heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Dundas, and Lord Johnston) on 21st January 1913.

Argued for the petitioners;—There was no distinction in principle between this case and that of Simpson's Trustees,¹ where individuals in Canada were appointed to be trustees under a Scotch antenuptial contract of marriage in circumstances precisely similar to those of the present application. Indeed the appointment of a corporation as trustee was preferable, in the interests of the beneficiaries, to the appointment of individuals. As regarded the doubt raised by the reporter as to the English trust, it was clear that the two trusts created by the two deeds were really one and indivisible. The intention of parties was that they should be administered together, and, according to the express provision of the antenuptial contract, in Scotland. In these circumstances, the fact that ultimately the rules of English law might have to be invoked in order to carry out the purposes of the settlement did not make the settlement an English trust, and did not affect the power of this Court to deal with the united trusts which fell to be administered within its jurisdiction. The cases of Brockie,¹ Allan's Trustees,² and Carruthers' Trustees,³ in which the Court had refused to deal with English trusts, were distinguishable from the present. These cases concerned trusts which were English in every respect, except that part of the trust-estate consisted of heritable property in Scotland.

¹ 1907 S. C. 87.

Feb. 7, 1913.
Stewart's
Trustees.

At advising on 7th February 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition by the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Burton Stewart, in which they ask your Lordships to appoint as new trustees a corporate company in Canada, to empower the petitioners to assign the trust funds to the said company, and to permit them, the petitioners, to resign office.

Mr Burton Stewart at the time of his marriage was a domiciled Scotsman. Mrs Burton Stewart was an English lady, and when they married two deeds were executed. One was an antenuptial marriage-contract in ordinary Scotch form, under which the husband settled certain funds, the other was a deed of settlement in English form, by which the lady's father put in trust certain funds; but the trustees under the two deeds were the same, and the trust has been executed as one trust, although in one sense it really consists of two. The spouses have now gone to Canada, Mr Burton Stewart having secured a position in that country, and the reason for the petition is brought out by a letter addressed by the spouses to the trustees, in which, after stating that they intend to remain in Canada, they say this: "My wife and I find it inconvenient to have our marriage trust administered by trustees (of whom you will remember we are two) resident in England, and we would like our marriage-trust investments and affairs, as well as our own, to be attended to in Canada, where we reside." They then ask the trustees to crave the Court to appoint as new trustees "the Prudential Trust Company, Limited (of Canada), a strong trust company incorporated by special Act of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, whose head office is in Montreal," and to authorise the transfer of the trust funds to them. The Trust Company has lodged in process a document by which they consent, in the event of your Lordships granting the prayer of the petition, to bind themselves to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session "in all matters relating to the trust created by the said antenuptial contract of marriage and deed of settlement," and they have assigned the chambers of certain gentlemen, who are writers in Glasgow, as their domicile of citation.

Your Lordships remitted the petition to Mr Keith Maitland, Writer to

¹ (1875) 2 R. 923.

² (1896) 24 R. 238 and 718.

³ (1896) 24 R. 238.

Feb. 7, 1913.

Stewart's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

the Signet, and we have his report before us. He brings to your Lordships' notice the difficulties which he feels in the case, and the two difficulties are, first, the appointment of the Prudential Trust Company, Limited, as trustee; and, second, the fact that there are, as I have already said, really two trusts, one of which is English. The learned reporter cites the case of Simpson's Trustees,¹ in which the Judges of the Second Division authorised trustees in a Scotch antenuptial contract of marriage to resign, and appointed certain individuals resident in Canada to be trustees, subject to their granting an obligation to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, as is here proposed. He also points out that, so far as he knows, the Court has never yet appointed an incorporated company as trustee, although he believes that that is done in England and also in Canada.

Now, in the case of *Simpson's Trustees*¹ no opinions are given, and speaking for myself, I wish to say that I should like to reserve my opinion as to whether what was there done was within the proper power of the Court. But assuming that it was, I think the present case goes a good deal further. After all the whole idea of this Court having jurisdiction over a trust is to enable it to vindicate the interests of the beneficiaries if the necessity should arise. There are minor beneficiaries in existence here, because the spouses have children; and although one would be very anxious to do what the spouses desire, I have come clearly to be of opinion that the prayer of the petition cannot be granted. Even assuming *Simpson's Trustees*¹ to be a decision which one would repeat, I think the present application if granted would go a step further, because in that case the Court appointed individual gentlemen, who not only gave an undertaking as is proposed in this case, but who, of course, if they ever were in Scotland, could at least be made subject to the power of the Court. It seems to me that an incorporated company in Canada is absolutely beyond the power of the Court, and equally obviously it will never come to Scotland. So that, although I do not doubt the good faith of the company in executing and lodging in process the document referred to, that document is after all only worth the paper that it is written upon, and if the governing body of the company changed—as it will change in time to come—and if the successors of the present directors thought it convenient to disregard the obligation, there would be no possibility of this Court enforcing it.

To my mind that would be enough; but I think there is also an insuperable difficulty connected with this double trust. There is no question that the Court in England would have jurisdiction to inquire into the proper administration of the English settlement, and I think that the Court in England would be surprised if, upon proceeding to inquire into the conduct of the trustees, it was told that the Court in Scotland had transferred the whole trust administration to Canada. I do not think that we should be entitled to do such a thing, and thereby hamper the Court in the other part of the United Kingdom.

Upon the whole matter, although I regret not being able to comply with the view of the trustees and of the spouses, which, I have no doubt, is founded upon considerations of convenience and not upon any idea of Feb. 7, 1913. escaping from the jurisdiction of the Court, I have come to the conclusion that the petition cannot be granted.

¹ 1907 S. C. 87.

Stewart's
Trustees.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree. Even if the case of *Simpson's Trustees*¹ were given the fullest effect as an authority I should consider that this application is one that for reasons peculiar to itself could not possibly be granted. But I desire to associate myself with what your Lordship has said, and to reserve my opinion as to the course taken in Simpson's case.¹ Taking the case as it stands in the reports, I do not think that the question as now before us was fully before their Lordships of the other Division, and I think that the matter ought to be reconsidered, if such a case again comes before the Court.

The Lord President intimated that LORD DUNDAS, who was absent at advising, concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE was present in Court when the case was advised.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S., Agents:

JOHN O'NEILL, Appellant.—Sandeman, K.C.—Morton.

JOHN BROWN & COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—

A. O. M. Mackenzie, K.C.—Keith.

No. 88.

Feb. 8, 1913.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule O'Neill v.
(1) (b)—Where incapacity "results" from the injury—Refusal to undergo John Brown & surgical operation. Co., Limited.

A workman accidentally injured in the foot and thereby incapacitated, refused to undergo a simple operation which, it was reasonably certain, would have cured him. In so refusing he acted on the advice of his own doctors, who were of opinion that the proposed operation, though devoid of danger, would be useless.

In an application for review of a payment of compensation which he was receiving, held that he was precluded by his refusal from claiming a continuance of the compensation.

IN an application for review of a weekly payment under the Work-2D DIVISION.
men's Compensation Act, 1906, which was being made to John O'Neill, Sheriff of Stir-labourer, Yoker, by John Brown & Company, Limited, shipbuilders, ling, Dum-Clydebank, the Sheriff-substitute at Dumbarton (Macdiarmid) reduced barton, and the compensation to 1d. per week, and at the request of the workman Clackmannan.
stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—

"This is an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in which the respondents, by minute of review lodged on 28th August 1912, craved the Court to review and end a weekly payment of 14s. 6d. to which the appellant was entitled under an agreement entered into between appellant and respondents—a memorandum of which was recorded in the books of the Court on 16th June 1911—in respect that the appellant refused to undergo a simple operation

¹ 1907 S. C. 87.

Feb. 8, 1913.

O'Neill v.

John Brown &
Co., Limited.

which would bring his incapacity to an end, or at least greatly lessen the same.

"On 10th September 1912 the appellant lodged a note of defence in which he set forth that acting on the advice of his doctors he refused to undergo the said operation, and pleaded that in the whole circumstances his refusal was reasonable.

"On 31st October proof was led before me, when the following facts were established:—(1) That on 22nd December 1910 the appellant, who is a labourer, was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents. (2) That said accident was caused by a steel plate falling upon the appellant's left foot. (3) That as a result of his injuries the appellant was totally incapacitated. (4) That the respondents agreed to pay him compensation at the rate of 14s. 6d. per week, being 50 per cent of his average weekly earnings at the date of the accident, and that a memorandum of said agreement was recorded in the books of this Court on 16th June 1911. (5) That the appellant was still totally incapacitated and that the respondents were still paying him compensation at the aforesaid rate. (6) That as a result of the said accident it was found necessary to have the second and third toes of the appellant's left foot partially amputated, and that this was done in the Western Infirmary, Glasgow, in January 1911. (7) That the mutilated stumps of the said second and third toes were tightly wedged in a scar of rigid unhealthy skin binding the first and third toes together, with the result that the appellant was unable to use the said foot without pain. (8) That the appellant complained of pain both in the toes and in the arch of the foot. (9) That there was no objective sign of injury localised in the arch of the foot. (10) That the condition of the said toes was in itself sufficient to account for any pain the appellant felt in the arch of the foot. (11) That the appellant had been examined by three duly qualified medical men on behalf of the respondents. (12) That they advise that the removal of the said stumps would cure the pain in the foot and restore to the appellant his former wage-earning capacity. (13) That it was admitted by all the medical men in the case that the operation was an exceedingly simple one, and attended by no appreciable risk or danger to an ordinary healthy person. (14) That the appellant was well and strong and would have been willing to undergo the said operation but for the advice of his doctors. (15) That the appellant had on his own behalf been examined by two duly qualified medical men, who advised him not to undergo the said operation as it would not lessen his incapacity in any way. (16) That it was reasonably certain that were the appellant to undergo the said operation the pain in his foot would be removed and his former wage-earning capacity restored to him.

"On these facts I found that the appellant's present incapacity was fairly to be ascribed to his refusal to undergo the proposed operation, and that he was not entitled so to refuse. I therefore (on the suggestion of the agent for the respondents), in order to keep matters open, reduced the compensation payable by the respondents to the appellant to 1d. per week, and found no expenses due to or by either party."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether the appellant by his refusal to undergo the said operation is precluded from insisting on payment of compensation in terms of the aforesaid memorandum of agreement?"

The case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 7th and 8th February 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The arbitrator had misdirected himself. He had considered the question to be whether the operation would cure the injury, and because, on the evidence, he thought it would do so, he had penalised the workman for refusing to undergo it. This was an erroneous view of the law. The true question was whether the workman's refusal was unreasonable or not. In the present case it was not unreasonable. The man had in good faith followed the advice of his own doctors, and no man who did that could be held to have acted unreasonably.¹ The cases where there was no division of medical opinion fell into a different category.²

Argued for the respondents;—The general rule was that when the continuance of incapacity was due to refusal to undergo proper treatment, the compensation fell to be ended.³ If, as in the cases of *Sweeney*⁴ and *Tutton*⁵ cited for the appellant, the operation involved risk to life or would entail extraordinary suffering, then the workman would be justified in refusing to submit to it. But no such case could be suggested here. The only excuse alleged was the advice of the workman's doctors, who were sceptical as to the usefulness of the operation, though they agreed that it would do no harm. It could not be stated as a general proposition that no man acted unreasonably who followed the advice of his doctor, for his doctor might give him unreasonable advice, and the paradox would follow that the man would be acting reasonably in doing an unreasonable thing. In all the circumstances, the arbitrator had come to a right conclusion.

LORD DUNDAS.—In this case the employers asked the Court to end a weekly payment of 14s. 6d., to which the appellant was entitled under an agreement of which a memorandum was recorded, in respect that the appellant has, they allege, refused to undergo a simple operation which would bring his incapacity to an end, or, at least, greatly lessen it. The defence, expressed in a note lodged by the appellant, was that, acting on the advice of his doctors, he refused to undergo the operation, and he pleaded that in the whole circumstances his refusal was reasonable.

The material facts are few and simple. On 22nd December 1910 the appellant was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents. The injury was to his left foot, and he was totally incapacitated. An agreed-on rate of compensation was thereafter paid and has been continued. As a result of the accident the appellant had to have the second and third toes partially amputated, and that was done in January 1911. It is found that he was examined by three duly qualified medical men on behalf of the respondents, and they advised that the removal of the stumps would cure the pain which still continued and restore ¹ Sweeney v. Pumpherston Oil Co., Limited, (1903) 5 F. 972; Tutton v. Owners of s.s. "Majestic," [1909] 2 K. B. 54; Paddington Borough Council v. Stack, (1909) 2 Butterworth's W. C. C. 402.

² Donnelly v. Baird & Co., Limited, 1908 S. C. 536, per Lord Ardwall and Lord Dundas, at p. 544.

³ Donnelly v. Baird & Co., Limited, 1908 S. C. 536; Warncken v. R. Moreland & Son, Limited, [1909] 1 K. B. 184.

⁴ 5 F. 972.

⁵ [1909] 2 K. B. 54.

Feb. 8, 1913. to the appellant his former wage-earning capacity. The 13th finding is very important: "That it was admitted by all the medical men," that is to say, O'Neill v. John Brown & Co., Limited. the medical men on both sides, "that the operation was an exceedingly simple one and attended by no appreciable risk or danger to an ordinary healthy person." Lord Dundas. It is further found that the appellant was well and strong, and would have been willing to undergo the operation but for the advice of his doctors, and that the appellant had on his own behalf been examined by two duly qualified medical men who advised him not to undergo the operation as it would not lessen his incapacity in any way. I pause for a moment to point out that the ground apparently upon which these two medical men were against the operation had nothing to do with the risk or pain involved, because they were of the body of medical men referred to who agreed that the operation was an exceedingly simple one, with no appreciable risk or danger, but their view was that it would not be of any use. It appears, therefore, that, even if the operation failed to do good, it could scarcely, on these facts, do harm; the status quo would be maintained. The Sheriff-substitute goes on to find: "(16) That it was reasonably certain that were the appellant to undergo the said operation the pain in his foot would be removed and his former wage-earning capacity restored to him." I take that to be a pronouncement by the Sheriff-substitute upon the proof led, amounting to as confident a pronouncement as any Judge could safely make upon medical testimony before him. The arbitrator's conclusion upon these facts is this—he finds that the incapacity was fairly to be ascribed to the appellant's refusal to undergo the proposed operation, and that he was not entitled so to refuse. Therefore, on the suggestion of the respondents' agent, in order to keep the matter open, he reduced the compensation to the traditional penny. We are now asked to decide whether the appellant by his refusal to undergo the operation is precluded from insisting on payment of compensation in terms of the aforesaid memorandum of agreement.

The problem therefore comes to be, is the appellant's refusal to undergo this operation an unreasonable one? or, it might be put, is the appellant's incapacity really owing to his original accident, or to an unreasonable refusal on his part to undergo the operation? Obviously, I think, all cases of this sort fall to be determined upon their circumstances—each one upon its own individual circumstances—and, indeed, the necessary introduction of the word "reasonable" seems to make that very clear, because a refusal may be perfectly reasonable in one set of circumstances, and perfectly unreasonable in another set of circumstances.

The case of *Sweeney*¹ was, I think, a very peculiar one, and depended upon its own very peculiar circumstances, which were not at all like those here before us. It is enough to point out by way of distinction that the operation there in question is described as "an important minor operation," and further, that the eminent Professor, whose opinion carried weight with the Court, seems to have thought that the man was mending, and might have recovered without any operation at all. Then the case of *Tutton*² was referred to. That was a case where it is clear that the operation would have involved a very grave amount of risk to the patient, because, according to the evidence, which the Court believed, of his own doctor, he had to face either Feb. 8, 1913. a very serious operation without an anæsthetic, or a very grave risk of suc- O'Neill v. cumbing under the influence of an anæsthetic. He was suffering from Bright's John Brown & disease. I have no difficulty at all in agreeing with the good sense of Co., Limited. the decision of the learned English Judges in Tutton's case.¹ It seems to Lord Dundas. me to throw very little light on the problem before us on the facts, but I must say I do not think it bears out the proposition asserted by Mr Sandeman and his learned junior, to the effect that, if a man in bona fide refuses to undergo an operation upon the advice of a qualified medical practitioner, that must be taken as a complete answer to any suggestion that he is unreasonable in refusing to undergo it. I do not think that the cases, of which there are a good many, at all support the view that a mere difference of medical opinion upon a question of this sort can be held to import that the refusal to undergo an operation is reasonable. It seems to me that, if any such doctrine were to be laid down, this part of the Act would really become a dead letter, because in the wide world of medicine I should think that it would almost always be possible to obtain a perfectly genuine, though eccentric, opinion from some qualified medical man to any effect, within limits, that might be desired.

¹ 5 F. 972.

² [1909] 2 K. B. 54.

I have made these general observations because of the arguments that were submitted to us. But on the facts of this case I confess I have no doubt that we ought not to interfere with the decision of the learned arbitrator. We must remember that all the medical men agreed—so that there can be no question about it—that there was no appreciable risk or danger about this operation; and that the man is a strong and healthy man, and would have been quite willing to undergo it except for the advice of the two medical men who advised the contrary. As I said before, their advice to the contrary was not owing to any risk or danger, but merely because they took the more pessimistic view that no good was likely to come of the operation; although, as I have said, no material harm could come of it at the very worst. Then we have the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, sitting as a Judge upon all the views that he had before him, which affirms in as strong language as he could safely use, the reasonable certainty that, as the result of the operation, the man's wage-earning capacity would be restored.

If one considers the combined effect of these facts I cannot say that I think the conclusion which the learned arbitrator came to—that the appellant's present incapacity was fairly to be ascribed to his refusal to undergo the operation, and that he was not entitled so to refuse, that is to say that the refusal was unreasonable,—is one which we are entitled to disturb. Indeed, if it were necessary to do so, I should be prepared to say that I think the arbitrator's decision was quite right. I am for answering the question put to us in the affirmative.

LORD SALVESEN.—I concur. It must always be a question of the circumstances disclosed in the evidence whether a man who refuses to submit to an operation has acted reasonably in so refusing. The appellant contends that it is enough to demonstrate the reasonableness of his course, that he

¹ [1909] 2 K. B. 54.

Feb. 8, 1913. has acted in accordance with the advice of one or more medical men, who O'Neill v. have examined him, and who have come to the conclusion (as the two John Brown & medical men who examined the appellant on his behalf did) that the opera-Co., Limited. tion suggested would not lessen his incapacity. If that were the law the Lord Salvesen. duty of an arbitrator would be a very simple one. He would only require to find in fact that one or more medical men, who had examined the workman on his own behalf, had advised that an operation should not be undergone, and, therefore, to find in law that the refusal to undergo the operation was not unreasonable. I should be very slow to affirm that as a general proposition.

If we do not take that view, then the circumstances here amply support the conclusion at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived, because his last finding in fact is that it was reasonably certain that were the appellant to undergo the said operation the pain in his foot would be removed and his former wage-earning capacity restored to him. I cannot, as a matter of common sense, come to any other conclusion than that a man acts unreasonably, who, in view of the reasonable certainty of the operation curing him, and of the fact that it is a simple one unattended by risk or serious suffering, declines to submit to that operation. Accordingly, I am of opinion not merely that there was evidence to support the conclusion at which the learned Sheriff-substitute arrived, but also that it was the right conclusion.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. I think this is a case where it is perhaps unfortunate that the learned arbitrator did not sit with a medical assessor. No doubt had the question been anticipated that would have been arranged; but we have the arbitrator's decision, if not strictly speaking his finding, to the effect that by the proposed operation two things would result—the pain in the appellant's foot would be removed and his former wage-earning capacity restored to him. I assume that the only possible cure of this man's foot is by the proposed operation.

Now the cases show that that is not conclusive. You may have all the doctors agreeing in the view that an operation would effect a cure, but there are certainly two exceptional cases in either of which the workman's refusal to undergo the operation, which would effect the cure, is held not to be unreasonable. In the first place, if a medical man, on his behalf, thinks, as apparently in *Sweeney's case*¹ Professor Annandale did, that a cure could be effected without an operation, then, the refusal to undergo the operation might not be unreasonable. In the second place, as appears from Tutton's case,² if the cure can only be effected at the cost of substantial risk or substantial suffering, then again, the workman's refusal is not considered unreasonable.

Here we have neither of these elements. Nobody says that there is any other way of restoring this man from total incapacity to complete recovery except by operation; and all the medical men agree that there is neither substantial risk nor prospect of substantial suffering. It seems to me that in ordinary life the appellant would be considered unreasonable by reasonable people; and, accordingly, the arbitrator's finding is justified when he says that the appellant's present incapacity was fairly to be ascribed to his Feb. 8, 1913. refusal to undergo the proposed operation, and that he was not entitled so to refuse.

¹ 5 F. 972.

² [1909] 2 K. B. 54.

O'Neill v.
John Brown &
Co., Limited.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

HUME M'GREGOR & Co., S.S.C.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

CHARLES KENNEDY, Appellant.—Crabb Watt, K.C.—J. A. Christie. No. 89.

WILLIAM DIXON, LIMITED, Respondents.—Horne, K.C.—Strain. Feb. 18, 1913.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (15)—Medical referee—Ambiguous report—Competency of arbitrator sending report back to medical referee for explanation. Kennedy v. William Dixon, Limited.

The report of a medical referee, to whom a remit has been made under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (15), may competently be sent back to him by the arbitrator for explanation, if it is ambiguous or unintelligible.

IN an application for review of a weekly payment under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which was being made to Charles Kennedy, miner, Wishaw, by William Dixon, Limited, coalmasters, Holytown, the Sheriff-substitute at Hamilton (Shennan) ended the compensation, and at the request of the workman stated a case for appeal.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The case set forth:—

"I heard parties on the 29th November 1912, when the following facts were admitted:—(1) The appellant, on or about 22nd December 1911, received injury to his right eye in the course of his employment as a miner with the respondents at their Carfin Colliery. . . . (3) Parties lodged a joint minute upon 9th November 1912 in the following terms:—'In respect that the said Charles Kennedy, on or about 22nd December 1911, received an injury to his right eye while in the course of his employment with the defenders at their Carfin Colliery, and by agreement between the parties was paid compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and in respect the defenders now aver pursuer has so far recovered from his injury as to be fit for light work, which contention pursuer denies, and the parties being at variance and no agreement being likely to be arrived at: Therefore the said Charles Kennedy and the said William Dixon, Limited, crave the Court, in terms of section 15 of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,* to refer the matter to the medical referee, being an eye specialist, including in such refer-

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule, enacts:—" (15) . . . In the event of no agreement being come to between the employer and the workman as to the workman's condition or fitness for employment, the [Sheriff-clerk], on application being made to the Court by both parties, may, on payment by the applicants of such fee not exceeding one pound as may be prescribed, refer the matter to a medical referee.

"The medical referee to whom the matter is so referred shall, in accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of State, give a certificate as to the condition of the workman and his fitness for employment, specifying, where necessary, the kind of employment for which he is fit, and that certificate shall be conclusive evidence as to the matter so certified. . . ."

Feb. 18, 1913.

Kennedy v.
William
Dixon,
Limited.

ence the question whether any incapacity from which the said Charles Kennedy may now suffer is due to said accident.' (4) The reference was sent by the Sheriff-clerk on 12th November 1912 to Dr Freeland Fergus, Glasgow, being a medical referee under said Act, who reported on 18th November 1912 as follows:—'I hereby certify as follows:— 1. The said Charles Kennedy is now recovered from a serious injury to the right eye which has completely and permanently deprived him of the use of the eye. The injured organ is now quite quiet, and there is no pain even on deep pressure, and his condition is such that he is fit for any work which can be done on the surface by a man with one eye. 2. The incapacity of the said Charles Kennedy is not now due to the accident, although it has been so probably till now. There is a distinct colour scotoma present which I believe is due to his use of strong tobacco.'

"I was of opinion that, this being a reference by agreement under Schedule I. (15) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the second answer by the medical referee was conclusive on the question of the cause of the appellant's existing incapacity, and that I was bound to end the appellant's compensation. While my impression from reading the combined findings was that possibly the medical referee intended by the second answer merely to find that the physiological effects of the accident had ceased and determined, I was of opinion that, looking to the absolute terms of the second finding, I was not entitled to submit it to construction. Further, I was of opinion that in the case of such a reference I had no power to send the report back to the medical referee for explanation. Accordingly, on 5th December 1912, I ended the compensation as from 18th November 1912."

In addition to two questions, with which this report is not concerned, the following question was stated for the opinion of the Court:—"(3) Had I power to send the report back to the medical referee for explanation?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 18th February 1913.

LORD DUNDAS.—[After dealing with questions (1) and (2)]—I should like to add a single word—though it is not necessary to do so, looking to the way in which the case is to be disposed of—in regard to the third question put to us. The learned arbitrator expresses the opinion that in the case of a reference like this he had no power to send the report back to the medical referee for explanation. I do not agree with that view. Where the report of a referee is unintelligible to the arbitrator, or ambiguous or open to construction, I can see nothing to prevent him sending back the report for an explanation as to its meaning.

LORD SALVESSEN.— . . . I entirely agree with what Lord Dundas has said, and I think it is quite necessary that we should express our opinion because of the view which the Sheriff-substitute has taken. I cannot lend any countenance to the view that when there is a living man who has given a report and there seems to be great difficulty in getting at his meaning, one should be compelled to solve that difficulty on a construction of the language he has used, when the readiest method of getting at his meaning is to ask the man himself. I therefore disagree with the learned Sheriff in holding that his hands are tied by the statute, or by any other consideration, from asking the medical referee what he meant if there is an obvious ambiguity in his report.

Feb. 18, 1913.
Kennedy v.
William
Dixon,
Limited.

LORD GUTHRIE.— . . . I agree also in the view expressed by Lord Dundas and by Lord Salvesen that the Sheriff was wrong in thinking that, the medical referee's findings being ambiguous, he was not entitled to send them back to ascertain exactly what was meant.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT answered the third question of law in the affirmative.

ST CLAIR SWANSON & MANSON, W.S.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

THE BRITISH ASSETS TRUST, LIMITED, Petitioners.—Lord Kinross. No. 90.

Company—Reorganisation of share capital—Process—Petition—Advertisement—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 69), sec. 45. Feb. 19, 1913.

In a petition, under sec. 45 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, for confirmation by the Court of special resolutions passed by a limited company for reorganisation of its share capital, the Court ordered intimation of the petition without advertisement.

British Assets
Trust,
Limited.

ON 18th February 1913 the British Assets Trust, Limited, Edinburgh, presented a petition to the Court for an order, in terms of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908,¹ section 45, confirming certain special resolutions of the Company reorganising its share capital by dividing it into shares of different classes. In the prayer of the petition the petitioners craved the Court "to appoint this petition to be intimated on the walls and in the minute-book in common form, and to allow all persons having interest to lodge answers hereto, if so advised, within eight days after such intimation, or to grant such other order for service or intimation as to your Lordships may seem expedient. . . ."

When the case appeared in the Single Bills of the First Division on 19th February 1913, counsel for the petitioners cited In re Ashanti Development, Limited,² and the recent case of Munro & Company, Limited,³ in the Second Division, and submitted that, the matter being merely a domestic one and not affecting the creditors of the company, intimation on the walls and in the minute-book was sufficient, and that advertisement of the petition was not required.

THE COURT (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie), without delivering opinions, ordered intimation, without advertisement, as craved.

GUILD & SHEPHERD, W.S., Agents.

¹ 8 Edw. VII. cap. 69.

² 1911 W. N. 144.

³ Supra, p. 456.

No. 91. JAMES SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Moncrieff, K.C.—Wilton.

Feb. 21, 1913. THE FIFE COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—Horne, K.C.—Strain.

Smith v. Fife Coal Co., Limited. Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Breach of rule—Miner doing shot-firer's work contrary to rule.

The use of explosives in a mine was regulated by statutory rules, which provided that every charge should be fired by a specially appointed shot-firer, and that, where the firing was done by electricity, it was the duty of the shot-firer himself to connect the charge with the cable, and thereafter to connect the cable with the firing apparatus, after seeing that all persons in the vicinity had taken shelter.

A duly appointed shot-firer was in the habit of getting the miners to connect the charges with the cable, and on one occasion he handed the cable to a miner for the purpose of having it so connected, and, without waiting till this had been done and without ascertaining that all persons in the vicinity had taken shelter, coupled the cable to the firing apparatus. He then fired the shot, and the miner, who had attached the cable to the charge and had not had time to retire to a place of safety, was seriously and permanently disabled by the explosion.

Held that the accident to the miner would not have happened but for his undertaking a duty which he was neither engaged nor entitled to perform, and accordingly that it did not arise out of and in the course of his employment.

2D DIVISION. IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline between James Smith, miner, Kelty, and the Fife Coal Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (Umpferston) awarded compensation, and at the request of the employers stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—

"1. The respondent was a miner in Benarty Pit which belongs to the appellants, and the Explosives in Coal Mines Order of 21st February 1910, made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, under section 6 of the Coal Mines Act, 1896, applied to the pit at the date of the accident aftermentioned, and was duly posted at the pit-head. Said Order provides, inter alia, as follows:—(a) Every charge shall be fired by a competent person (hereinafter called the shot-firer) appointed in writing for this duty by the owner, agent, or manager of the mine, and not being a person whose wages depend on the amount of mineral to be gotten. (b) Every charge of the explosive shall be placed in a properly drilled shot hole, and shall have sufficient stemming, and each such charge shall consist of a cartridge or cartridges of not more than one description of explosive. . . . (d) No charge shall be fired except by means of an efficient electrical apparatus so enclosed as to afford reasonable security against the ignition of inflammable gas, or by a permitted igniter-fuse, as hereinafter defined. (e) Where the charge is fired by an electrical apparatus the shot-firer shall not use a cable for the purpose which is less than 20 yards in length. He shall himself couple up the cable to the charge, and shall do so before coupling the cable to the firing apparatus. He shall also himself couple the cable to the firing apparatus. Before doing so, he shall see that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter. Should the charge miss fire, he shall immediately disconnect the cable from the firing apparatus. . . .

"In terms of section 2 (a) of said Order the appellants had duly appointed a man called Robert Howard to act as one of the shot-firers in the section in which pursuer worked, and at the time of the said accident Howard was so acting. The pursuer was not authorised to act as shot-firer. The shots in this pit were fired by the shot-firers by means of an electrical apparatus.

Feb. 21, 1913.
Smith v. Fife
Coal Co.,
Limited.

"2. The method of firing a shot is (1) to place the detonator in the hole prepared by the miner, and to stem it; (2) to connect the detonator wire to the cable; (3) to connect the cable to the electric battery; and (4) to turn the handle on the battery. The placing of the detonator in the hole and stemming of the charge are always done by the miner, not by the shot-firer. The rest of the operation is, under the Explosives in Coal Mines Order above mentioned, the duty of the shot-firer. It was part of the respondent's duty to bore a hole for each shot and to charge the shot hole and stem the shot, and under section 2 (c) of said Order it is the duty of the shot-firer to couple up the cable (which conveys the electric current) to the charge, and to do this before coupling the said cable to the firing apparatus. It is also his duty to himself couple the cable to the firing apparatus, and before doing so to see that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter.

"3. Three or four days after the respondent commenced work in the section, Howard showed the respondent how to connect the detonator wire (which is a short wire running down the middle of the shot and projecting a short distance beyond the shot hole) to the cable, and asked him to do this part of the work. From that time until the date of the accident the respondent was in the habit of making this connection after the charge was stemmed, and this practice was common, but not universal, among the miners in that section during Howard's shift, although no such practice was proved so far as the other shot-firers in the pit were concerned, and the practice was unknown to the management. The rest of the work was done by the shot-firer. The shot-firer was, in virtue of his appointment, the person in charge of the shot-firing operations, subject to the provisions of the foresaid Order and also of the Special Rules under the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1887, which were in force in said pit at the time of the accident.

"4. There was evidence to the effect that other miners had themselves fired shots in Howard's absence, but if they did, this also was unknown to the management, and respondent never fired a shot himself. The respondent was requested by Howard on one occasion to fire a shot himself, but he did not do so.

"5. On 28th June 1912 the respondent had prepared a hole for blasting (which preparation was part of his duties), and sent for Howard, who brought the detonator and firing equipment. Howard did not go forward to the face, but remained at a point about 30 feet therefrom round a corner from and out of sight of the point where the shot was. He gave the detonator and the end of the cable to the respondent and proceeded to get ready the rest of the apparatus and repair some damage which had been done to the cable. He did not ask the respondent to connect the shot with the cable, but the purpose of his giving respondent the detonator and cable was that the respondent might so connect the shot, and the respondent assumed that Howard desired him to do this.

"6. The respondent put the charge in the hole, stemmed it, then

Feb. 21, 1913. connected the wire of the shot to the cable, and was proceeding to go to a place of safety when the charge was fired by Howard, and the respondent was seriously and permanently injured, his left arm as a result having to be amputated below the elbow.

Smith v. Fife
Coal Co.,
Limited.

"7. The connecting of the detonator wire with the cable took less than a minute, and the respondent had just turned to go when the charge was fired by the shot-firer. The latter, who was at the other end of the cable about 30 feet away, heard a shout, 'Right: fire away,' which he thought came from the respondent, but it was in fact from a neighbouring miner, and was addressed to that miner's drawer, who had informed him that a shot was to be fired in their vicinity. The rapidity with which the explosion followed the connecting of the cable to the detonator wire showed that the cable had been connected to the battery before it was connected to the charge.

"8. The respondent stated that he was unaware of said order of 21st February 1910, and that if he had thought it was a breach of rule to connect the shot with the cable he would not have done it. It was proved that a miner may have duties to perform in his working-place after he has stemmed a charge, such as collecting his graith or setting a prop, although this was not the reason for the respondent being at the place.

"9. The whole work of firing a shot takes about five or six minutes. In this section nine or ten shots per day were fired on an average. On the day of the accident only three shots were fired.

"10. The respondent was entitled to be at his working-place at the moment when Howard fired the shot, and the cause of the accident was Howard's connecting the cable to the battery before the cable was connected to the charge, and before seeing that all persons in the vicinity had taken proper shelter (which act was in breach of said Explosives in Coal Mines Order), and firing the shot without ascertaining that all persons in the vicinity had taken proper shelter. The act of Howard in allowing the respondent to connect the cable to the charge was also a breach of said Order, and the respondent was not acting in the course of his employment in doing so, but this was not the cause of the accident, although the shot would not have gone off unless the cable had been connected to the charge either by the respondent or Howard.

"On the foregoing facts I found that the pursuer sustained personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the defenders and appellants, and that the respondent was entitled to compensation at the rate of 20s. per week with expenses of process."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether there was evidence upon which it could be competently found that the respondent sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on 28th June 1912?"

The case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 6th February 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—There was a vital distinction between "the doing of a thing recklessly or negligently which the workman is employed to do, and the doing of a thing altogether outside and unconnected with his employment."¹ In the first case the accident, notwithstanding the misconduct, might still arise out of the employ- Feb. 21, 1913.

¹ Barnes v. Nunnery Colliery Co., Limited, [1912] A. C. 44, per Lord Atkinson, at p. 49.

ment¹; in the second case, it could never arise out of the employment, for the man was not doing what he was employed to do.² Smith v. Fife
The only exception was the case of an emergency, which was not Coal Co., Limited.
suggested in the present case. The pursuer was a miner, and at the time of the accident he was not "doing what a man so employed may reasonably do."³ He was in breach of the rule which limited the sphere of his employment, and he was doing the work not of a miner but of a shot-firer. The pursuer's knowledge of the rule was immaterial,⁴ and in any case there was no finding in fact that he was in ignorance of it. It was equally irrelevant to argue that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the shot-firer.
Considerations which might affect a question of liability at common law had no place in a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was enough that the pursuer's act was one link in the chain of causation which led to the accident.⁵

Argued for the respondent;—The arbitrator had found that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment. This was a finding in fact which should not be disturbed unless there was no evidence to support it.⁶ This could not be said in the present instance. The foundation of the case against the pursuer was the breach of the statutory order. But that order was addressed not to him but to his employers, and they could have been held criminally liable for its infringement.⁷ In any event, disobedience to an order did not necessarily take a workman outwith the sphere of his employment.⁸ Kerr v. William Baird & Company, Limited,⁹ was distinguishable. In that case the sole cause of the accident was the workman's disobedience. In the present case the proximate cause of the accident was the fault of the shot-firer in coupling the cable to the battery before it was attached to the charge and in firing the shot without making sure that there was no person in the vicinity. If the accident could have been avoided by care on the part of the shot-firer, it was no answer to say that the pursuer also was to blame¹⁰; and the responsibility of the defenders was not thereby diminished.¹¹

¹ Conway v. Pumpherston Oil Co., Limited, [1911] S. C. 660.

² Kerr v. William Baird & Co., Limited, 1911 S. C. 701; M'Allan v. Perthshire County Council, Western District, (1906) 8 F. 783; Lowe v. Pearson, (1899) 1 Q. B. 261.

³ Moore v. Manchester Liners, Limited, [1910] A. C. 498, per Lord Chancellor Loreburn, at p. 500.

⁴ Dobson v. United Collieries, Limited, (1905) 8 F. 241.

⁵ Dunham v. Clare, [1902] 2 K. B. 292, per Collins, M.R., at p. 296.

⁶ Kane v. Merry & Cunningham, Limited, 1911 S. C. 533; MacKinnon v. Miller, 1909 S. C. 373; Barnes v. Nunnery Colliery Co., Limited, [1912] A. C. 44.

⁷ Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 50.

⁸ Conway v. Pumpherston Oil Co., Limited, 1911 S. C. 660; Harding v. The Brynddu Colliery Co., Limited, [1911] 2 K. B. 747; Mawdsley v. West Leigh Colliery Co., Limited, [1911] 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 80.

⁹ 1911 S. C. 701.

¹⁰ Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Co., (1876) 1 App. Cas. 754, per Lord Penzance, at p. 759; Watkins v. Naval Colliery Co. (1897), Limited, [1912] A. C. 693.

¹¹ Black v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, 1909 S. C. 152, rev. 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 33; Bett v. Dalmeny Oil Co., Limited, (1905) 7 F. 787.

Feb. 21, 1913. Even assuming that the pursuer was acting outwith his employment when he was attaching the cable to the charge, that operation was completed when the shot was fired and at that moment the pursuer was entitled to be at his working-place and had therefore resumed his employment.

Smith v. Fife
Coal Co.,
Limited.

At advising on 21st February 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—On 28th June 1912 the respondent, a miner in the appellants' employment, met with a serious personal injury by accident in their Benarty Pit, owing to the discharge of a blasting shot when he was in its immediate vicinity. We have to determine whether or not the accident arose out of and in the course of the respondent's employment. The learned arbitrator has decided in the affirmative. I have come to the conclusion that his decision cannot be supported.

The Explosives Order of 21st February 1910, which is partially printed in the case, applied to Benarty Pit at the date in question, and was duly posted at the pithead. [His Lordship then narrated the material terms of the Order, and the circumstances in which the accident took place.] The arbitrator finds that the cause of the accident was the shot-firer Howard's conduct in firing the shot under the circumstances mentioned in breach of the Order. He further finds that "the act of Howard in allowing the respondent to connect the cable to the charge was also a breach of said Order, and the respondent was not acting in the course of his employment in doing so, but this was not the cause of the accident, although the shot would not have gone off unless the cable had been connected to the charge either by the respondent or Howard."

I think the learned arbitrator has fallen into error in finding upon these facts that the accident arose out of and in the course of the respondent's employment. He seems to me to have approached the matter from a wrong standpoint; and to have decided it having regard to the common law rules of liability and contributory negligence, which are, I think, wholly beside this question under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

It appears to me that what we have to decide is whether or not this accident occurred in the respondent's "sphere of employment," to use a phrase common in recent cases; and that, if it did not, he cannot recover compensation under the Act. It has often been laid down that it is not every breach of a master's order that will, so to speak, put a servant outside the sphere of his employment (e.g., Whitehead,¹ approved in *Conway*²). It is clear that a master may competently prescribe the sphere of his workmen's employment, and limit it by way of restrictive orders; and the Court must in each case distinguish, upon the facts, between something done by a workman entirely outside that sphere, and something done within it, though contrary to order and even (it may be) amounting to serious and wilful misconduct. A workman does not cease to be in the course of his employment merely because he acts negligently or recklessly in the performance of his work (e.g., *Durham*³). But if he travels outside the sphere of his employment without an order, or in violation of an order, he will not recover compensation, unless indeed a case of necessity or great emergency is made out, when a reasonable extension of his duties may sometimes be inferred. If the workman, acting within the sphere of his employment, violates an order, the master may be liable in compensation; but if he arrogates to himself the functions of some other servant whose duties are different from his own (e.g., *Kerr*¹), or travels into some territory with which he has nothing to do (e.g., *O'Brien*²), the result is otherwise. One must in each case consider whether, when the accident occurred, the injured man was "doing what a man so employed may reasonably do, within a time during which he is employed, and at a place where he may reasonably be during that time to do that thing" (per Lord Loreburn, L.C., in Moore.³)

¹ [1901] 2 K. B. 48, per Collins, L.J., at p. 51.

² 1911 S. C. 660, per Lord Dunedin, at p. 665.

³ (1898) 1 F. 279.

Smith v. Fife Coal Co., Limited.
Lord Dundas.

In the present case the respondent, in coupling the charge to the cable, was directly violating the Order posted up at the pithead. The arbitrator says the respondent stated that he was unaware of it; but this is not a finding in fact of the man's ignorance, and one need not therefore decide whether such a finding would have been relevant for consideration. But the respondent was not only acting in breach of an order; he was doing something which he was never employed or paid to do, and which another person, whose position rendered him competent for the appointment, was employed and paid to do. I can see no ground for holding that the accident arose out of and in the course of the respondent's employment. I think that, upon the learned arbitrator's findings, one is constrained to the opposite conclusion.

I do not propose to deal in detail with former decisions; but there are passages in the opinions of noble and learned Lords in the recent case of *Barnes*⁴ which I think may usefully be cited. The Lord Chancellor (Loreburn) (at p. 47), after observing that "the question whether or not an injury by accident arose out of the employment is quite different from whether there has or has not been misconduct," pointed out that the Court could not deny the workman compensation "on the ground only that he was injured through breaking rules. But if the thing he does imprudently or disobediently is different in kind from anything he was required or expected to do, and also is put outside the range of his service by a genuine prohibition, then I should say that the accidental injury did not arise out of his employment." Lord Atkinson (at p. 49) emphasised the necessity of drawing a distinction "between the doing of a thing recklessly or negligently which the workman is employed to do, and the doing of a thing altogether outside and unconnected with his employment." Lord Mersey (at p. 51) pointed out that the workman, when riding in a tub against orders, "was not only violating the conditions of his employment, but was engaged in an act quite outside its scope. . . . He was not doing a permitted act carelessly, but he was doing an act which he was prohibited from doing at all." The case of *Kerr*¹ comes pretty close to the present upon its facts, involving as it did a disobedience to the Explosives Order, 1910. I think one may fairly apply to this respondent what Lord

¹ 1911 S. C. 701.

² [1910] A. C., at pp. 500, 501.

³ 1908 S. C. 1258.

⁴ [1912] A. C. 44.

Feb. 21, 1913. Dunedin said in regard to the workman in that case: "He was arrogating to himself duties which he was neither engaged, nor entitled, to perform. . . . He started upon an operation which was outside the scope of his employment."

Lord Dundas. As already observed, I think the arbitrator has gone astray by regarding the matter as if we were here in a common law action by the respondent for damages against his employers. Counsel who sought to support the award pressed upon our attention the doctrine of cases like *Radley*¹ and Carse,² to the effect that a pursuer, though himself guilty of contributory negligence, may yet recover damages if the defender could, in the result, by ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the accident. They also referred us to Black,³ David,⁴ and Watkins,⁵ which dealt with the question of an employer's liability in damages for negligence upon a breach of a statutory rule or order affecting him. I do not think either category of cases has any application here. We are not in the region of fault or negligence. We are considering, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, whether or not there was evidence to show that this accident arose out of and in the course of the respondent's employment. For the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that there was not; and I am for answering the question of law put to us in the negative.

LORD SALVESEN.—The question in this case is whether the respondent, who was employed as a miner by the appellants, sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. That he met with an accident in the course of his employment I assume, although this is by no means plain, and the sole question is whether that accident arose out of his employment. The accident consisted in the workman being struck by some material which was dislodged by a cartridge shot fired by a man called Howard, who was shot-firer in that part of the pit where the respondent worked. The shot was deliberately fired by Howard by means of an electric apparatus which had been connected with the cartridge; and but for the presence of the respondent in too close proximity the explosion was a perfectly safe and proper operation.

[After summarising the statements in the case, his Lordship continued]—It is manifest from this statement of facts that the accident to the respondent would not have happened but for his undertaking a duty which, under the regulations, was exclusively to be performed by the shot-firer. Howard's action in turning the handle of the battery would have been harmless but for the respondent's act in coupling up the cable with the detonator. It was accordingly argued by the appellants that the accident which happened to the respondent was due to his having done work that was outside the scope of his employment and prohibited by the regulations, and did not therefore arise out of his employment. It is equally true, however, that the respondent's act in coupling up the cable to the detonator would not have produced any accident but for Howard's firing the shot without having seen that all persons in the vicinity had taken shelter.

¹ 1 App. Cas. 754.

² 22 R. 475.

³ 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 33.

⁴ [1910] A. C. 74.

⁵ [1912] A. C. 693.

On these facts I have come to the conclusion, differing from the arbitra- Feb. 21, 1913.
 tor, that the accident did not arise out of the respondent's employment. It is extremely important that the statutory regulations should be enforced—not merely against the shot-firer, but against all the other persons in the Smith v. Fife pit. The respondent must be taken to have known that he was prohibited Coal Co., from connecting the detonator with the cable; and it is certain that if he Limited. had respected this prohibition the accident would not have occurred. The lax system which Howard had introduced was only possible through the respondent and the other miners conniving at Howard's breach of duty.
 Had Howard performed the work allotted to him in the order prescribed in the regulations, he would first have done any repairs that were necessary to the cable, and then proceeded to connect the cable with the detonator. If, as presumably would be the case, the respondent was then at his working place, Howard would have ordered him to take shelter, and only then proceeded to the battery and connected it with the cable. Thereafter he was at liberty to fire the shot, there being apparently no other persons who were exposed to danger at that part of the pit. Had the shot been fired just at the moment when the respondent was effecting the connection, it would scarcely be maintained that the accident was not due to his act in so connecting it; and I can see no reason for making a distinction because of the fact that the connection had been actually completed the moment before and the respondent was just on the point of proceeding to shelter. His presence there at the time was due solely to his performing a duty which was expressly laid upon the shot-firer, and which for his protection the regulations prohibited him from discharging.

The cases cited at the discussion appear to me to justify the conclusion at which I have arrived. In Kerr v. William Baird & Company, Limited,¹ the miner who was injured had no doubt taken it upon himself to prepare and fire the shot; but the explosion occurred at the precise moment that it did, not by his immediate act, but because he had already unintentionally started the chemical action of the fuse. The Lord President said: "It is quite clear that this man met his death because he started upon an operation which was outside the scope of his employment." In Barnes v. The *Nunnery Colliery Company*² a boy in the colliery met his death from riding in an empty tub to his work, instead of walking as he ought to have done.
 Boys were expressly prohibited from riding to their work. It was held that there was no evidence to justify the finding that the accident arose out of the deceased's employment; for his death was caused by an added peril to which by his own conduct he exposed himself. Lord Loreburn said: "If the thing he does imprudently or disobediently is different in kind from anything he was required or expected to do, and also is put outside the range of his service by a genuine prohibition, then I should say that the accidental injury did not arise out of his employment"; and Lord Mersey said: "He was not doing any permitted act carelessly, but he was doing an act which he was prohibited from doing at all." I think these observations apply to the present case.

The decision in the case of *M'Allan v. Perthshire County Council*³ is also

¹ 1911 S. C. 701.

² [1912] A. C. 44.

³ 8 F. 783.

Feb. 21, 1913. in point. There, as here, the workman who was injured had taken upon himself, for the purpose of obliging his fellow servant, a part of that servant's duties and was injured while doing so. We were referred by the respondent to the case of *Conway*¹; but on its facts that case is clearly distinguishable from the present. The workman no doubt was doing a prohibited thing; but it was in the course of performing his ordinary duties. The Lord President thus summed up the facts: "The man here was fetching a pick for the work on which he was engaged. Doubtless in fetching the pick he controverted an order . . . but I think that was only disobedience and nothing more, and the mere fact that he went into the upset does not take him out of the sphere of his employment." The decision in Harding v. Brynddu Colliery Company, Limited,² proceeded on the same lines, and was held to be really indistinguishable from that of Conway.¹

Smith v. Fife
Coal Co.,
Limited.

Lord Salvesen.

Certain authorities were referred to by the junior counsel for the respondent in support of a collateral contention that the employer here would be liable at common law to the injured workman. That is, however, not the question before us; and I need only say in passing that I do not think the cases cited go very far in that direction. I have accordingly come to be of opinion that the question of law falls to be answered in the negative.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The essential facts are, first, that the respondent was in the place where he was injured at the time when he was injured, because, immediately before, he had been doing work which was the proper work of another employee, and which the respondent, under the Secretary of State's Order of 21st February 1910 (duly posted at the pithead), was expressly prohibited from doing; second, that the conduct of the respondent on the occasion in question was not authorised by the management of the pit, and his practice of doing similar work to that which he had been doing immediately before the accident was unknown to the management; and, third, that no emergency had arisen, in consequence of which the respondent's disobedience to the provisions of the Secretary of State's said Order might not have prejudiced his rights under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

In these circumstances, it seems to me clear that this is not a case of accident to a workman arising out of acts done by him in the course of his duty. In such a case, on the authorities to which your Lordships have referred, the fact that such acts have been performed in disobedience to orders may not disentitle the workman to the benefits of the Act. Instead of such a case, the accident here arose out of actings outside the sphere of the workman's employment. Under the cases quoted, such actings prevent the workman from successfully maintaining that he has sustained an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment.

The Sheriff holds that while the respondent, in connecting the cable with the detonator, was not acting in the course of his employment in doing so, this was not the cause of the accident. Apparently he thinks that the respondent, having completed the operation which took him out of the course of his employment, had again resumed the course of his employment in the few seconds that elapsed before Howard turned the handle and the explosion occurred. It does not appear to me that this finding can be sustained on the facts as stated, whatever might have been the case had a considerable time elapsed between the respondent's act and the explosion.

¹ 1911 S. C. 660.

² [1911] 2 K. B. 747.

Feb. 21, 1913.
 Smith v. Fife
 Coal Co.,
 Limited.

Lord Guthrie.

But the respondent argued that if the Sheriff's ground of judgment was wrong, and if the respondent's act was the cause of the accident, the accident still arose out of and in the course of his employment, because he was entitled, as a condition of his employment, to assume that no explosive would be fired until he was out of the zone of danger. This contention seems to me inconsistent with the case of Kerr v. William Baird & Company, Limited.¹ On the whole matter, I think the question must be answered in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, recalled the award of the arbitrator, and remitted to him to dismiss the claim.

D. R. TULLO, S.S.C.—WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES ANDERSON AND OTHERS (Representing the Heritors of the Parish of Rutherglen), Petitioners.—Blackburn, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

No. 92.

Feb. 21, 1913.

THE REVEREND GEORGE SIMPSON YUILLE (Minister of the Parish of Rutherglen), Respondent.—Crabb Watt, K.C.—Hunter.

Heritors of Rutherglen.

Church—Manse—Glebe—Transportation of manse—Sale of old site—Presumption that manse built on manse ground and not on glebe.

A petition was presented by the heritors of a burghal landward parish for transportation of the manse to a new site, and for authority to sell the old site. The latter part of the prayer was opposed by the minister, who maintained that, as the manse had occupied the site for many years before the right of a parish minister to half an acre of ground, over and above his glebe, as a site for his manse was recognised, the presumption was that the manse must have been built upon glebe, and accordingly that its site remained glebe land and could not be sold by the heritors.

Held that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed that the ground on which the manse stood was dedicated as manse ground, and as such was something other than glebe; and prayer of the petition granted.

ON 26th October 1912 the members of the Superintending Committee of the heritors of the parish of Rutherglen presented a petition for the transportation of the manse of that parish and for authority, on the completion of the new manse, to sell the site of the old manse and offices and garden, and to apply the funds pro tanto towards the expense of buying the new site and garden, and of erecting the new manse and offices.

It was stated in the petition:—"The present manse of the parish of Rutherglen, offices and garden, containing 2958½ square yards or thereby, have been the manse, offices, and garden for the minister of the parish of Rutherglen for several hundreds of years. The glebe, Teind Court.

¹ 1911 S. C. 701.

Feb. 21, 1913. Heritors of Rutherglen. arable and grass, of Rutherglen consists of—(1) a piece of ground situated beside Rutherglen Burn at some distance from the manse, and extending to 4 acres 2 roods or thereby, and (2) another piece of ground lying in the immediate vicinity of the manse, and extending to 1 acre 1 rood or thereby.”

It was further stated that the heritors had resolved that the existing manse and its site were unsuitable for a minister's residence, and the steps were detailed by which the heritors had resolved to acquire a new site and to erect a new manse thereon. It was narrated, inter alia, that in an appeal to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds (Ormidale) from a decision of the Sheriff in an application under the Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Act, 1868, the Lord Ordinary, on 19th July 1912, in respect of a joint minute for the minister and the heritors, pronounced an interlocutor designing and setting apart a certain site for the new manse and garden, and approving of certain plans, which had been prepared and approved by the minister for its construction.

Answers to the petition for transportation and sale were lodged for the Rev. George Simpson Yuille, B.D., the minister, in which it was stated :—

“ The glebe of the parish of Rutherglen, together with the minister's grass consists of (1) a piece of ground which lies on the west side of the Rutherglen Burn at some distance from the manse and extends to 4 acres 2 roods or thereby ; (2) a piece of ground on the east side of the said burn which extends to 1 acre 1 rood or thereby ; and (3) a piece of ground which extends to 2 roods 17 poles 24 $\frac{3}{4}$ square yards or thereby, and is contiguous to the piece of ground second above mentioned.

“ The manse of the parish of Rutherglen, with its offices and garden, is situated on, and completely covers, the piece of ground third above mentioned. The description of this piece of ground contained in the petition is accurate. It is admitted that the said manse has occupied its present site for a long period. The said site was occupied by the said manse many years before the right of a parish minister to half an acre of ground over and above his glebe as a site for his manse came into existence. In any event, the said site was so occupied long before the said right was recognised. Further, Rutherglen is, and has been for several centuries, a royal burgh. The right of the minister of a royal burgh, which, like Rutherglen, is partly landward, to a manse, was not decided till the beginning of the nineteenth century. In a number of cases during the eighteenth century the Court rejected claims to manses by ministers of royal burghs in this position. The right of the minister of any royal burgh, whether partly landward or not, to half an acre of ground over and above his glebe as the site for his manse, could not therefore have been recognised prior to the beginning of the eighteenth century. The manse of the parish of Rutherglen, in accordance with the views prevailing at the time it was built, was erected upon the glebe, and the site it now occupies is part of the said glebe. . . .

“ The respondent does not oppose the prayer of the petition in so far as it [craves for transportation and erection of the new manse]. The respondent, however, submits that the prayer of the petition, with the exception of the craves above mentioned, should be refused, with expenses, in respect (1) that the petitioners' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support said prayer ; (2) that the ownership of the present site of the said manse, offices, and garden is in dispute, and that it is incompetent to try that question in this process; and (3) that in any event the said present site is part of the glebe of the parish of Rutherglen, and does not therefore belong to the heritors, or any of them. Feb. 21, 1913.

Heritors of Rutherglen.

"Alternatively, the prayer of the petition should be granted to the extent only of the craves above mentioned, and quoad ultra the petition should be sisted that the petitioners may, if so advised, bring an action of declarator to establish their right to the said present site."

Counsel for the parties were heard before the Teind Court (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, Lord Mackenzie, Lord Ormisdale, and Lord Hunter) on 24th January 1913.

Argued for the petitioners;—It must be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that this manse was in the ordinary position of a manse, and was built on manse ground; and indeed there was no relevant averment to the contrary. The right of the minister of a burghal landward parish to a manse was now clearly established, and there was no suggestion either in the statutes regulating this right,¹ or in the decided cases,² that the ground for the manse should be, or was ever as a matter of practice, taken from the glebe. It was suggested that, as this manse had been erected long before the right of the minister of a burghal landward parish to a manse was finally established, it had presumably been built by the minister himself, and accordingly built on the only land available to him, namely, the glebe. But there was no presumption to this effect; and that such was not the case here was emphasised by the fact that Rutherglen had been cited as a typical instance of a manse for which the heritors were responsible,³ and for which they continued to admit responsibility.⁴ As to the extent of the glebe, whatever was its present acreage, it appeared that 2 acres had been added to it in 1667, bringing its total area as at that date up to 5 acres, and this measurement did not include the manse, which then occupied its present site.⁵ Even assuming that the manse was built upon the glebe the site had now become manse ground, and could not revert to glebe until it had been re-designated by the Court. If the glebe was too small the minister's remedy was to apply to the Court to have an additional designation.⁶ The respondent's alternative contention that the petitioners should establish their right in an action of declarator was not well founded. The whole questions raised in this petition could competently be decided in the Teind Court, as the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, sitting as the Teind Court, was in no way restricted, but included the original jurisdiction of the Court of Session in civil causes.⁷

Argued for the respondent;—If, as the respondent contended, the ¹ Acts 1644, cap. 31, 1649, cap. 45, and 1663, cap. 21; Duncan's Parochial Law, (1903 edition) pp. 362-363, and 366-371.

² Minister and Heritors of Dunfermline, (1805) M. "Manse," Appx. 1, aff'd. (1812) 5 Pat. 593; Magistrates of Ayr v. Auld, (1825) 4 S. 99, rev. (1827) 2 W. & S. 600.

³ Connell's Parochial Law, p. 261.

⁴ Fairie v. Leitch, F. C., Feb. 2, 1813.

⁵ New Statistical Account, vol. vi. p. 395.

⁶ Gloag, (1873) 1 R. 187.

⁷ Presbytery of Stirling v. Heritors of Larbert and Dunipace, (1900) 2 F. 562; Connell's Parochial Law, p. 229.

Feb. 21, 1913.

Heritors of Rutherglen.

manse was built on glebe, the site, when the manse was transported, must revert to glebe, and could not be disposed of by the heritors in this process. There was a strong presumption in the circumstances that the manse here had been built upon the glebe. It was admitted that the manse occupied its present site before 1778, at which date the right of the minister to an extra half acre for manse site was first recognised.¹ The measurements stated in the petition showed that the combined areas of the existing glebe and manse site did not amount to the acreage to which the minister was in law entitled as glebe and minister's grass. The inference, therefore, was that the manse had been built upon part of the glebe. It was not disputed that the Court of Teinds had jurisdiction to decide the question which was here raised,² but it could not competently be disposed of in a summary petition. The question must be settled in an action of declarator or some other competent process.

At advising on 21st February 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition for the transportation of the manse of the parish of Rutherglen and for authority to sell the old manse. The only point that is raised before your Lordships is raised by the minister upon the last branch of the crave, namely, that for authority to sell the old manse. It has been argued to your Lordships that it must be presumed that the existing manse is built upon the glebe and that, if that is so, it would be improper that the site of the manse should be sold, but that it should remain part of the glebe.

I do not think that that argument can be sustained, because it is really based upon nothing but mere speculation. The parties have supplied us with all that they know about the history of the manse ; and all that we know is that it is an old manse—what was its origin no one can tell. Now it may be that the manse has come down from pre-Reformation times, it may be that it was originally erected in terms of the various statutes which gave ministers a right to call upon heritors for a manse ; but where nothing is known of the origin of the manse it must be presumed that the ground on which the manse stands is dedicated as manse ground, and that as manse ground it is something other than glebe.

Where in modern times a manse has to be rebuilt, and it is more convenient that the new manse should be built upon the glebe, and where, with the consent of those representing the benefice, it is built upon the glebe, then I can understand that, inasmuch as so much glebe has been taken up by the new manse, it would only be equitable that the ground cleared by taking away the old manse should be given to the glebe. But where you merely find a manse standing, and know nothing about its past history, then I take it that the ground on which the manse stands is manse ground, and separate from the glebe ground. Inasmuch as the heritors here have found a new site, it is only right and just that they should be allowed to dispose of the old one. They were not bound to find a new site for the manse ; they might have rebuilt it upon the old site. But in the circumstances of this case it was thought expedient to build the manse elsewhere. The heritors Feb. 21, 1913. have had to find a site elsewhere, and have, with the consent of all parties, Heritors of built the new manse upon it. I think they are entitled to the site that has Rutherglen. been rendered free.

¹ Grierson v. Ewart, (1778) 2 Hailes, 799 ; Clark v. Ramsay, (1621) M. 5144 ; Kerse v. Reid, (1626) M. 5132.

² Presbytery of Stirling v. Heritors of Larbert and Dunipace, 2 F. 562.

Ld. President.

That, I think, is obviously the view which the Court held in the case of Gloag.¹ The report of that case bears² that "The Court were doubtful whether authority could be granted to feu the site of the old manse, offices, and garden, without a designation thereof as glebe." That clearly points to the opinion held by the Court that manse ground was one thing and that glebe was another.

Accordingly, upon the whole matter, I think that the crave of the petition as lodged is correct and ought to be granted. I may say that, if one had to guess, I think it is very likely that this never was glebe ground at all, because it seems to be upon the other side of the water from the glebe. But I do not go upon that, because that also is mere speculation. I go upon the simple point that if one knows nothing about the origin of the manse, manse ground is manse ground and not glebe ground.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree with your Lordship. I think it is quite clear that, where nothing is known or can be ascertained as to the history of the site of a manse, it must be presumed that the ground of that site, wherever it came from, was dedicated to the purposes of a manse, and must be dealt with as such in any case, such as we have before us, where it is desired to transport the manse from one site to another.

LORD MACKENZIE, LORD ORMDALE, and LORD HUNTER concurred.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—LAING & MOTHERWELL, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM THOMAS MACKIE, Pursuer.—A. M. Stuart.

DUNCAN DAVIDSON, Defender.—Lippe.

No. 93.

Feb. 25, 1913.

Process—Removal to Court of Session for jury trial—Refusal to remit back to Sheriff—Averments of substantial damage—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 30. Mackie v. Davidson.

A Sheriff Court action for £300 as damages for injury to the pursuer's person and property having been remitted to the Court of Session under sec. 30 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, the Court refused to exercise the power given by that section of remitting the case back to the Sheriff, as the record disclosed that the alleged injuries were of a serious nature, and that the pursuer's claim was substantial.

Barclay v. Smith & Co., supra, p. 473, distinguished.

ON 18th November 1912 William Thomas Mackie, commercial traveller, Aberdeen, brought an action in the Sheriff Court there against Duncan Davidson, Banchory. The pursuer's claim was for £300 as damages for injuries to his person, motor cycle, and clothes, caused, on 5th October 1912, by the defender's motor car running him down while he was cycling along a public highway. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

¹ (1873) 1 R. 187.

² Ibid., at p. 188.

Feb. 25, 1913.

Mackie v.
Davidson.

The pursuer averred, inter alia :—(Cond. 4) "As the result of the pursuer being run down as aforesaid he sustained severe injury, and his motor cycle, of the value of £40, was completely destroyed and his clothing ruined. He was knocked insensible, and did not recover consciousness until after he had been conveyed to the Aberdeen Royal Infirmary. The front of the motor car struck him a severe blow on the head, causing a wound of several inches in length. He was thrown to the ground with great violence and sustained numerous bruises on the arms, legs, and body. The wound on his forehead will leave a large permanent disfigurement. The result of the said accident will probably leave a permanent defect upon his nervous system. He still suffers from violent nervous headaches due to the injury to his head as aforesaid. He has not yet recovered from the injuries he received." (Cond. 6) "Pursuer has suffered severe nervous shock. In the course of his work as a commercial traveller he has to be continually calling at farms scattered over a wide area, and also to make journeys through the crowded streets of towns. It is necessary to enable him to overtake his work to use a motor cycle and to be able to ride it through traffic. The result of the said accident and shock sustained by pursuer is that he will be unable for a long time to ride a motor cycle, and it is doubtful if he will ever be able to ride it where there is any traffic, and he will thus be seriously handicapped in carrying on his business." (Cond. 7) "For the loss of the cycle, damage to clothing, expenses of medical attendance, loss of commissions, additional travelling expenses caused through being unable to use a motor cycle, and physical injuries above mentioned, the sum sued for is reasonable in amount."

The case was remitted to the Court of Session, at the instance of the pursuer, in terms of section 30 * of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907. On the case appearing, on 25th February 1913, in the Single Bills of the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) counsel for the defender moved that, in view of the slight nature of the injuries averred, the case should be remitted back to the Sheriff, and cited the undernoted authorities.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is a question of circumstances in each case whether an action shall be sent back to the Sheriff Court for disposal or shall be continued in this Court; and it is impossible to draw any sharp line between those cases which should be sent back and those which should not. Among the cases in the reports there is none at all similar to the present. In Macnab v. Fyfe,² which was referred to, the averments were that the pursuer had "sustained severe and extensive bruising," and had been totally incapacitated for work. In *Barclay v. Smith & Company*³ it was averred that the "pursuer had received numerous and severe bruises on the body, arms, and legs," and that his bicycle and his clothing were destroyed. But these cases seem to me to be not on all fours with the present case. Here there was injury to the pursuer's head, and it was so severe an injury that he was taken in an unconscious state to the hospital

* Quoted supra, p. 474, footnote.

¹ Barclay v. Smith & Co., supra, p. 473; M'Nab v. Fyfe, (1904) 6 F. 925.

² 6 F. 925.

³ Supra, p. 473.

and only recovered consciousness after a considerable interval. That was Feb. 25, 1913. not surprising, for it is averred that the blow which he had received caused a very severe wound to his forehead—a wound which necessarily required careful surgical treatment. These averments would, in my opinion, be sufficient to make it very doubtful whether this was a case that should be sent back.

Mackie v.
Davidson.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

But there is also the averment that the wound will cause a "large permanent disfigurement." We must remember that the pursuer was not, as in the other cases I have referred to, a person in a position in which his external appearance was of no importance as affecting his occupation. He was a commercial traveller. Now, it is common knowledge that anything that injures the appearance of a commercial traveller affects his position in two respects—first, it is not so likely that he will be employed as a traveller, for those who employ travellers select their men to some extent for their appearance; and secondly, and ancillary to that, he might not be so effective as a traveller when he presented himself to those with whom he wished to do business. We know quite well that very slight disfigurement may make a difference in such a case. It may be quite unreasonable, nevertheless it is the fact.

Again, it is averred that the pursuer suffered a nervous shock; and it is also averred that he, in the course of his business, has to use a motor cycle in order to accomplish his work as a commercial traveller. In former days such work was done without a motor cycle. Nowadays competition is so keen that it is necessary to accomplish as many visits as possible in a short time, and the question whether a man who has suffered from nervous shock and who will take some time to recover can ride a motor cycle is one which might be taken into consideration by a jury. And then it is a further fact here that the pursuer's motor cycle has been destroyed, and that the value of the cycle was £40.

On these grounds I have come to the conclusion that this is not one of the cases which we should refuse to send to a jury.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the power we have to send back to the Sheriff Court for proof a case which the pursuer has appealed for jury trial is a power which we should exercise with the greatest possible caution. It should be exercised only in cases where it appears upon the face of the record that the action is one of a trivial character, or, for some other reason, is not suited for determination by a jury in this Court.

Here, I think, the pursuer's claim is a substantial one. I can imagine that there may be serious injury resulting from a shock such as the pursuer received, rendering him unconscious at the time and disfiguring him, probably for life, and that altogether apart from the loss of property, which, I think, may fairly be assessed at something like £50; because he says his clothing was ruined as well as his motor cycle, and that he also incurred medical expenses.

I should like to repeat what I said to Mr Lippe during the course of the debate, viz., that I think it would be very unfortunate indeed for defenders in such actions if we were to exercise the power we undoubtedly have in

Feb. 25, 1913. too generous a way. The result would be that a pursuer who desired to submit the assessment of his claim to a jury would simply proceed at once in the Supreme Court. If his claim were for more than £50 it would be a competent action in the Supreme Court, and if the action was one for personal injury the pursuer would be entitled to lay it before a jury. As matters stand, it is often very convenient that the early procedure should take place in the Sheriff Court, where it can be more cheaply carried through, for it is only when it has been ascertained that there is to be no settlement of the claim that there need be an appeal to this Court in order that a jury may be summoned to determine the question of liability and assess the damages. Accordingly I think it would be very unfortunate if we took the suggestion of Mr Lippe and remitted this case to the Sheriff Court. He says it would be as well tried by the Sheriff. I should be slow to differ from him; but the pursuer has a right to have his claim assessed by a jury. A jury may or may not be more generous than the Sheriff-substitute would be; but the pursuer presumably thinks they would be, and accordingly he prefers that they should be his tribunal rather than the local Judge. We are not entitled to deprive the pursuer of that option in this case, and I am very clearly of opinion that we should not accede to the motion for the defender.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think the case is ruled either by the case of *Barclay*¹ or by the case of Macnab.² It seems to me that the particulars your Lordships have mentioned differentiate the case from these.

THE COURT refused the motion.

BALFOUR & MANSON, S.S.C.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 94.

Feb. 28, 1913. (Poor) ISABELLA WILLIAMSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Fenton.
JAMES M'CLELLAND, Defender (Respondent).—J. A. T. Robertson.

Williamson v. M'Clelland. Parent and Child—Filiation—Period of Gestation.

In an action of filiation and aliment, where 306 days had elapsed between the last act of intercourse between the parties and the birth of the child, held that that was not an impossible period of gestation, and decree granted.

1ST DIVISION. ON 19th July 1911 Isabella Williamson, Ayr, brought an action of filiation and aliment in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against James M'Clelland, Glasgow.

The proof led in the case disclosed that the pursuer's child was born on 19th May 1911, and that the last proved act of intercourse between the pursuer and the defender was on 17th July 1910. The evidence is further narrated in the opinion of the Sheriff.

On 8th December 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) decerned against the defender as craved.

¹ Supra, p. 473.

² 6 F. 925

The defender appealed, and on 29th February 1912 the Sheriff (Millar) recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action.*

Feb. 28, 1913.
Williamson v.
M'Clelland.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 26th February 1913.¹

At advising on 28th February 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute is right. There is no question as to the fact of connection between the pursuer and the defender; the proof of that is so overwhelming that it cannot be controverted, and both Sheriffs have taken that view of it. The only difficulty arises from the circumstance

* "NOTE.—After reading the proof I think it is proved that the defender had sexual intercourse with the pursuer on 16th July 1910, and it is admitted that no intercourse with him took place after the following day—Sunday, 17th July. The child was born on 19th May 1911, which is 306 days after the date of the intercourse proved. The question is, Has the pursuer made out her case?

"There are no authorities, medical or legal, which lay down that such a long period of gestation is impossible. The only witness called in this case upon this question was Dr M'Kenna, who said that during his practice he had never known of so long a period, although, from his reading of medical authorities, he thought it was quite possible. The period is so prolonged and exceptional that it lays the duty upon the Court of examining carefully the facts of the case.

"The pursuer, who is now thirty-one years of age, says that she knew the defender—a lad who is now twenty-one—in the year 1908, when he was staying in Ayr for a short time on business, but there was no great intimacy till June 1910. She met him in Ayr on 2nd June, when he accompanied her to her mother's house, and subsequently left Ayr, promising to return in a fortnight. He returned on the 11th of June, when they went out together to a place called the Belmont Crossings, where there was a seat, and they sat down, when she allowed him to have connection with her. The seat is on the public road, and they were observed by some cyclists who were passing. The defender made a second visit to the pursuer's mother's house on the 2nd of July, and the following evening they took the car to Prestwick, and again had connection at the side of the road. Thereafter he again returned on the 16th of July, and stayed in the mother's house from Saturday till Monday. The pursuer's account of what took place during that visit is a scandalous story of gross immorality. The question, therefore, is whether a woman of her character, according to her own account, is more likely to have had connection with some other man subsequently, or that the period of gestation of her child was so prolonged as it must have been if her story is true. I think the first alternative is the more probable. That view is supported by the fact that a similar consideration was entertained by the Court in the case of Boyd v. Kerr, 5 D. 1213, by Lord Mackenzie and Lord Jeffrey; and by Lord Deas in Gibson v. M'Fagan, 1 R. 853, in the fourth circumstance which he says supports his view. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has failed to prove her case, and that the defender should be assoilzied."

¹ At the discussion the following authorities were referred to:—Taylor, Medical Jurisprudence, (6th ed.) ii. 43, 56, 59, 60, 93; Boyd v. Kerr, (1843) 5 D. 1213; Gibson v. M'Fagan, (1874) 1 R. 853; Cook v. Rattray, (1880) 8 R. 217; Whyte v. Whyte, (1884) 11 R. 710; Innes v. Innes, (1837) 2 Sh. & M'L. 417, Cottenham, L.C., at p. 447.

Feb. 28, 1913. that it is necessary to hold that an unusually long period of gestation elapsed if the birth of the child is to be referred to the last proved act of Williamson v M'Clelland. connection. That period was one of 306 days.

Ld. President. There is only one witness examined in the case upon this matter—Dr M'Kenna—and I think the result of his evidence fairly comes to this, that he is unable to say that the period is so long as to make the paternity of the defender an impossibility. On a matter like this I think it would be unfortunate if we were to consider ourselves bound by the evidence of one witness in a case in which it was quite natural that there should not be a large amount of expert testimony led. I have therefore not felt myself to be restricted to the evidence of Dr M'Kenna, but have thought myself entitled to consider the matter in the light of what has been said by learned Judges in other cases, and of what one knows to be the opinion of experts as disclosed in medical books.

It is absolutely clear that neither in law nor in medical science is it possible to fix an actual number of days as the extreme period of gestation. In certain systems of law the matter has been dealt with by statute, and a limit has been arbitrarily fixed, but in our system there is no such limit. That does not lead to the conclusion that a period might not be submitted to the consideration of the Court of such length that the Court would refuse to hold that the parentage had been proved. The Court is left free to deal with each case as it occurs. In the present case, although the period is unusually long, there is nothing that has led me to think that it would be beyond the province of the Court to hold that it is not impossibly long. Then we have the undoubted fact of connection, the birth of the child, and the absence of suggestion of any other man as the father. The result seems to me to be inevitable.

I am therefore of opinion that your Lordships should allow the appeal, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and restore the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD KINNAR concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The learned Sheriff in his note puts the matter thus: "The question, therefore, is whether a woman of her character, according to her own account, is more likely to have had connection with some other man subsequently, or that the period of gestation of her child was so prolonged, as it must have been if her story is true? I think the first alternative is the more probable." Since the hearing I have gone through the evidence, and also through the letters which are produced, and I will content myself with simply saying that I cannot take the view which the Sheriff has taken. I am of opinion that the case for the pursuer is entirely proved.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff and affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

ROBERT GIBB, W.S —HENDERSON & MACKENZIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

GEORGE ADDIE AND OTHERS (Robert Addie's Trustees), AND OTHERS, No. 95.
 First and Second Parties.—Fleming, K.C.—Black.
 CAPTAIN THOMAS JACKSON AND OTHERS, Third Parties.— Feb. 28, 1913.
Blackburn, K.C.—Nicolson.
 MRS MARY REARDON (James Baird Jackson's Executrix), AND Addie's
 OTHERS, Fourth and Fifth Parties.—Marison, K.C.—C. H. Brown. Trustees v.
 Jackson.

Succession—Vesting—Direction to convey at postponed period—Issue to take predeceasing parent's share—Whether gift to issue subject to conditions affecting parent's share.

A testator directed his trustees to hold a share of the residue of his estate for his eldest son in liferent and his issue, if any, in fee, declaring that in the event of the death of that son without issue, the capital of his share should fall and belong to the testator's two other sons and his three daughters "equally among them, and the survivors and survivor of them the issue of any of them predeceasing being entitled equally among them, if more than one, to their deceased parents' share." The liferenter died without issue predeceased by two of his sisters, who, however, left issue, some of whom, though surviving their parent, predeceased the liferenter.

Held that, as the issue were called in place of their deceased parents and not as original legatees, the gift to them was subject to the same conditions as the gift to their parents; and accordingly that no vesting had taken place in the issue who predeceased the liferenter.

Martin v. Holgate, (1866) L. R., 1 H. L. 175, distinguished.

ROBERT ADDIE, coal and ironmaster in Glasgow, died in 1870 leaving 1ST DIVISION. a trust-disposition and settlement whereby, after sundry provisions, he directed his trustees "to hold and apply the whole residue and remainder of my means, estate, and property, heritable and moveable, real and personal, in trust for behoof of my sons, Robert, William, Alexander, and George, and my daughters, Mary, Marion, and Robina, equally among them, but subject always to the several conditions, restrictions, and declarations hereinafter written."

With regard to the share of residue which he left to his son Robert he made this provision:—"And whereas the said Robert Addie, my eldest son, has for many years past been in such a state of mental weakness as to be incapable of managing his own affairs and unable to attend to business, . . . therefore I hereby direct and appoint that the share of the residue of my means and estate hereinbefore provided to him shall, so long as he continues in a state of mental weakness and incapable of managing his own affairs, be held invested by my said trustees in their own names in trust for him in liferent for his liferent alimentary use allenary and for behoof of any child or children he may have, to be divided equally among them, if more than one, in fee. . . . Declaring also that in the event of his death without issue, the capital of the share of said residue hereby provided to him shall fall and belong to my said sons, Alexander and George, and to my said daughters, Mary, Marion, and Robina, equally among them, and the survivors and survivor of them, the issue of any of them predeceasing being entitled, equally among them, if more than one, to their deceased parents' share, . . . but declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that if and whenever my said son Robert shall be restored to a reasonably sound state of mental health and

Feb. 28, 1913.

Addie's
Trustees v.
Jackson.

become capable of managing his own affairs, and shall continue in that state uninterrupted for a period of not less than two years, my said trustees shall be entitled, and they are hereby authorised and empowered, if they shall deem it prudent and expedient and advantageous to his interests, to pay or assign and make over to him absolutely the capital of the share of said residue hereby provided to him, or the securities on which it may have been invested, to be at his own unlimited disposal."

All the testator's children above mentioned survived him. His son Robert (hereinafter referred to as the liferenter) died unmarried on 16th April 1911, and as he had continued in a state of mental weakness until his death, the trustees never exercised the power conferred upon them of paying to him the capital of the share of residue which he liferented. He was predeceased by his sisters Mary and Robina. The former, Mrs Mary Addie or Jackson, was survived by five children, one of whom, James Baird Jackson, predeceased the liferenter. The latter, Mrs Robina Addie or Fyfe, was survived by one child, Alastair Dunbar Fyfe, who predeceased the liferenter.

Questions having arisen regarding the distribution of the liferenter's share of residue, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court, to which the testator's trustees were the first parties; George Addie, Marion Addie, and Alexander Addie were the second parties; the four surviving children of Mrs Mary Jackson were the third parties; the executrix of James Baird Jackson was the fourth party; and the trustees of Alastair Dunbar Fyfe were the fifth parties.

The case stated the contentions of the parties as follows:—

"The second parties maintain that, on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the testator, the vesting of the share of residue liferented by his son Robert Addie was suspended until the liferenter's death, and that upon his death without issue and without the first parties having exercised the discretionary powers conferred upon them the said share vested in the second parties and the parties of the third part, in the proportions of one-fourth to each of the second parties and one-fourth to the third parties per stirpes."

The third parties, who claimed one-fourth of the said share, stated a similar contention.

"The fourth party contends that the late James Baird Jackson, on the death of his mother, took a vested interest in one-fifth of one-fifth of the fee of the share of the residue of the testator's estate liferented by the late Robert Addie, subject only to defeasance in the events, which did not happen, of the late Robert Addie dying leaving issue, or of his recovering and the first parties exercising the power conferred upon them of paying over to him absolutely the capital of the share liferented by him. The fourth party accordingly contends that, as executrix and universal legatory of the said deceased James Baird Jackson, she is now entitled to payment of the said one-fifth of one-fifth of the said share of residue liferented by the late Robert Addie."

The fifth parties, who claimed one-fifth of the said share, stated a contention in similar terms to that of the fourth party.

The following questions of law were presented for the opinion of the Court:—"Did the share of residue liferented by the deceased Robert Addie vest only in (a) the children of the testator who survived the liferenter, and (b) the issue (who survived the liferenter) of the testator's child, Mrs Jackson, who predeceased the liferenter? Feb. 28, 1913.

 or, Did it also vest in the issue (who survived their parents but predeceased the liferenter) of the testator's children, Mrs Jackson and Mrs Fyfe, who predeceased the liferenter?"

Addie's
 Trustees v.
 Jackson.

The case was heard before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 18th December 1912.¹

At advising on 28th February 1913,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—[After stating the terms of the will and the contentions of the parties]—The determination of the question depends entirely upon the construction of the clause which declares that in the event which has happened the capital of Robert Addie's share is to belong to the testator's sons and daughters named, and the survivors, "the issue of any of them predeceasing being entitled equally among them, if more than one, to their deceased parents' share." In my opinion the gift to issue is substitutional and not original. There is no independent bequest to issue. The bequest is to the sons and daughters absolutely. Therefore the contingency annexed to the gift to the sons and daughters that they shall survive the liferenter applies also in the case of their issue.

In the case of Martin v. Holgate,² which was founded upon by the fifth parties, where it was held that the gift was original, the clause was in marked contrast to the present. There the testator devised his estate and effects to trustees to pay the proceeds to his wife for life, and "after her decease, to distribute and divide the whole, &c., amongst such of my four nephews and two nieces" (naming them) "as shall be living at the time of her decease; but if any or either of them should then be dead, leaving issue, such issue shall be entitled to their father's or mother's share." It was held that the gift to the children was original, not substitutional, and that the daughter of a nephew, upon her father's death, took a vested interest in the share which, if he had lived, he would have taken. The fact that the gift to the parent was contingent did not affect the nature of the gift to the issue, which was an independent bequest. The construction put upon the words "should then be dead leaving issue" was that they were equivalent to "should then have died leaving issue." The words "leaving issue" were held necessarily to apply to the period of the death of the nephews and nieces, and not to the death of the tenant for life. As Lord Westbury observed (at p. 189), the form of the gift was "not elliptical, nor referential, nor substitutional." I am of opinion that in the present case, according to the form of the gift, issue are just substituted for their parents, and the contingency of surviving the liferenter which applied to the parent applies equally to the issue.

In the case of *Banks's Trustees*³—where Lord Low expressed the opinion that but for the word "accruing" the rule of *Martin v. Holgate*² would

¹ The following cases were referred to.—Martin v. Holgate, (1866) L. R., 1 H. L. 175, Lord Chelmsford, at p. 187; Wormald v. Woolley, [1903] 2 Ch. 206; Banks's Trustees v. Banks's Trustees, 1907 S. C. 125, Lord Low, at pp. 130-1; Johnston's Trustees v. Dewar, 1911 S. C. 722; Coulson's Trustees v. Coulson's Trustees, 1911 S. C. 881.

² L. R., 1 H. L. 175.

³ 1907 S. C. 125.

Feb. 28, 1913.

Addie's
Trustees v.
Jackson.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

have been applicable—the testator's direction to his trustees was, upon the death or second marriage of his wife if she survived him, to pay and make over the residue of his estate to such of his children as had arrived at the age of twenty-one years, or as they respectively reached that age. The declaration was as follows:—"In the case of provisions to children under these presents, that if any child shall die, either before or after me, leaving lawful issue, and without having acquired a vested interest in such provision, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares, original and accruing, which their parent would have taken by survivorship; and the share of any child dying without leaving lawful issue shall be divided among the surviving children, and the lawful issue of such children as may have died leaving such issue, in equal shares, per stirpes." In this case as in *Martin v. Holgate*¹ the construction put upon the gift to issue, but for the word "accruing," would have been that it was original and not substitutional. The form of the clause in the present case is different. I am accordingly of opinion that the first alternative of the question should be answered in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

LORD JOHNSTON.—[In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord Mackenzie]—The testator, Robert Addie, directed his trustees to hold and apply the whole residue and remainder of his estate in trust for behoof of four out of his seven sons, and of his three daughters, equally among them, but subject always to the several conditions, restrictions, and declarations contained in his settlement. His three other sons had been provided for in his business.

These equal provisions out of residue to the seven children so provided for were not the subject of any general set of conditions and restrictions, but were dealt with more or less severally. The shares of Alexander and George were not affected by any conditions; that of his son William by one set of conditions; that of his son Robert by another set; and those of the three daughters by a general set of conditions applicable to them only.

This case is concerned with the share of Robert Addie, who was at the date of the settlement incapable of managing his own affairs. The trustees were directed to invest the share in their own names in trust for Robert in life tenancy and for behoof of his children in fee. But this was coupled with the following declaration that, in the event of his death without issue, the capital of his share should fall and belong to his brothers Alexander and George, and to his three sisters, equally among them, "and the survivors and survivor of them the issue of any of them predeceasing being entitled equally among them, if more than one, to their deceased parents' share."

On that statement I think that there can be little doubt that vesting was suspended, that there was no vesting in Robert himself, and no room for vesting subject to defeasance in the donees-over. But there is another clause which requires to be attended to. After the destination-over above referred to there is added a power to the trustees, if they should deem it prudent and expedient and advantageous to his interests in view of his being restored to a reasonably sound state of health, to pay or assign Feb. 28, 1913. and make over to Robert absolutely the capital of his share of residue, to be at his own unlimited disposal, and there is also a general declaration that the shares of residue provided to each of the above-mentioned children should bear interest from the date of the testator's decease, but that the shares of his sons should not vest in them until they respectively attained the age of twenty-five years. I do not, however, see that in the case of Robert these provisions can do more than add another contingency to the destination-over.

¹ L. R., 1 H. L. 175.

Addie's
Trustees v.
Jackson.

So far, I do not think that there is much difficulty in the case. The share of residue provided for Robert Addie in liferent, in the circumstances which have occurred, vested, in my opinion, at his death, and not sooner, in the children of the testator who survived him. But there remains a question whether the issue of predeceasing children take their deceased parents' share. One sister predeceased Robert, and left children who survived her and also survived Robert, and also a child who survived her but predeceased Robert, and another sister, Mrs Fyfe, predeceased Robert and left a child who survived her, but predeceased Robert.

The question, therefore, is whether survivance of Robert, the liferenter, was a condition of the issue of predeceasing children taking their deceased parent's share. In this aspect of the case we were much pressed by the decision in *Martin v. Holgate*¹ in the House of Lords. I recognise to the full the authority of that decision, but if we are to follow it, the result would be to compel us to determine that the issue of these predeceasing daughters took, at any rate not later than their parents' death, a vested interest in the share which, if the parents had survived, they might respectively have taken. I am obliged to say "might" and not "would" have taken, because as already shown there was nothing to vest in the parents unless and until they survived Robert, and unless, if and when that occurred, certain contingencies had been purified. Now it seems to me that there could be no more vesting in the issue of predeceasing children than in such children if they survived in what was still subject to two contingencies, viz., those of Robert leaving issue, and of his recovery and the trustees determining to pay over to him his share. I think, therefore, that the case bears to be distinguished from Martin v. Holgate,¹ and that the first question should be answered in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Mackenzie, and I only wish to add that I should certainly not have reached that conclusion if I had not thought that it was altogether consistent with the decision in Martin v. Holgate.¹ There can be no question as to the binding authority of that decision, and this Court must necessarily follow it. And perhaps I may say it is a decision which demands all the more consideration because the judgments in the House of Lords are expressly intended to settle a controversy which had embarrassed the Court in England and upon which the opinions of eminent Judges were conflicting. But while

¹ L. R., 1 H. L. 175.

Feb. 28, 1913. we are bound to follow the rules laid down in *Martin v. Holgate*¹ as principles of law governing the construction of wills, we are not called upon to follow the exact construction of particular language if the language which we have to interpret is different. We are only bound to follow the general Lord Kinnear. principles.

Addie's
Trustees v.
Jackson.

Now, the principles established by *Martin v. Holgate*¹ are, I think, very clearly stated in two propositions in the judgment of Lord Westbury. In the first place, his Lordship assumes—indeed expresses at another part of his opinion—the perfectly well-established principle that a Court of construction will construe plain words according to their plain meaning. But then, in the application of that doctrine to the particular question, he lays down the two propositions which I am going to cite. I should remind your Lordships that the question was whether—when an estate, which was to be distributed on the lapse of a life interest and was to go to a class of persons and the issue of such of that class as had predeceased—the issue of the predeceasing members of the class might take an immediate vested interest upon the death of their parent, even although the parent himself, if he had survived, could have taken no interest until the lapse of the life interest; and accordingly, whether in such a case, the children might take a vested interest although they predeceased the life tenant. In that case the Court held that they might, but that is not a general doctrine applicable to all cases in which a class of persons and the survivors are called with a gift to the issue of predeceasing members. The propositions which Lord Westbury lays down are these. In the first place, he says: “A Judge is not justified in departing from the plain meaning of words, which admit of a rational interpretation, for the purpose of giving effect to an assumed intention, which appears to him to be more rational or more consistent with the rest of the will.” And the second is that the assumption, which had been made by the Court below, of an intention to make the gift to the issue contingent, because the gift to the parent was made contingent, was not warranted if it were used so as to control the plain meaning of the words. Now, when that doctrine was applied to the construction of the will in the case of Martin v. Holgate,¹ it is perfectly clear upon what reasons of construction the House proceeded. They are stated in the outset of the Lord Chancellor’s opinion, and all the other learned Lords concur with him. The terms of the gift were expressed in a direction to trustees to distribute and divide the estate at the death of the tenant for life “among such of my four nephews and two nieces . . . as shall be living at the time of her decease; but if any or either of them should then be dead, leaving issue, such issue shall be entitled to their father’s or mother’s share.” Now, the Lord Chancellor says (at p. 185): “When we speak of a person having died leaving a child or children, we mean leaving a child or children at his death. If, therefore, the language here had been, if any of them should, at the death of my wife, have died leaving issue, it would have meant if any should at or before that time have died leaving issue at his own death, and if that be so, it is hard to say that any difference is to arise from the circumstance that the words are not ‘shall then have died leaving issue,' but 'shall then be dead leaving issue.' Such a distinction Feb. 28, 1913.

¹ L. R., 1 H. L. 175.

 would savour of technical subtlety barely intelligible to ordinary minds." ^{Addie's}
 That is the ground upon which the House proceeded in the interpretation ^{Trustees v.} of that particular will. And then they say it is perfectly clear upon these ^{Jackson.}
 words that the gift is made in favour of the issue of the legatees who shall ^{Lord Kinnear.} die leaving issue, and there is no other contingency except the death of the parent during the lifetime of the tenant for life to affect this absolute gift to the issue. Now, on that reading of the words, the learned Lords say you are not entitled to assume a contingency which the testator has not expressed merely because the gift to the parent has been subject to that contingency. The two gifts are entirely separate and independent. There is no substitutional gift in favour of the issue of predeceasing parents. It is not a substitution, but it is an independent gift to children described as the issue of persons who shall die leaving issue during the existence of the liferent.

But if you compare the words used in that case with the words of the will which we have to construe, it appears to me that the main principle of the House of Lords' judgment—that we are to give a plain meaning to plain words—leads to a different interpretation of the words before us from that which was put upon the words in Martin v. Holgate,¹ because, in the first place, it is to be observed that there is but one contingency applicable to the whole disposition of the estate, viz., that it is to be upon the death of the liferenter. It is upon the death of the liferenter that the capital of the share of the residue provided to him "shall fall and belong to my said sons, Alexander and George, and to my said daughters, Mary, Marion, and Robina, equally among them, and the survivors and survivor of them, the issue of any of them predeceasing being entitled equally among them, if more than one, to their deceased parents' share." There is no gift to children upon any different contingency from the gift to the parents.
 The main ground of the decision in *Martin v. Holgate*¹ is that although the gift to the parents was limited by reference to the death of the tenant for life, the gift to the children was not so limited at all, and that it was not the duty of a Court of construction to assume a limitation which the will did not express. But there is here but one reference to one period at which the gift is to take effect in favour of any of the legatees. There is no reference at all to the death of parents as determining the period at which the right of their children is to come into operation. On the plain construction of the words according to their plain meaning, what the trustees are asked to do is, upon the death of the liferenter, to distribute the estate among Alexander, George, Mary, Marion, and Robina, and the survivors and the children of the predeceasers. The direction, of course, assumes the existence of children or issue, as the case may be, who are capable of taking, or, in other words, it assumes the existence of issue at the date of distribution. If no such issue exist, then I confess I see nothing to displace the right expressly given to the survivors in the event of the predecease of any one of these five.

On the whole matter I agree with Lord Mackenzie, and I am not troubled

¹ L. R., 1 H. L. 175.

Feb. 28, 1913. by any doubt as to the possibility of our departing from the decision in Martin v. Holgate,¹ which we are plainly not entitled to do. Then we answer the first alternative of the question of law in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

Addie's
Trustees v.
Jackson.

The LORD PRESIDENT was present when the case was advised.

THE COURT answered the first alternative of the question of law in the affirmative, and the second alternative in the negative.

W. & F. HALDANE, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—PEARSON, ROBERTSON, & FINLAY, W.S.—WALLACE & GUTHRIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 96. ROBERT M'GEEHEN, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—Horne, K.C.—MacRobert.
JAMES KNOX AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—
Feb. 28, 1913. Sandeman, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

M'Geehen v.
Knox.

Public-house—Licensing authority—Disqualification of member—Bias—Member belonging to a society pledged to prohibition principles.

Held that the mere fact of belonging to a temperance society pledged to the principle of "no licence in any form under any circumstances for the sale of liquors to be used as a beverage" did not operate as a disqualification for sitting as a member of a Licensing Court.

1ST DIVISION. ROBERT M'GEEHEN, spirit merchant, Airdrie, brought an action against James Knox, Provost of the burgh of Airdrie, and others, as members of the Licensing Court, and against the said James Knox and others, as members of the Licensing Appeal Court of that burgh, for reduction of a deliverance of the former Court dated 17th April 1911, and a deliverance of the latter Court dated 8th May 1911.

Lord
Skerrington.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is a wine and spirit merchant in Airdrie, and held a certificate of licence for a public-house for premises situated at 85 Black Street, Rawyards, Airdrie. The premises were first licensed on or about 1846, and the pursuer has been licensee since on or about 9th December 1901, his certificate having been renewed from year to year. The defenders first called are the whole members of the Licensing Court of the burgh of Airdrie. The defenders second called are the whole members of the Licensing Appeal Court of the said burgh. . . ." (Cond. 2) "On or about 23rd March 1911 the pursuer lodged an application for the renewal of his certificate. The said application came up at the general half-yearly meeting of the Licensing Court for the burgh of Airdrie held on 11th April 1911. The pursuer, with about other thirty licence-holders in the said burgh, was cited by the chief constable of the burgh to attend the Court." (Cond. 3) "At the said meeting of the Licensing Court the applications for renewal of certificates by a number of licence-holders were granted. The procurator-fiscal, however, moved that, in the cases of the pursuer and the other thirty applicants before mentioned, consideration of these cases be held over. The Court granted the motion and adjourned to the 17th day of April. . . ." (Cond. 4) "At the continued or adjourned meeting of the said Licensing Court on 17th April, the said applications were considered. In no case was any fault alleged against the licence-holders, and no objections to the granting of said applications were lodged by any member of the public. The procurator-fiscal led evidence in support of the chief constable's averments of congestion, and also as to the amount of trade in certain of the premises. Twenty-two applications for renewal of certificates were granted, and ten refused. Among those refused was the pursuer's certificate. . . . (Cond. 5) "The said judgment, deliverance, or finding refusing the pursuer's application was null and void. . . . The members of the Licensing Court, and in particular the said James Knox, Matthew M'Laren Henderson, William Jack, and Thomas Armour, were disqualified from acting by reason of bias. In considering the said applications the said Licensing Court did not act judicially, but illegally and oppressively. The members of the Court particularly above mentioned belong to associations or lodges the object of which is the total suppression of all licensed premises. In taking part in the proceedings of said Court the said members did not intend to exercise, and did not in fact exercise, an honest judgment. The said James Knox, the chairman of the Court, is the chief templar of the 'Airdrie' Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars. The said Thomas Armour and William Jack are also leading and active officials of the said lodge. The said Matthew M'Laren Henderson is a member of the said lodge, an official of a local 'Order of Rechabites,' and a member of a body called 'The Sons of Temperance.' The following are the 'principles' of the said Independent Order of Good Templars sworn to and to be rightly observed by all members of said Order, viz.:—'Total abstinence enforced by a life-long pledge and the absolute prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating drinks as beverages.' The following also are what is termed the Good Templars Platform, viz.:—'(1) Total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage. (2) No licence in any form under any circumstances for the sale of liquors to be used as a beverage. (3) The absolute prohibition (these two latter words are in italics) of the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating liquors for such purposes; prohibition by the will of the people expressed in due form of law with the penalties derived for a crime of such enormity. (4) The creation of a healthy public opinion upon the subject by the active dissemination of truth in all modes known to enlightened philanthropy. (5) The election of good honest men to administer the laws. (6) Persistence in efforts to save individuals and communities from so dreadful a scourge against all forms of opposition and difficulties until our success is complete and universal.' The pursuer avers that the defenders the said James Knox [and others], as officials or members of such Order, and having sworn or pledged themselves to maintain and uphold, without reservation, the foresaid 'principles' and 'platform' above referred to, were incapable of exercising in the public interest or in the interest of the pursuer a fair or full consideration of or honest judicial discretion in the pursuer's application, and accordingly their decision is null and void." (Cond. 6) "The said James Knox, in September 1905, published a pamphlet entitled 'The Triumph of Enthusiasm, or Social and Temperance Reform in Airdrie.' The said James Knox also wrote a letter, which appeared in the Glasgow Herald on or about 6th February 1910, dealing with 'Temperance Progress in Airdrie.' At the time

Feb. 28, 1913.
M'Geachen v.
Knox.

Feb. 28, 1913. said letter was written and published the said James Knox was, as provost of Airdrie, a member and chairman of the Licensing Court of the burgh of Airdrie, and also a member of the Licensing Appeal Court for the said burgh. The said letter was written in his official capacity as provost of the burgh, and is so signed. Copies of these publications are produced and referred to. These writings show that the said James Knox could not and did not exercise an honest judicial discretion in dealing with the applications before the Court, and particularly with the pursuer's application. . . ." (Cond. 7) "On behalf of the pursuer and the other nine licence-holders whose applications were refused, appeals were lodged to the Appeal Court of the burgh. The said Appeal Court met on the 8th day of May 1911. The appeals of the pursuer and other six applicants were dismissed. Two appeals on behalf of two widows, one of whom was in poor circumstances, were, however, unanimously sustained by the Court, although no new evidence had been brought forward or submitted to the Court in support of their applications. Explained that there was considerable indignation on the part of the public at the high-handed, corrupt, and flagrant decision of the said members of the Licensing Court for the burgh of Airdrie, and it is believed and averred that these applications were sustained solely as a means of allaying such indignation." (Cond. 8) "The judgments, deliverances, or findings of the Appeal Court in refusing said applications were null and void. The members above referred to as being disqualified from sitting in the Licensing Court sat in the Appeal Court. They were also disqualified from sitting in the Appeal Court for the same reasons." (Cond. 9) "At the said Appeal Court the pursuer's agent took exception to the said James Knox [and others] as members of the Court on the ground that they were disqualified from acting for the reasons above stated. They, however, refused to leave the bench, and continued to sit and act as members of the Court. The said James Knox was chairman of the Appeal Court, and along with the members of the Licensing Court was thus in a position to control, as was intended by them, and did control the Appeal Court by means of his casting vote." (Cond. 11) "The appeal of the pursuer was the first argued before the said Court. On a vote being taken five members voted for sustaining and five for dismissing the appeal. The said James Knox being in the chair, and having, in terms of the said statute, a casting vote, gave this casting vote for the dismissal of the appeal. . . ." (Cond. 12) "The conduct of the members of the Licensing Court who were sitting in the Appeal Court was so flagrantly corrupt and illegal that four out of five of the justices of the peace members left the Court as a protest."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions for reduction and declarator in respect—(a) that the whole proceedings in said Courts were illegal and funditus void and inept; (b) that members of both Courts were disqualified from hearing and determining the application by the pursuer for the renewal of his certificate by reason of bias; (c) that members of both Courts did not exercise their judgment and discretion fairly and judicially, but acted corruptly and oppressively.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed.

On 20th March 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.* Feb. 23, 1913.

M'Geen v.
Knox.

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the pursuer's averments and dealing with certain grounds of reduction to which it is unnecessary to refer for the purposes of this report]—The last and principal ground of reduction is that Provost Knox and three of his colleagues in the burgh magistracy, who sat and voted both in the Licensing Court and in the Appeal Court, were disqualified by bias. An objection on the ground of bias means, in the ordinary case, that a licensing magistrate had such an interest in the granting or refusing of a particular licence, or group of licences, that he ought not to have adjudicated on an application or appeal relating to such licence or licences. The interest which will disqualify need not be direct or pecuniary. Thus a licensing magistrate who was organising secretary of a society which had promoted and financed the opposition to certain applications was interdicted from adjudicating upon these applications (per Lord President in Goodall v. Bilsland, 1909 S. C., pp. 1177-8). In the present case the alleged bias is of a different kind. It is directed against the granting of all licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and it is said to arise from and to be evidenced by the opinions held by the burgh magistrates as to the proper policy of the State towards the liquor traffic. These magistrates are alleged to be leading and active officials of temperance societies, the object of which is the total suppression of all licensed premises. The pursuer avers—[His Lordship quoted the terms of condescendence 5].

"It is not surprising that the pursuer should distrust the discretion of magistrates who advocate legislation absolutely prohibiting and making criminal the trade by which he lives. If the question to be decided had been whether Mr Knox and his colleagues were likely to be influenced by these opinions in the exercise of the discretion entrusted to them by the Licensing Act, I should have had no difficulty in answering it in the affirmative. In considering the number of licences which it is 'meet and convenient' to grant in a certain district, and in deciding whether a particular licensed house is or is not necessary for the public convenience, the standpoint of a temperance reformer like Mr Knox would probably be different from that of a man who approves of our present licensing system, or again from that of a man who disapproves of all legislative restrictions on the liquor traffic. The influence of his opinions upon his practice in the case of a licensing magistrate is frankly admitted by Mr Knox in a pamphlet, No. 9 of process, upon which the pursuer founds in condescendence 6. It was published in 1905, and on pp. 22 and 24 the writer gives the following account of what he calls 'A famous Victory':—'At the approach of the annual Licensing Court in the month of April 1902, reform began to fill the air. The town-council at their March monthly meeting had unanimously passed a resolution recommending the magistrates to take every available opportunity to reduce the number of licenses, and there was a general expectation that something would be done in that direction. The composition of the bench was favourable to reform, for of the five magistrates who constituted it three were members of the lodge. The result of the Court was a great triumph for the reformers. There was a net reduction of sixteen licences, and all the back and side doors of the remainder were ordered to be closed. The reduction was hailed with approval by the general community, and the utmost satisfaction was felt when on appeal being made to Quarter Sessions the magistrates' decisions were all confirmed. This was the first direct blow the liquor interest in Airdrie had received, but it was not to be the last. During the past four years a total of thirty licences have been cancelled, or more than 25 per cent of the whole. Needless to say the remaining 75 per cent are having attention, and will be dealt with in due course.'

"The pursuer also founds upon a letter, No. 10 of process, which Mr

Feb. 28, 1913.

M'Geheh v.
Knox.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 26th February 1913.

Argued for the reclaimar;—Though persons holding opinions similar to those professed by the Independent Order of Good Templars might not thereby be disqualified from acting as members of Licensing Courts,¹ yet the fact that the defenders Knox and certain others had explicitly pledged themselves to carry out the principles of that Order, disqualified them from acting, because it was a necessary inference that those principles would be put in force if they were members of Licensing Courts. In the face of so strong a "challenge to their favour" (as it had been called) involved in their pledge to maintain these principles, their determinations could not possibly be free from bias, and the deliverance in question should accordingly be reduced.² The mere risk of bias was enough, and the English decisions in which "challenge to the favour of the Court" was adopted as the test had been accepted in Scotland as illustrative of the principles to be applied.³

Knox, when Provost of Airdrie, wrote to a newspaper on the subject of 'Temperance Progress in Airdrie.'

"Unfortunately for the pursuer he must, in order to succeed, do a great deal more than allege and prove that Provost Knox and his colleagues are agitating for the abolition of the existing licensing system, and hold opinions which will influence the exercise of their discretion as licensing magistrates. It is not impossible faithfully to administer a law of which one disapproves, and if a man declares in some particular case that he can conscientiously do so, that declaration seems to me to be conclusive in a Court of law unless proved to be insincere by evidence of the most positive and convincing character. Different considerations apply where the appeal is made to public opinion, and the pursuer may possibly be able to satisfy his fellow-electors that Mr Knox and his colleagues are not fit and proper persons to represent them in the town-council or to act as licensing magistrates. As a matter of law, however, it is the right and duty of a licensing magistrate to act upon his own opinions, whatsoever these may be, as to what is 'meet and convenient,' provided always that such opinions do not require him to refuse or to grant indiscriminately every application for a licence, and thus to substitute a policy of absolute prohibition or of absolute liberty for the policy of the statute which requires that each application should be considered on its own merits. Every man is the best interpreter of the exact meaning and effect of his own opinions. It may be difficult for the pursuer to understand how Mr Knox and his colleagues can honestly and intelligently allow even a single shop to remain open for the sale of what they regard as a poison; but they have in effect declared that they can do so by accepting office as magistrates. I find nothing in the writings quoted or referred to by the pursuer which proves or even suggests that this declaration is dishonest and untrue, or which would entitle me to allow a proof for the purpose of showing that Mr Knox and his colleagues are prepared to betray their trust and abuse their position as licensing magistrates by refusing indiscriminately all applications for licences, so far as they can safely do so without such misconduct becoming apparent to the public eye."

¹ Goodall v. Bilsland, 1909 S. C. 1152.

² The King v. Sunderland Justices, [1901] 2 K. B. 357, A. L. Smith, M.R., at pp. 364, 366-7, Vaughan Williams, L.J., at p. 371; The Queen v. Huggins, [1895] 1 Q. B. 563, Wills, J., at p. 565.

³ Cameron v. Magistrates of Glasgow, (1903) 5 F. 490, Lord Kincairney, at p. 497.

Argued for the respondents;—The defenders could not be held to Feb. 28, 1913.
be disqualified from acting as members of the Licensing Courts, by reason of the temperance opinions which they held, without placing upon them a disqualification for which there was no statutory warrant and which could only be imposed by legislation. Any such disqualification would be of such universal effect upon Licensing Courts that few, if any, could be held anywhere in England or Scotland. The abuse of magisterial power was no part of the principles to which the defenders had pledged themselves; and disqualifying bias had to be real—such as absence of bona fides, sitting as judges in their own cause, or pecuniary interest.¹ The latter consideration distinguished the present case from that of The King v. Sunderland Justices.² There was no reason why a member of the Independent Order of Good Templars, however much he might object to the existing state of the law, should not honestly exercise the discretion which was entrusted to members of Licensing Courts by the law as it at present stood.³

At advising on 28th February 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of reduction at the instance of a wine and spirit merchant whose licence was refused at the Licensing Court held in April 1911 in the burgh of Airdrie. Various grounds of reduction have been stated, which are dealt with in the Lord Ordinary's note, but the pursuer's counsel very properly admitted that the point argued in Goodall's case,⁴ decided by us last week, could not be reopened before this Court, although technically he insisted on it in order to keep the point open for the House of Lords, if an appeal should be taken and should prove successful in Goodall's case.⁴ Accordingly the argument before your Lordships was really limited to one point, viz., that several members of the Licensing Court, and in particular the chairman thereof, were members of certain temperance societies. The chairman was admittedly a leading member of the temperance society called the Independent Order of Good Templars, and it is said that in order to obtain admission to that society you have to pledge yourself to total abstinence and also asseverate that you will, to the best of your endeavours, promote what is called the "platform" of the society—the "platform," I suppose, being the determinate policy of the society. It comprehends among other things the following:—That the person himself is to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage; that no licence in any form is to be given for the sale of liquors to be used as a beverage, and that there is to be an absolute prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating liquors, "prohibition by the will of the people expressed in due form of law with the penalties derived for a crime of such enormity."

¹ The Queen v. Rand, (1866) L. R., 1 Q. B. 230; The Queen v. Meyer, (1875) 1 Q. B. D. 173; Goodall v. Bilsland, 1909 S. C. 1152; Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration, (1889) 43 Ch. D. 366; Allinson v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration, [1894] 1 Q. B. 750.

² [1901] 2 K. B. 357.

³ Sharp v. Wakefield, [1891] A. C. 173, Lord Halsbury, L.C., at p. 181.

⁴ Supra, p. 630.

Feb. 28, 1913.

M'Geahen v.
Knox.

Ld. President.

Now it is said that anybody who has taken this pledge, and professed adhesion to this platform, is necessarily so biased as to make it inconsistent with the proper administration of the law that he should sit in the Licensing Court. The Lord Ordinary has dealt very carefully with this matter, and, in the main, I entirely agree with him, and I only add a few words because of the general importance of the case. In the first place, I should like to associate myself with a remark of Mr Justice Wright in the case of The Queen v. Huggins.¹ That case dealt with an objection to a conviction under the Merchant Shipping Act, which imposes a penalty on an unqualified pilot who assumes or continues in charge of a ship after a qualified pilot has offered to take her in charge, and in that case a qualified pilot belonging to the pilotage district within which the offence was committed had sat upon the bench. The conviction was quashed, but in the course of his opinion Mr Justice Wright says this:—"I will only add this. Some of the cases in which the Court has been asked to interfere are cases of decisions by administrative bodies, such as the London County Council and others. They are very different from cases of decisions by judicial tribunals. In my judgment the Court ought to be slow to interfere in the former; but in the latter ought to interfere on much slighter grounds." In that particular case, as necessarily follows from what I have already said, the convicting justices were sitting as a judicial tribunal. Now the present case is rather a case of an administrative body, which has, however, to sit—if I may so phrase it—in a judicial spirit. That is clear from the judgment of the House of Lords in the well-known case of Sharp v. Wakefield.² But at the same time I think that the distinction taken by Mr Justice Wright is a very wholesome one.

It would, I think, be a dangerous proceeding if one were to attempt ab ante, by words of general definition, to say precisely in what cases the Court would, and in what cases it would not, interfere; and therefore anything I am now going to say must not be taken as definitive or exhaustive, but rather as illustrative of the cases in which the Court may or may not interfere. Speaking in that spirit, and with that caution, I may say that I can scarcely imagine a case in which an administrative body would be interfered with by the Court where the objection to the person acting as a member of that body was based on an opinion he might happen to hold, where that opinion had not been carried into practical operation by any active proceeding. We have already had a case in the Courts of this country in which that matter was considered—viz., the case I referred to in my judgment in Goodall v. Bilsland.³ In that case I said that Bailie Battersby had been rightly interdicted from sitting in the Licensing Court. But that was a case where the matter had gone far beyond opinion. That gentleman had acted as the organising secretary of an association which not only professed opinions, but practically got up cases and managed them. That was obviously a case of disqualification, because, to repeat what I said in Goodall's case,³ it is contrary to the idea of elementary justice that a man should get up cases and then proceed to adjudicate upon these cases upon the bench.

¹ [1895] 1 Q. B. 563.² [1891] A. C. 173.³ 1909 S. C. 1152, at p. 1177.

The English cases which were quoted to us related mainly to decisions by Feb. 28, 1913. judicial tribunals, and there I take the same view as was expressed by Mr Justice Wright and Mr Justice Wills in the case of Huggins,¹ namely, that such decisions must be regarded with greater strictness, and that, as Mr Justice Wills said, "it is far safer to enlarge the area of this class of objections to the qualification of justices than to restrict it." But when you are dealing with decisions by administrative bodies there is a difference; and I am very much moved by this, that if we were to interfere upon the ground that the members of the administrative body in question held certain opinions, or belonged to a certain society, we should be practically placing upon them a disqualification which the Act of Parliament has not expressed. That the Legislature understands how to impose a disqualification is clear from the disqualification which it has placed upon persons having an interest in the liquor trade. It is a question of policy with which we have nothing to do, but with which Parliament had to do—whether it was fair to impose that disqualification and not to insert another with regard to persons who have, so to speak, committed themselves to a certain set of opinions. But it is not there, and I do not think it is for the Court to read into the Act of Parliament a clause which it does not contain.

Moreover, it must be kept in view that in this so called "platform" there is much that obviously cannot be effected except by way of legislation. But the point I lay stress upon is this—that there is no averment here that this gentleman was in any way affected in his conduct as chairman of the Court by the general opinions which were professed by the society of which he was a member. It is for him, in his own conscience, to know how far those general opinions can be entertained consistently with the performance of the duty which he has undertaken on oath to perform—namely, to conduct with fairness and impartiality the proceedings of the tribunal of which he is chairman. While that is so, I cannot see that anything is averred which, if proved, would compel us to hold that this gentleman had neglected his duty, and had decided the question before him, not upon the grounds upon which he is bound to decide, according to the Act of Parliament under which he sits, but according to certain preconceived opinions for which in other places he has professed an admiration.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right and should be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary. I think it is impossible for this Court to lay down as law that any man who entertains strong opinions that the present licensing system should no longer exist, or that the sale of liquor should be absolutely prohibited, is therefore incapacitated for administering the system honestly in particular cases while it still subsists.

I also agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary that whether he can conduct the administration of the statute fairly and impartially in particular cases, or whether he may not be exposed to the risk of having his judgment affected by his own strong opinions, is a question for the magis-

¹ [1895] 1 Q. B. 563.

Feb. 28, 1913. trate himself—and it may be a very delicate question ; but I think there is no authority which would justify the Court in laying it down as a matter of law that every person who entertains such opinions is thereby disqualified from performing his duty as a magistrate.

M'Gehean v.
Knox.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The averment of the pursuer in cond. 5 is that the defenders were incapable of exercising an honest judicial discretion in discharging their duty as members of the Licensing Court, and his reason for making that averment is also contained in the same article of the condescendence, namely, that the defenders are members of a body whose principles are total abstinence, no licences, and absolute prohibition. But when the averment is examined, it will be found that it really comes to no more than this, that the defenders have certain principles and that they have expressed them. The way in which it is proposed to carry into execution these principles is “by the will of the people expressed in due form of law with the penalties derived for a crime of such enormity.” It is not difficult to see what was meant to be expressed by that, although it is not very clearly worded, namely, that they intend to do all they can to bring about a change in the law. If, instead of that, they had announced that their purpose was to carry out their wishes by voting against every licence that came up in the Licensing Court, then, of course, the matter would have been entirely different, and the case for the pursuer would have been plain. There is no averment that the defenders voted against every licence, and when one considers what was done in the Licensing Court, the number of licences which were granted and the number which were refused—twenty-four were granted ultimately, I think, and eight refused—it will be seen that there was a certain discrimination, and that the defenders had not in all cases voted against the licences.

The defenders have undertaken to administer conscientiously the existing law, and they must interpret it in accordance with the principles which were laid down in the case of Sharp v. Wakefield,¹ namely, that they will fairly decide the questions submitted to them, and will not by evasion attempt to repeal the law by which public-houses exist. They have taken an oath to discharge their duty in accordance with these principles, and it is between them and their conscience whether they faithfully discharge that duty or not. But all that is necessary for the decision of the present case is to say that the mere fact that the defenders disapprove of the existing law, and have expressed their disapproval in the terms set out on record, does not necessarily mean that they cannot faithfully administer the law as it exists. It is for the Legislature, as your Lordship has already pointed out, to decide whether a section, similar to section 9 in the statute of 1903,² should or should not be introduced in future legislation, in order to debar a person with strong opinions upon the question from endeavouring to discharge that administrative duty.

THE COURT adhered.

BRUCE & BLACK, W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—Agents.

¹ [1891] A. C. 173.

² 3 Edw. VII. cap. 25.

THE BURNTISLAND HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS, Appellants.—

Cooper, K.C.—Constable, K.C.—E. O. Inglis.

ASSESSOR FOR BURNTISLAND, Respondent.—Chree, K.C.—Kemp.

No. 97.

Nov. 20, 1912.

Valuation Acts—Value—Harbour—Revenue principle—Revenue—Sum paid by tenant as penalty for failure to implement condition of lease.

Burntisland Harbour Commissioners v. Assessor for Burntisland.

The commissioners of a harbour leased a portion of the subjects belonging to them under a condition that, if the lessees had not, by a certain date, formed a company for the purpose of constructing a graving dock thereon, the lease should be null and void, and the lessees should forfeit a certain sum to the lessors. The lessees failed to form the company, and paid the forfeit.

Held that the assessor, in determining the yearly value of the harbour undertaking for the following year upon the revenue principle, was not entitled to include in revenue the sum paid as forfeit to the harbour commissioners.

At a meeting of the Burgh Valuation Committee of Burntisland held on 17th September 1912 the Burntisland Harbour Commissioners appealed against an entry in the burgh Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1913, in which they were entered as proprietors and occupiers of "Harbour and wet docks, including railway sidings and fixed machinery," at a yearly rent or value of £36,601.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Ld. Johnston.
Lord Salvesen.
Lord Cullen.

Case 315.

They craved (1) that the subjects should be valued separately, viz., as (a) the harbour and wet docks, including railway sidings and fixed machinery; (b) ground at West Shore (formerly leased to Hudson's Consolidated, Limited); (2) that the valuation of the first of these subjects should be £28,399, 4s. 2d., i.e., £8201, 15s. 10d. less than the figure fixed by the Assessor, and that the second should be valued at £1; or, if the whole subjects fell to be entered as a unum quid, that the value should be the foresaid figure of £28,399, 4s. 2d.

The Committee having dismissed the appeal, the appellants craved and obtained a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted by the parties, or were held by the Court to be proved or within the knowledge of the Court:—

"(1) That the subjects, the harbour and wet docks, including railway sidings and fixed machinery, are owned by the appellants and occupied by them, and that the ground at West Shore extending to eight acres or thereby, formerly leased to Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, was acquired by the appellants from the town-council of Burntisland in the year 1881 under powers contained in the Burntisland Harbour Act, 1881, section 59, under which the said ground was to be used solely for and in relation to harbour purposes and as part of the harbour undertaking, subject to an annual feu-duty of £30 payable by the appellants to said town-council, and with the further provision that in the event of a dock being constructed upon any part of the said lands within twenty years after the passing of said Act of 1881, the said annual feu-duty payable therefor should be raised to £60. Further, that the said ground at West Shore is vacant ground, and that there are at present no railway sidings or harbour and dock appliances thereon. (2) That the ground at West Shore was, prior to 1906, occupied by railway sidings forming part of the dock undertaking, and was for valuation purposes included as part of the harbour and wet docks, the whole being entered in the

Nov. 20, 1912. Valuation-roll as a unum quid. (3) That for the years from 1906 to 1911 the ground at West Shore was leased by the appellants (first) to Messrs J. A. Wormald and John Morrison, and (second) to Hudson's Consolidated, Limited [at a rent of £160], and that accordingly said ground was treated by the Assessor separately from the harbour and wet docks and separately entered in the Valuation-roll during these years." (4) [Here followed excerpts from the Valuation-roll, which showed that from 1906 to 1911 the "Ground, West Shore," was separately entered at a value of £160, Messrs Wormald & Morrison, and afterwards Hudson's Consolidated, being entered as tenants thereof; and that for the year 1911-12 it was also separately entered, but was described as "unlet," and the value put upon it was £1]. "(5) That by the North British Railway (General Powers) Act, 1898, section 53, the appellants were authorised to lease the said ground at the West Shore for the purpose of a graving dock, &c., and that they did so by lease between the appellants and Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, 1-4 Lombard Street, London, E.C., dated 22nd, 26th, and 27th, all days of July 1909, to which reference is made. The lease provided, inter alia, that the construction of the graving dock should be commenced by Hudson's Consolidated within six months of the date of the lease, and should be duly proceeded with and completed on or before 1st September 1911. The lease excluded assignees and subtenants unless approved by the Harbour Commissioners, but expressly provided that the Harbour Commissioners would approve of an assignment thereof to a construction company having a capital of not less than £150,000, with one-fifth thereof paid up. The lease also stipulated that in the event of the construction of the graving dock not being commenced within the period prescribed for commencement, or not being completely constructed on or before 1st September 1911, the lease should, in the option of the Harbour Commissioners, become void and null. (6) That by agreement entered into between the appellants and Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, made at the same time as the fofoesaid lease and contained in a joint letter dated July 1909, to which reference is made, it was agreed that at the date of the execution of the lease a sum of £8000 should be provided by Hudson's Consolidated and deposited in the Royal Bank of Scotland, Leven Branch, to the credit of a joint account, and that certain payments should be made out of the said £8000, and the balance then remaining to the credit of the joint account should remain for a period of six calendar months, and if a construction company, for the purpose of constructing the said graving dock, having a capital of at least £150,000, and of which one-half should have been bona fide subscribed, should not, by the expiration of the said period, have been formed by Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, and registered, the said balance of the said sum of £8000 should be forfeited to the appellants, and in such event the lease should be null and void. (7) That by another agreement between the appellants and Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, dated 15th, 21st, and 27th September 1910, to which reference is also made, it was agreed, in consequence of the said Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, not having implemented the obligations imposed by said lease and agreement contained in said joint letter, inter alia, that the said joint account should be closed, and the amount at the credit thereof, being £5060, 5s., should be paid over to the appellants, that Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, should place on deposit-receipt with

Burntisland
Harbour Commissioners v.
Assessor for
Burntisland.

the Royal Bank of Scotland, Leven, in joint names of the appellants and Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, the sum of £3000; that the period allowed for the formation and registration of the construction company should be extended to 30th November 1910; and that if the said construction company should not by 30th November 1910 have been formed and registered, the contents of the said deposit-receipt for £3000, principal and interest, should belong and be paid to the Harbour Commissioners; further, that on due completion of the said graving dock and whole works the appellants should pay to the said Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, the foresaid sum of £5060, 5s. without interest. (8) That the proposed construction company was not formed on or before 30th November 1910, and that the lease between the appellants and Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, therefore was brought to an end. (9) That the sums forfeited and paid by Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, to the appellants, amounting to £8201, 15s. 10d., are made up as follows:—

- (1) Sum conditionally forfeited to the appellants on 23rd September 1910 in terms of the aforesaid agreement between them and Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, dated, 15th, 21st, and 27th September 1910, . £5060 5 0

Interest thereon from 23rd September
1910 to 13th July 1911, . 91 9 10

£5151 14 10

- (2) Sum forfeited to the appellants by Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, through their failure to form proposed construction company as provided for in the aforesaid agreement, . £3000 0 0

Interest thereon from 23rd September
1910 to 10th June 1911, . 50 1 0 3050 1 0

£8201 15 10

(10) That in arriving at his figure of £36,601 as the value of the Harbour undertaking for the year 1912-13, the Assessor proceeded on the method adopted by him in former years of taking the gross income of the Harbour Commissioners for the previous year as shown in their abstract of accounts, and deducting therefrom the necessary expenses and other outlays, and that in the income he has included a sum amounting in all, including interest, to £8201, 15s. 10d., received by the Harbour Commissioners from Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, as above mentioned. (11) That in the appellants' abstract of accounts for the year ending 30th September 1911, the said sum of £8201, 15s. 10d. is entered; that in point of fact the whole of said sum of £8201, 15s. 10d. was paid over by the appellants to the North British Railway Company as a payment to account of arrears of interest on money borrowed by the appellants from said railway company, and that the appellants have, as matter of fact, debited against their ordinary revenue account various sums of money—such as sea wall at West Shore, £80; balance of cost of construction of sidings at Ross Brae written off, £525, 15s. 7d., expended by them in clearing and preparing the said piece of ground at West Shore for the purposes of the foresaid lease. (12) That on the appellants' abstract of accounts above mentioned for the year to 30th September 1911 being submitted to their auditor for examination and audit, the auditor in his docquet, dated Edinburgh, 14th Novem-

Nov. 20, 1912.
Burntisland
Harbour Commissioners v.
Assessor for
Burntisland.

Nov. 20, 1912.

Burntisland
Harbour Commissioners v.
Assessor for
Burntisland.

ber 1911, drew the special attention of the appellants to the fact that the said sum of £8201, 15s. 10d., which had been received from Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, as aforesaid, had been treated as revenue and paid over to the North British Railway Company as such. The auditor also stated that he was informed that this method of treating the payment would be confirmed at the next meeting of the Commissioners; that at a meeting of said Commissioners held at Burntisland on 21st November 1911 the auditor's docquet (or report) above mentioned was submitted and read, after which it, together with the abstract of accounts for said year ending 30th September 1911, was expressly approved and confirmed by said Commissioners."

The case was heard on 20th November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The Assessor was wrong in treating the ground which had been let for the graving dock and the other ground and subjects as a unum quid. They were separate and should be separately entered. It was not suggested that a startling increase in value had taken place in the other ground and subjects, and there was accordingly no justification, so far as regarded them, for the figure fixed by the Assessor. With regard to the ground let for the graving dock, it was out of the question to say that its annual value was £8201, 15s. 10d., when in fact it had for four years been entered in the Valuation-roll at £160, the rent at which it had actually been let. Even, however, if the subjects were valued as a unum quid, there was no excuse for increasing the valuation by £8201, 15s. 10d. That sum was an exceptional payment in no sense earned by the harbour or other subjects under valuation; it was not really revenue, but a capital payment representing either the price of an option or compensation for breach of contract; it did not add to the lettable value of the subjects, and would in no way be taken into account by a hypothetical tenant. The case was ruled by *Sharp v. Assessor for Caithness*¹ and Burgh of Renfrew.² The undernoted cases³ were also favourable to the appellants.

Argued for the respondent;—The subjects were rightly entered as a unum quid, the lease of the graving dock ground having come to an end and the ground being again in possession of the appellants. The respondent had rightly increased the valuation by £8201, 15s. 10d., seeing that that sum formed part of the revenue of the year under consideration, had been earned by the subjects which were being valued, and had been treated by the appellants themselves as ordinary revenue. The former rent of £160 at any rate no longer represented the true value of the graving dock ground. The true value of that ground in a question with the Commissioners was a figure representing the value of the ground converted into a graving dock; seeing that, although the ground had not actually been converted, the Commissioners had received an equivalent pecuniary payment.

¹ (1887) 24 S. L. R. 313, 15 Poor Law Mag. 262.

² (1868) 11 Macph. 979.

³ Dundee and Arbroath Joint Line Committee, (1883) 11 R. 396; Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Assessor for Greenock, (1898) 25 R. 1229; Assessor for Elginshire v. Duke of Richmond and Gordon, (1905) 7 F. 424; Coatbridge and Airdrie Electric Supply Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Coatbridge, 1907 S. C. 780; Edinburgh and Leith Gas Commissioners v. Assessor for Edinburgh, 1912 S. C. 790.

LORD JOHNSTON.—This is a very special case, and I think it is necessary Nov. 20, 1912.
to direct attention to the circumstances. The Burntisland Harbour Com-Burntisland missioners in 1881 obtained an Act whereby they acquired for a feu-duty of Harbour Com £30 the ground in question, extending, I think, to about eight acres, out-missioners v.
side their existing harbour, a part of it overflowed by the tide and a part Assessor for just above the tide, but subject to this condition that it was to be used Burntisland.
solely for or in relation to harbour purposes. That, of course, lays an embargo upon the ground which does not make it a subject of free contract for the future. In the North British Railway (General Powers) Act, 1898, there is a provision whereby the Harbour Commissioners might lease the lands in question to any company or person for the purpose of making, maintaining, and working thereon a graving dock, gridiron, shipbuilding yard, and other works and conveniences. The next step is that about eleven years afterwards Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, came forward and entered into an agreement which is titled a lease, but which is a lease of a very peculiar character. Reading that document carefully, I think it becomes pretty clear that Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, are truly in the position of middlemen or brokers, who entered into this contract with the object of forming a construction company, and, doubtless, making their profit in the course of passing this concession—which although called a lease was truly a concession—on to the construction company.

Now, that document, as I ventured to observe in the course of the argument—and on reflection I think the observation is sound—is nothing but an option to lease. It might have been so drawn in point of fact. It might have been an undertaking on the part of the Commissioners to give to Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, six months to find the tenant who would comply with the obligations of the statute and construct the necessary graving dock. The fact that they have chosen to make the contract in the form of a provisional lease does not, to my mind, alter the nature of the payment made. The payment of the £8000 odds, although not clearly so ex facie, is in reality a payment for the option to form a construction company which would undertake to make the graving dock; and the sum paid down goes to the benefit of the lessees, if the company is duly formed in terms of the contract. On the other hand, if they fail, just as a sum paid in respect of an option is forfeited, so this £8000 odds is also forfeited, and the agreement or lease becomes null and void.

Now, on 30th November 1910 Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, failed to implement their obligation to form a construction company, and the whole sum there and then became forfeited and the lease there and then came to an end. If that is the case, this sum fell into the hands of the Commissioners on 30th November 1910, at a period when the year 1910-1911 was half way through, and the question is how that £8000 odds is to be dealt with.

The printed case shows us how the ground in question has been dealt with in the matter of assessment during the last eight years. I think it has been dealt with perfectly correctly up to a certain point. During the first two years the ground was in the hands of the Harbour Commissioners under their statutes as part of their undertaking. They found no use for it, and it remained quite properly entered in the Valuation-roll—not sepa-

Nov. 20, 1912. rately, but as part of the general undertaking. We are told that following a custom, very convenient but not statutory, the Harbour Commissioners are assessed at the net returns to them, after expenses are paid, from the working of their concern. And as there was no separate return from this ground and no use made of it, it neither entered the return separately nor affected the valuation indirectly. But during the next three years the land was let to Wormald & Morrison for a rent of £160, and it was accordingly quite right for the Assessor during the third, fourth, and fifth years to enter the ground at the West Shore as a separate subject, and necessary to do so in order to bring Wormald & Morrison on to the Valuation-roll for the purposes of occupancy taxation. Therefore it was quite right to deal with the subject as a separate subject, with a definite rent of £160 and with definite tenants. After the Wormald & Morrison period you get two years in which the Harbour Commissioners are rightly entered as proprietors and Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, as tenants, and again the entry of the rent is £160.

In the course of the argument it was suggested that the £160 paid by Hudson's Consolidation, Limited, could not be taken as the true rent, but that there was a consideration other than rent. I do not think it is necessary to decide that, but my own opinion is very much to the contrary. I think this £160 is the true rent, and that the other considerations are not considerations which go to rent at all. Thus, if the transaction had gone on, during the period of construction there could not have been any further entry of value than this rent; but the moment the construction is completed you then come to a divided proprietary—the landlords, who are receiving nothing but the £160, and the long lease holders, who are under the statutes and for the purposes of the statutes owners for the time being; and their graving dock would then have to be entered as an undertaking of which they were owners; and so far as valuation and taxation go, they would then be in the position of proprietors and occupants. True, the graving dock might incidentally bring profit to the Harbour Commissioners beyond the £160 of rent, but it would be indirectly, by reason that it might be the means of bringing additional traffic to their harbour, and with it additional dues; if so, and indirectly also, their valuation would rise; because, presumably, the net returns from their undertaking would rise. But that does not affect the present question.

But to resume the narrative. In the middle of the year 1910 the sum deposited was forfeited and the lease came to an end. The suggestion is that the sum so forfeited is to be regarded as part of the net returns or profits of the Harbour Commissioners for that year, to be used as a means of fixing the valuation for the next year. I think we must, from the strictly logical point of view, treat the question as if we were dealing with the valuation for 1910-1911, during which the sum fell in. The answer to the Assessor's contention is that at that time a definite rent of £160 was being paid for the subjects, which were not in the hands of the Harbour Commissioners but in the possession of another party; and that that other party practically came forward and asked to be relieved of his obligation, not merely for the rent, but for the whole stipulations, on consideration of a payment of £8000. Now, that £8000 is not paid for possession. It is paid in order to avoid the heavy obligation of what turns out to be a very Nov. 20, 1912.

favourable contract for the Commissioners, but a disastrous one for the Burntisland nominal lessees. It seems to me, without saying anything further, that the Harbour Com-case, although differing in its circumstances, should be decided on exactly missioners v.
the same principles as the case to which we were referred—the case of Assessor for *Sharp*¹—and with the same result. For these reasons I think this valuation Ld. Johnston. requires to be altered. Mr Constable, on behalf of the Commissioners, said that he was quite prepared to consent to an entry of £30 instead of the nominal figure of £1. I desire to say, with respect to that valuation, that it must be understood as to be inserted purely of consent, and by no means on the ground of any principle accepted, or suggestion made, by the Court.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion. The question we have to decide is whether this sum of £8201, 15s. 10d., which is entered in the receipts of the Burntisland Harbour Commissioners for the year ending 30th September 1911, falls to be assessed as part of the revenue of the undertaking. I am quite clear that it is not that. It may be represented either as the price of an option, or as compensation for breach of a contract which the Harbour Commissioners had made with a third party. In either view, it seems to me, on the principles laid down in the cases of *Renfrew*² and Sharp,¹ that it does not fall to be taken into account in fixing the valuation for the Valuation-roll.

It is not every receipt which the Harbour Commissioners may obtain in the course of conducting their business that forms a basis of assessment.
That is plain from the Assessor's own action in permitting the deductions which are placed under the head of "Special and Miscellaneous Receipts."
One of these is the price of old materials sold. That is, no doubt, entered as a receipt, but it is not part of the revenue; it arises from the sale of a subject belonging to the Commissioners. In the same way the profit that the Commissioners may make by collecting the pilotage dues is not a revenue arising from heritage, nor is the profit which they make by carrying on the business of stevedores. All that is conceded by the Assessor.

It seems to me that this special payment is in precisely the same position.
It is not a recurring payment; and the inequity of supporting the Assessor's contention, which would result in the Commissioners having to pay assessment upon what may be regarded as the capitalised value of the obligations undertaken by the lessees, appears from the fact that in the next year or the year after they might get a tenant who would pay even a higher rent than the rent which Hudson's Consolidated, Limited, were under obligation to pay. Of course the moment such a lease was granted the Assessor would be entitled to put both the landlord and tenant upon the Valuation-roll in respect of the amount of rent payable under the lease, while all the time the burgh authorities would have in their pocket what represented the capitalised assessment on the footing that this ground would never be let again. I think that consideration, in addition to those which your Lordship in the chair has referred to, makes it plain that this is not revenue from heritage at all, and therefore does not fall to enter the Valuation-roll.

¹ 24 S. L. R. 313, 15 Poor Law Mag. 262.

² 11 Macph. 979.

Nov. 20, 1912. LORD CULLEN.—If the ground in question be regarded as a separate subject of valuation, it seems to me to be quite clear that the sum of £8201, 15s. 10d. can in no sense be treated as rent paid for the ground, or as representing the annual lettable value of it. It is something quite different in its nature. Now, if that be so, I am unable to see how, by proceeding to treat the ground and the rest of the harbour property as a unum quid, the sum of £8201, 15s. 10d. can be regarded as a contribution of annual lettable value made by the said ground to the total annual lettable value of the undertaking as a heritable subject of valuation. It no doubt enters the harbour accounts as part of the receipts during the year; but, looking to its true nature, it is not a receipt on which it is possible to base a calculation of the amount of rent which a hypothetical tenant might be expected to pay for the subjects.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the magistrates was wrong, and that the harbour and wet docks, including railway sidings and fixed machinery, along with the ground at West Shore, should be entered in the Roll as a unum quid, and, of consent, at an annual value of £28,429, 4s. 2d.

JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.—PARTY—Agents.

No. 98.

A. J. WILSON & COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—Wilton.
ASSESSOR FOR KINCARDINESHIRE, Respondent.—A. R. Brown.

Dec. 17, 1912.

A. J. Wilson & Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Kincardineshire.

Valuation Acts—Subjects—Advertisement board—Contract permitting erection of board—Whether owner of land or owner of board the “occupier” of site—Whether board a “heritable erection”—Statute—Applicability to Scotland—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), secs. 1 and 6—Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 27), sec. 3—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 41), sec. 4.

The Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889 (which expressly applies to Ireland, but contains no mention of Scotland), by sec. 3 enacts:—“Where any land is used temporarily or permanently for the exhibition of advertisements . . . but not otherwise occupied, the person who shall permit the same to be so used, or (if he cannot be ascertained) the owner thereof, shall be deemed to be in beneficial occupation of such land or part thereof, and shall be rateable in respect thereof to the relief of the poor and to all local rates, according to the value of such use as aforesaid.”

The owner of hotel premises entered into an agreement with a firm of billposters by which, for an annual payment of 10s. 6d., he permitted them to affix an advertisement board for tyres to a part of his premises to be afterwards determined. The permission was to remain in force for three years and thereafter to be ended by three months' notice from either party. The agreement provided that the firm should have reasonable access to the premises for purposes connected with the board, and also that no other advertisement of a tyre was to be displayed on the premises. Following on this agreement a board was erected on a strip of vacant ground in front of the hotel and the “site” of the board was entered by the Assessor in the Valuation-roll at the yearly rent or value of 10s. 6d. and the firm of billposters as “tenants” and “occupiers.” In an appeal at their instance they contended that they should not have been entered as tenants or occupiers in respect (1) that the agreement was not a lease but a licence, (2) that under sec. 3 of the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, the owner of the land being the person who "permitted" the ground to be used for advertisement must be deemed to be the "occupier."

Dec. 17, 1912.
A. J. Wilson & Co., Limited,
v. Assessor for Kincardineshire.

Held that the entry was correct under the Lands Valuation Acts in respect that the agreement was in effect an ordinary lease of a portion of land at a yearly rent, and that the Act of 1889 (if applicable to Scotland, as to which opinions reserved) in no way altered the prescribed mode of making up the Valuation-roll under the Valuation Acts.

Opinions reserved upon the question whether the advertisement board was a "heritable erection," within the meaning of sec. 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, falling to be entered in the Valuation-roll.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County Council of Kincardineshire held at Stonehaven on 12th September 1912, A. J. Wilson & Company, Limited, London, appealed against the following entries in the Valuation-roll of the county for the year 1912-1913:—

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Ld. Johnston.
Lord Salvesen.
Lord Cullen.

Description and Situation of Subject.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Site for Advertising Board, Cammachmore, Newtonhill.	Robert Bridgeford, Publican.	A. J. Wilson & Co., Ltd., 154 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C., per James B. Connon, Solicitor, Stonehaven.	Tenants.	10/6
Advertising Board, Cammachmore.	A. J. Wilson & Co., Ltd., 154 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C., per James B. Connon, Solicitor, Stonehaven.		Proprietors.	10/

Case 213.

They craved that their name should be deleted from the first entry, and that the second entry should be entirely deleted.

The following narrative of facts is taken from the opinion of Lord Cullen:—

"The appellants in this case carry on the business of advertisement contractors. In July 1910 they made an agreement with Robert Bridgeford, innkeeper, Cammachmore, Newtonhill, Kincardine, whereby Mr Bridgeford, who is the owner of the premises now in question, agreed by letter of 22nd July 1910 to permit the appellants 'to affix a Dunlop tyre poster on that part of my premises at Aberdeen Road arranged by myself and Mr J. I. Paxton, of Messrs A. J. Wilson & Company, Limited, this permission to remain in force for a period of three years, and thereafter to be put an end to by either party giving three months' notice in writing.' The consideration stipulated for is a payment to Mr Bridgeford of 10s. 6d. The appellants are to have reasonable access to the premises 'for the purpose of taking down, repairing, or renewing the said poster,' and it is provided 'no

Dec. 17, 1912. other advertisement of a tyre to be displayed on the same field, wall, fence, or house.'

A. J. Wilson &
Co., Limited,
v. Assessor for Kincardine-
shire.

"The appellants, following on said agreement, erected on the selected site a wooden board displaying an advertisement of Dunlop tyres. The said board is described in the case as 'an ordinary advertising board erected upon posts sunk into the ground and supported by wooden props or stays.'

"In these circumstances the Assessor made two entries in the county Valuation-roll. In the first place he entered the ground occupied by the advertising board at the value of 10s. 6d., Mr Bridgeford as the proprietor thereof, and the appellants as the tenants. In the second place, proceeding on the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, he entered the board itself as a heritable erection falling to be valued in terms of that Act, and the appellants as the proprietors and occupiers thereof at the annual value of 10s.

"No question has been raised in this appeal as to the amount of the annual values so entered by the Assessor."

The Committee sustained the entries and dismissed the appeal, finding "(1) that the appellants were lessees of the site of the board under the agreement contained in the letter, dated 22nd July 1910, from Robert Bridgeford to the appellants, and the appellants' reply thereto, dated 3rd August 1910, and that they accordingly fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll as tenants and occupiers of the said site; (2) that the board was an erection made by the appellants in terms of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, and that the appellants accordingly fell to be entered in the Roll as proprietors and occupiers thereof; (3) that the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, cited by the appellants, did not apply to Scotland, and in any case dealt exclusively with assessment, and did not in any way affect any entries required by the Valuation Acts * to be made in the Valuation-roll."

* The Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "The commissioners of supply of every county and the magistrates of every burgh in Scotland respectively shall annually cause to be made up a Valuation-roll, showing the yearly rent or value for the time of the whole lands and heritages within such county or burgh respectively . . . and the names and designations of the proprietors or reputed proprietors, and where there are tenants or occupiers, of the tenants and of the occupiers thereof respectively. . . ."

Sec. 6. "In estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages under this Act, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year; . . . and where such lands and heritages are bona fide let for a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value thereof without grassum or consideration other than the rent, such rent shall be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages in terms of this Act. . . ."

The Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 27), enacts:—

Sec. 2. "In this Act the term 'owner' means the person for the time being receiving or entitled to receive the rackrent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive or be entitled

The appellants obtained a case for appeal, which was heard on 20th Dec. 17, 1912. November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The appellants' names should be deleted from the first entry in the Valuation-roll, they being neither the tenants nor the occupiers of the site of the hoarding. Under the agreement, all that they had was a licence¹ to put up the hoarding upon the proprietor's ground and a limited right of access to the proprietor's ground for purposes connected with their property. The payment they made to the proprietor was not rent for the ground on which the hoarding stood, but payment for the privilege of putting it up on ground still legally occupied by the proprietor. It was erroneous to represent the hoarding as really occupying ground, but, if it did, the occupancy was that of the proprietor, who merely permitted the appellant, for a pecuniary consideration, to erect the hoarding. Accordingly, even if regard were had only to the Valua-

A. J. Wilson & Co., Limited,
v. Assessor for Kincardineshire.

to receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rackrent; and the word 'person' shall be deemed to include any body of persons, whether corporate or unincorporate."

Sec. 3. "Where any land is used temporarily or permanently for the exhibition of advertisements, or for the erection of any hoarding, frame, post, wall, or structure, used for the exhibition of advertisements, but not otherwise occupied, the person who shall permit the same to be so used, or (if he cannot be ascertained) the owner thereof, shall be deemed to be in beneficial occupation of such land or part thereof, and shall be rateable in respect thereof to the relief of the poor and to all local rates, according to the value of such use as aforesaid."

Sec. 4. "Where any land or hereditament occupied for other purposes and rateable in respect thereof to the relief of the poor and local rates is used temporarily or permanently for the exhibition of advertisements, or for the erection thereon or attachment thereto of any hoarding, frame, post, wall, or structure, used for the exhibition of advertisements, the gross and rateable value of such land or hereditament shall be so estimated as to include the increased value from such use as aforesaid."

The Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 41), enacts:—Sec. 4. "Section 6 of the Valuation Act, 1854, shall be read and construed as if the following proviso were inserted after the words 'as compared with the amount of such valuation,' that is to say—'Provided also that where any lessee of any such lands and heritages, holding under a lease or agreement, the stipulated duration of which is twenty-one years or under from the date of the entry under the same, and in the case of minerals thirty-one years or under from the date of such entry, has made or acquired erections or structural improvements on the subjects let, and where the actual yearly value of such erections or structural improvements cannot, under the provision of section 6 of this Act, be entered in the Valuation-roll, such erections or structural improvements shall be deemed to be lands and heritages within the meaning of this Act, and such lessee shall be deemed to be proprietor thereof for the purposes of this Act, and the assessor shall ascertain the yearly value of such erections or structural improvements as a separate subject, by taking the amount of rent, if any, in addition to the rent stipulated to be paid under such lease or agreement at which, one year with another, the subjects let and such erections or structural improvements might together in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year, in consequence of such erections or structural improvements having been made, and shall make a separate entry thereof in the Valuation-roll, setting forth all the particulars relating thereto, as hereinbefore provided with respect to other lands and heritages.'"

¹ Provincial Bill Posting Co. v. Low Moor Iron Co., [1909] 2 K. B. 344.

Dec. 17, 1912. A. J. Wilson & Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Kincardine-shire. tion Acts, it was clear that the appellants could not be entered as tenants or occupiers of the site. But the Advertisement Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, which, on this matter, superseded the Valuation Acts, led directly to the same conclusion. The effect of sections 2 to 4 of that Act was to impose upon the owner of the land, and not the owner of the hoarding, all burdens connected with valuation, and under section 3 the proprietor was directly made the occupier of the site. The Act applied to Scotland, and its applicability had not been doubted in the case of Fry & Sons v. Assessor for Edinburgh.¹ It was perfectly general in its terms, and there was nothing expressly or impliedly excluding Scotland²; and the technicalities of the laws of England and Scotland in matters of mere expression, such as valuation and rating, fell to be disregarded, and the language of the Legislature taken in its popular sense.³ Burton v. St Giles's and St George's Assessment Committee,⁴ showed that the person who permitted the land to be used for advertisements, and who was accordingly under section 3 of the Act the occupier, was not the advertisement contractor but the owner of the lands. As to the second entry, it should be wholly deleted, as the advertisement board was not a heritable erection within the meaning of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellants were rightly entered as tenants and occupiers of the site of the hoarding under the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, sections 1 and 6, they being, under their contract with the proprietor, lessees⁵ of the spot of ground which it occupied. The extent of the ground and the object for which it was let were immaterial. The Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, did not apply to Scotland; it was an Act applying only to England and Ireland, and dealt with rating and not valuation.⁶ But even if it did apply, the entry was right, in respect that the appellants, and not the proprietor, were the persons who had permitted the ground to be used for a hoarding within the meaning of section 3. The present case was indistinguishable from, and was ruled by, Beith v. Assessor for Glasgow,⁷ in which all the arguments now submitted by the appellants had been considered and rejected by Lord Kyllachy in an opinion which the respondent now respectfully adopted as his argument. The second entry was also correct, the advertising board being a heritable erection within the meaning of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895.⁸

At advising on 17th December 1912,—

LORD CULLEN (in his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord

¹ (1893) 20 R. 622.

² Bridges v. Fordyce, (1844) 6 D. 968, Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, at p. 972; Perth Water Commissioners v. M'Donald, &c., (1879) 6 R. 1050.

³ Lord Saltoun v. The Advocate-General, (1860) 3 Macq. 659, Lord Chancellor Campbell, at p. 671.

⁴ [1900] 1 Q. B. 389. Vide also cases cited in Ryde on Rating, (3rd ed.) p. 810, note g.

⁵ Rankine on Leases, (2nd ed.) p. 1.

⁶ Glasgow Parish Council v. Assessor for Glasgow, 1912 S. C. 818.

⁷ (1904) 6 F. 504.

⁸ Lord Johnston referred to Taylor v. Overseers of Pendleton, (1887) 19 Q. B. D. 289.

Johnston).—[After the narrative already quoted]—The appellants maintain, Dec. 17, 1912. inter alia, that the first of these two entries is not justified by the Act of 1854. They say that the agreement between them and Mr Bridgeford does not amount to a lease, but what they describe as a licence to go on the ground and to do something on it, to wit, to set up the advertising board.

A. J. Wilson &
Co., Limited,
v. Assessor for Kincardine-
shire.

It appears to me that this question is ruled by the decision of this Court in the case of Beith v. Assessor for Glasgow.¹ The question there related to a hoarding erected by Beith, an advertisement contractor, along the frontage of certain unoccupied ground situated at the junction of two streets in Glasgow. He had right only to use the ground for the hoarding, and he paid the owners a sum of £25 per annum. The Assessor entered the site of the hoarding in the Valuation-roll at the annual value of £25, on the footing that it had been let to Beith at that rent. This entry was upheld. Lord Kyllachy, who gave the leading judgment, said: "The extent of the ground is of no consequence, nor does it matter whether it is simply a strip of frontage or includes the area around which the frontage extends. It is equally immaterial for what purpose the ground was let. The tenancy was an ordinary tenancy of land at a yearly rent, and as such it is, under the statute, imperative that it should enter the Valuation-roll, and enter it exactly in terms of the entry complained of."

Lord Cullen.

I do not think the appellants have succeeded in showing that there is any real difference between that case and this. The ground here in question is of trifling extent. But it has an ascertained annual value of 10s. 6d., the amount which is paid, under contract, by the appellants for the right to occupy it in the way they do, and I can see no good reason why this ascertained annual value should not enter the Valuation-roll. A proprietor of land may turn it to annual value in many different ways, and if he lets it, he may let it in such portions, large or small, as may yield the highest return, or as best suits himself. If he owns a field, of a very small portion of which he grants a right of occupancy for a stated annual payment (as here), and which, quoad ultra, he lets for grazing purposes to someone else for a stated annual payment, the two payments received by him make up together the total annual value by way of rent drawn by him from the ground, and the smaller must enter the Roll as well as the larger.

The next question relates to the separate entry of the advertising board itself at the annual value of 10s. This entry has been made on an application of the Lands Valuation Amendment Act of 1895. That Act was passed to meet a class of case which often presented itself where a tenant, holding at a fixed rent, under a lease of not more than twenty-one years duration or, in the case of minerals, thirty-one years, had put up for the purposes of his occupation houses or other erections on the land let to him. Under the Act of 1854 the rent in the lease fell to be taken as the measure of valuation, and the houses or other erections could not be entered in the Roll, seeing that the proprietor received nothing in respect of them. The Act of 1895 met such cases by providing that where such a tenant "has made or acquired erections or structural improvements on the subjects let," these shall be entered in the Roll as lands and heritages within the

Dec. 17, 1912. meaning of the Act of 1854, and that the tenant shall be deemed to be proprietor thereof for the purposes of that Act.

A. J. Wilson &
Co., Limited,
v. Assessor for Kincardine-
shire.

Lord Cullen.

The question which here arises is whether the said advertising board is a heritable erection of the kind falling within the meaning of the Act of 1895. There is no definition of the word "erection" in that Act. And so, I take it, one is thrown back on the general rule that all lands and heritages which have an annual value must be entered in the Roll at that value. And as the board has, ex concessis, an annual value of 10s. it follows that, if it is heritable in character, it must be entered in the Roll. Now, on the question whether the board is so affixed to the ground as to be pars soli, we had no argument at all from the appellants' counsel, owing, no doubt, to the appellants having desired to concentrate attention on the effect of the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, to which I shall refer immediately. No authority of any kind was quoted. The topic was merely mentioned and left. The question may perhaps come to be a nice one; and I have not considered it incumbent on me to make an investigation, which the appellants themselves have not essayed, into the very numerous authorities in this difficult branch of law. The board is undoubtedly firmly fixed to the solum. The Valuation Committee have upheld the Assessor's view that it is a heritable erection under the Act of 1895. The appellants have not chosen to submit any real argument on the subject. I propose, therefore, that we should not interfere with the determination of the Valuation Committee. This will only rule the present year's Roll. In case the question should be properly put before us in any future year I entirely reserve my opinion on it.

I have so far dealt with the case from the point of view of the Lands Valuation Acts of 1854 and 1895. The appellants, however, laid the stress of their argument on the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, the leading provisions of which are quoted in the case. The appellants, under section 3, contended that the owner, Mr Bridgeford, should be entered in the Roll both as owner and occupier of the ground occupied by the advertising board in question. In their first ground of appeal they contend that "they are exempt" under the Act of 1889. This appears to mean exemption from rateability.

The Act of 1889 was brought prominently before this Court in the case of Beith,¹ which I have already referred to, and the question was there raised whether it applied to Scotland. Grave doubts were expressed both by Lord Kyllachy and by Lord Stormonth-Darling as to whether it did so apply. There is no exclusion of Scotland in the Act. But there is a good deal about it to suggest that the case of Scotland was, at least, in no way before the minds of its framers. There is in the Act a linking together of occupancy and rateability which reflects the rating law of England but is in dissonance with that of Scotland, where rating on occupancy alone is exceptional. It would appear from section 6 of the Act relative to Ireland that there are special Acts there in force regarding the valuation of rateable property; and that section makes special provision for the application of the Act of 1889 to Ireland in view of these. No special provision of any kind is made with regard to Scotland, although the incidence of rating, Dec. 17, 1912. generally, is here different from that obtaining in England, and a Valuation-roll which, inter alia, forms the basis of rating is annually made up under special Acts confined to this country which are self-contained and prescribe how that Roll shall be framed. The Valuation-roll so made up in terms of our Lands Valuation Acts is not exclusively a basis for rating. It also, for example, bears on the registration of parliamentary voters. Thus the 17th section of the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Act, 1856,¹ provides that the Valuation-roll made up in terms of the Act of 1854 shall form prima facie proof as to gross rent or value, and also "that the persons therein set forth as proprietors, tenants, and occupants respectively have, for the period to which such valuation applies, been such proprietors, tenants, and occupants respectively as therein stated."

¹ 6 F. 504.

A. J. Wilson &
Co., Limited.
v. Assessor for Kincardine-
shire.
Lord Cullen.

This Court and the inferior valuation tribunals under the Scottish Lands Valuation Acts are not directly concerned with rating, the incidence thereof, or any exceptions therefrom. Their function solely is to make up annually a Valuation-roll in terms of these Acts. Now, the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act of 1889 bears to be a rating statute. In its application to England, presumably, no difficulty presents itself, as there is in England, as I understand, no Valuation-roll made up under independent Lands Valuation Acts as in Scotland, and what is made up is a rating-roll. The Act of 1889, as I have mentioned, specially provides for the case of Ireland. But it contains nothing, as I can construe it, which repeals or alters, for Scotland, the provisions of the Scottish Lands Valuation Acts regulating the mode of making up the yearly Valuation-roll under these Acts. And upon these, I think, we are bound to proceed. I do not, from this point of view, deem it necessary or fitting to express any opinion on the question of the application of the Act of 1889 to Scotland. If it does so apply, I can see difficulties in working it out. I limit myself to the opinion that it does not alter the prescribed mode of making up the Valuation-roll under our Lands Valuation Acts.

Following the views which I have expressed, I am of opinion that this appeal should be refused.

LORD JOHNSTON and LORD SALVESEN concurred.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right except as to their third finding, and sustained the entries.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—WILLIAM B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 58.

No. 99

Dec. 17, 1912.

Assessor for
Aberdeen v.
Magistrates
of Aberdeen.Assessor for Lanark v.
Magistrates
of Lanark.ASSESSOR FOR ABERDEEN, Appellant.—Murray, K.C.—Lippe.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF THE CITY PARISH OF ABERDEEN,

Complainers (Appellants).—*A. R. Brown.*THE LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF THE CITY
OF ABERDEEN, Respondents.—*Chree, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.*ASSESSOR FOR LANARK, Appellant.—*Party.*THE PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF LANARK, Respondents.—Morton.Valuation Acts—Subjects—Value—Sewers and purification works in burgh —“Lands and heritages”—Method of valuation.Held that sewers and sewerage purification works in a burgh were “lands and heritages” within the meaning of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, and as such fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll at their true and not at a merely nominal value.Observations on the principles upon which their yearly value should be determined.*Aberdeen Case.*Lands Valuation Appeal
Court.
Ld. Johnston.
Lord Salvesen.
Lord Cullen.At a Court of the Burgh Valuation Committee of Aberdeen held there on 10th September 1912, the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1913 :—

Description of Subject.	Proprietor.	Tenant and Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Burgh of Aberdeen Sewers.	Town-Council.	Proprietors.	£17,000.

They craved that the sewers should not be entered in the Roll and that the entry should be deleted.The Parish Council of the City Parish of Aberdeen complained under section 13 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, and section 6 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879, against the entry, and craved that the valuation of the subjects should be increased to £19,000.The Valuation Committee were of the opinion that the sewers ought not to be entered in the Roll, and accordingly sustained the appeal, and directed that the entry should be deleted.The Assessor and the Parish Council craved and obtained a case for appeal.The case set forth that the following facts were admitted to be the facts of the case :—“(1) The sewers in question were formed partly by the Aberdeen Police Commissioners and partly by the Town-Council under the powers contained in the Aberdeen City Acts, 1862 to 1911. The powers and duties of the Aberdeen Police Commissioners are now vested in the Town-Council under the Aberdeen Municipality Extension Act, 1871. The sewers are formed under the public streets of the city (with certain exceptions where it was found to be necessary to carry them through enclosed or other land) and discharge into the sea through an outfall sewer constructedCases 316, 317.

across the River Dee. . . . (3) The sewers are constructed entirely underground and (with the exception of the manholes) occupy no part of the surface. The length of the sewers is slightly under 100 miles. (4) The matter which the sewers convey consists of the sewage and rain water from the various buildings and premises within the city as well as surface water from the street channels. (5) The sewers are maintained by the Town-Council by means of an assessment upon owners levied under the authority of the City Acts. The assessment is also applied in payment of interest on the amount borrowed to meet the cost of construction of the sewers and towards the sinking fund. (6) A statement was put in by the Town-Council. The figures in that statement relating to the cost of the sewerage system as laid down within the city from 1864 to 31st May 1912 (£376,630) and the capital value of abandoned sewers (£20,000) were admitted by the Assessor, and are also admitted by the Parish Council for the purposes of this case.”

Dec. 17, 1912.

Assessor for
Aberdeen v.
Magistrates
of Aberdeen.Assessor for Lanark v.
Magistrates
of Lanark.

Lanark Case.

This was an appeal by the Assessor for Lanark against a decision of the Valuation Committee deleting from the Roll an entry of sewerage purification works, which had been entered at a value of £210.

The works, which were situated within the burgh, consisted of two underground tanks for purification by the septic process, and also storm water beds and filter tanks. Parties were agreed that if the subjects fell to be entered in the Roll the value should be £187, 10s.

The two cases were heard on 21st November 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The sewers and purification works were “lands and heritages” within the meaning of the Valuation Acts, and, in particular, of section 1 of the Act of 1854.¹ The fact that they were not among the enumerated “lands and heritages” in section 42 was immaterial, because that section was meant merely to give an aid to interpretation and not an exhaustive definition. The section did not say lands and heritages shall “mean” the things enumerated, but merely shall “include.”² It was out of the question to say that a public sewer was merely a “pertinent” of the houses which it served and as such was already valued in the Roll, if for no other reason than that public sewers served public streets as well as private houses. A similar argument might be put forward in favour of gas and water mains, which had, however, always entered the Roll. (2) The sewers and purification works were in the occupation of the Town-Council, who exercised the sole management and control. The case for occupation by the Town-Council was a fortiori of Glasgow Parish Council v. Assessor for Glasgow,³ where it was held that the Town-Council occupied the public parks. (3) The occupation was valuable, and therefore the sewers and purification works fell to be entered in the Roll at their true annual value and not at a merely nominal figure. It was true that the Town-Council derived no profit from their occupation, but they were thereby enabled to perform a statutory duty, and this made the occupation valuable. All three points had already

¹ 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91.

² The Queen v. Kershaw, (1856) 6 E. & B. 999, at p. 1007; Dilworth v. Commissioners of Stamps, [1899] A. C. 99, at p. 105.

³ 1912 S. C. 818.

Dec. 17, 1912. been decided in favour of the appellants both in Scotland¹ and in England.²

Assessor for
Aberdeen v.
Magistrates
of Aberdeen.

Assessor for
Lanark v.
Magistrates
of Lanark.

Argued for the respondents;—The Valuation Committees had been right in deleting the entries from the Valuation-roll. Sewers and sewerage works were not "lands and heritages" within the meaning of the Valuation Acts; they were not included in the enumeration of section 42 of the Act of 1854, which must have been meant to be exhaustive, and they were quite different from the subjects there enumerated. They were "pertinents" of buildings; and as such they had already been included in the Roll, and valued along with the buildings to which they pertained. Water and gas mains were in a different category, as they formed sources of profit to their owners, and were a part of profitable commercial undertakings. On the other hand, no profit was derivable from sewers, and, if they fell to be entered in the Roll at all, it ought to be at a merely nominal figure. English cases were not authoritative in Scotland in questions of valuation, because English cases dealt with rating, which was quite a different subject. The cases of the *Inveresk Paper Company*³ and the *Magistrates of Dundee v. Assessor for Forfarshire*⁴ were distinguishable. The former case dealt with a private sewer; and in the latter case the sewer in question was situated in the county of Forfar, but served the burgh of Dundee, and accordingly could not be said to enhance the letting value of any heritable subject in the county, or to have already entered the county Valuation-roll as a pertinent of any such subject. If these works entered the Roll at all, the value put upon them should be purely nominal, as they were not subjects capable of profitable or valuable occupation.

Counsel were also heard upon the question at what yearly value the Aberdeen sewers should be entered, assuming that they fell to be entered at all, and assuming that the value was not merely nominal. The import of the argument appears sufficiently from Lord Salvesen's opinion.

At advising on 17th December 1912,—

Aberdeen Case.

LORD SALVESEN.—The question in this case is whether the Town-Council of Aberdeen fall to be entered in the Valuation-roll as proprietors and occupiers of the sewers by which the drainage of the city is conveyed to the sea. These sewers have been constructed under statutory powers, and are mainly formed under the public streets of the city, although in certain cases they have been carried through unenclosed or other lands. With the exception of the manholes the sewers are constructed entirely underground, and their length is slightly under 100 miles. The matter which they convey consists of sewage and rain water from the buildings and streets

¹ Inveresk Paper Co. v. Assessor for Musselburgh, 1907 S. C. 747; Magistrates of Dundee v. Assessor for Forfarshire, 1912 S. C. 848; Glasgow Parish Council v. Assessor for Glasgow, 1912 S. C. 818.

² West Kent Main Sewerage Board v. Dartford Union Assessment Committee, &c., [1911] A. C. 171; Ystradyfodgw and Pontypridd Main Sewerage Board v. Bensted, [1907] A. C. 264.

³ 1907 S. C. 747.

⁴ 1912 S. C. 848.

within the city. They are maintained by means of an assessment levied Dec. 17, 1912. upon owners under the authority of sundry local Acts.

The Assessor entered their annual value at the sum of £17,000, but the Valuation Committee sustained an appeal at the instance of the Town-Council, and directed that the entry should be deleted from the Roll.

Since the Valuation Act was passed in 1854 sewers have never entered the Valuation-roll of any burgh, the general view taken by Assessors apparently being that such sewers, although not directly rated, did appear indirectly in the Roll, and contributed to the rates by enhancing the letting value of the houses which they served. This is the view taken by Mr Armour in his work on Rating, and affords an explanation of the practice which has hitherto prevailed. The action of the Assessor of Aberdeen therefore constitutes a new departure, which, if it be sustained, cannot fail to have very wide-reaching results. Personally I cannot but regret this attempt to disturb a practice which has so long prevailed, and which, but for the difference in the incidence of the various rates which are levied on the basis of the Valuation-roll, would be of no practical importance. The Parish Council, however, who are charged with the duty of levying poor and school-rates, find it in their interests that every kind of heritage which is capable of a separate valuation should enter the Roll. The higher the assessable value of lands and heritages within their area the lower will be the rate which they require to levy in order to meet a given annual expenditure, and as the sewage rate is levied upon owners only, while the poor-rate is payable equally by owners and occupiers, the inclusion of this substantial new item hitherto exempt from taxation affects the proportion of taxes falling to be contributed by a large body of individual taxpayers. It is not therefore surprising that the Parish Council have appeared to support the Assessor's appeal, and indeed it is perhaps not unfair to assume that the innovation is due to their initiative.

Two alternative views were presented on behalf of the Town-Council. They maintained (1) that sewers are not lands and heritages within the meaning of the Valuation Act of 1854, and (2) that they are parts or pertinents of subjects which have already been included in the Roll, and that there is thus a double valuation if they are separately rated.

The first view was based on the language of section 42, which provides that the expression "lands and heritages" shall extend to and include the subjects therein specially enumerated. It was maintained that this enumeration is exhaustive, and that as drains and sewers are not mentioned, they are not lands and heritages within the meaning of the Act. The argument would have been irresistible if, instead of using the words "shall extend to and include," the statute had simply said "shall mean"; but I think it is well settled that an interpretation clause in the form of section 42 is exegetical merely, and does not really define. Now it has already been decided in two cases in this Court (The Inveresk Paper Company,¹ and Magistrates of Dundee ²) that an underground sewer falls within the description of lands and heritages, and, as it is capable of being separately valued, must enter the Valuation-roll. The question was perhaps not concluded

Assessor for
Aberdeen v.
Magistrates
of Aberdeen.

Assessor for
Lanark v.
Magistrates
of Lanark.

Lord Salvesen.

¹ 1907 S. C. 747.

² 1912 S. C. 848.

Dec. 17, 1912. by these two decisions, for the argument on section 42 was not there pointedly maintained, but, having heard what was to be said upon it, I see no reason to doubt the soundness of the decisions arrived at.

Assessor for
Aberdeen v.
Magistrates
of Aberdeen.

Assessor for
Lanark v.
Magistrates
of Lanark.

Lord Salvesen.

The alternative argument for the respondents was that the drains of Aberdeen are pertinents of the buildings, and that their value is already included in the rental. I have great sympathy with this view. The rating value of any urban tenement must to some extent depend on the fact that it is connected with an efficient drainage system. It may further be said that the modern method of conveying sewage and surface water in underground pipes is merely a civilised substitute for the gutters by means of which all liquid sewage as well as rain water was in ancient times carried away. I am, however, unable to sustain the view that the system of sewers constructed by the Town-Council and under their administration can be regarded as a pertinent of the buildings which they drain. These buildings belong to other proprietors, and it is difficult to understand how the property of the Corporation can be regarded as pertinents of the properties of individual citizens of Aberdeen. Whether sewers may on other grounds be exempt from assessment is not a matter with which we are concerned. Our sole duty is to see that all lands and heritages enter the Valuation-roll at their fair annual value. It is worthy of note, however, that in England it has now been settled by a decision of the House of Lords that sewers, whether overground or underground, are rateable notwithstanding that they had enjoyed an exemption from taxation for a period of several hundreds of years.¹

The remaining question is at what yearly value the system of sewers ought to be entered. On this matter I am bound to say that we did not receive much assistance from counsel on either side; and I think we are only in a position to fix the principles on which the valuation should be made, leaving the parties to adjust the figure. The only possible hypothetical tenant for such a system would be a body having the like statutory duty to drain the City of Aberdeen that is laid upon the respondents by their various local Acts. What would such a tenant give by way of rent for the existing system? Obviously no more than it would cost him year by year if he provided a new system for himself. The items of annual expenditure would thus be, in the first place, interest on the capital sum expended on efficient sewers which would all be utilised in connection with the system, such interest being taken at $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. In addition he would have to provide a sinking fund to meet the annual depreciation of the sewers. The Assessor admits that $33\frac{1}{3}$ years is less than the probable life of a sewer pipe, and it was conceded in argument that probably the true figure might be taken at fifty years; although it is conceivable that some portions of the system might not be subject even to so much depreciation as that, as, for instance, if there are any stone-built culverts or the like. Third, the tenant would have to meet the expense of maintenance, which must be distinguished from cost of renewals, as otherwise depreciation would be twice charged. These appear to be the chief items which the hypothetical tenant would take into account in fixing his rent.

¹ West Kent Main Sewage Board, [1911] A. C. 171.

It was suggested that as the sewers are already old the capital value of the system on which interest falls to be annually charged should be taken at the depreciated value. I do not think so. So long as the sewers are efficient the hypothetical tenant would pay the same rent, as his only alternative would be to construct new sewers for himself. These being the main considerations, no doubt the parties will be able to adjust the proper figure at which to enter the undertaking for the present year. It may be that other considerations may enter into the calculation; but as the question of value has not been fully gone into, either in the case or in the argument, we have not the means of determining these. I desire, however, to guard myself against the assumption that this valuation will necessarily fix the valuations of other undertakings of a similar character, although no doubt it will go far to determine the basis of such valuations.

Assessor for
Aberdeen v.
Magistrates
of Aberdeen.

Assessor for
Lanark v.
Magistrates
of Lanark.

Lord Salvesen.

LORD CULLEN (in his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord Johnston).—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

The subjects in question are the city sewers of Aberdeen. These are heritable subjects of large annual value. They are owned by the respondents, the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of the city and royal burgh of Aberdeen.

The question has been raised whether such sewers are, in their nature, a species of property falling within the scope of the words "lands and heritages," as used in the Act of 1854. I am of opinion that they are. Sewers are not specifically mentioned in the enumeration contained in the 42nd section of that Act, but that enumeration has never, so far as I am aware, been regarded as an exhaustive enumeration of all the different species of property falling to be entered in the Valuation-roll. In the Inveresk case¹ a mill aqueduct was held to be a subject falling to be entered in the Roll, and last year we sustained an entry in the Roll for the county of Forfar of a portion of the main outlet sewer of Dundee. Sewer pipes are, moreover, ejusdem generis with water-pipes and gas-pipes, which are undoubtedly proper subjects of valuation.

In no previous instance, it would seem, have the sewers of a town been entered in a burgh Valuation-roll. This fact cannot, in itself, justify a continuance of the practice of omitting them, but can only, at the most, suggest for consideration whether there may not underly the practice some good ground of principle which supports it. In England, prior to 1911, underground sewers had for centuries been treated as exempt from rating, but this de facto exemption was, in the West Kent case,² found to rest on no legal principle, and it was then decided that such sewers are rateable subjects in England.

The respondents in this case do not rest their argument merely on the practice which has hitherto prevailed of omitting town sewers. They advance the view that that practice is not an arbitrary one, but is founded on sound principle. In support of it they represent that the annual value of such sewers is already contained in the Roll although not eo nomine. Town sewers, they say, are of the nature of pertinents of the houses, which

¹ 1907 S. C. 747.

² [1911] A. C. 171.

Dec. 17, 1912.

Assessor for
Aberdeen v.
Magistrates
of Aberdeen.

Assessor for
Lanark v.
Magistrates
of Lanark.

Lord Cullen.

would not command the lettable values at which they stand in the Roll but for the existence of the sewers. It may be observed that the town sewers in question do much more than serve the houses in the town. They carry off the surface drainage of the town, and they are in no legal sense pertinent of any or all of the houses. They form a general system of drainage serving various uses, and they are in the separate ownership of the respondents. That the existence of the sewers is essential to the present letting value of the houses which they serve is true, but it is no ground for omitting particular lands and heritages having an annual value from the Valuation-roll that their existence is essential to the values at which other lands and heritages of different owners are there entered. There is a necessary interdependence of values between many species of property, particularly in a town. The existence of a dock, for example, may be said to create the assessable annual values of certain kinds of property surrounding it. Dwelling-houses in a town would not command the rents they do if they did not have available a water supply and gas or electric lighting, as well as sewers. And water pipes and the heritable properties embraced in gas and electric lighting undertakings enter the Valuation-roll. It is, in my opinion, fallacious to say, as the respondents do, that the annual value of the sewers is already entered in the Roll. In plain fact it is not; and it seems to me to be no answer to say that because of the existence of the omitted sewers other lands and heritages included in the Roll are so included at values which they would not otherwise possess. Each particular land or heritage must be dealt with by itself, and be entered at such annual value as it has for the year under the existing circumstances affecting its value, although that value may be enhanced or created by the existence of other properties belonging to different owners.

I am accordingly of opinion that the Assessor was right in entering the sewers in question in the burgh Valuation-roll. As to the value at which they should be entered, I concur in what has been said by Lord Salvesen.

LORD JOHNSTON concurred.

Lanark Case.

LORD SALVESEN.—This appeal relates to certain purification works situated in the royal burgh of Lanark. Following the principles laid down in the Aberdeen case, we hold that the value of these works must enter the Roll. Parties have relieved us of any difficulty as to value, because they are agreed that £187, 10s. represents the fair annual value of these works. The Valuation-roll falls to be altered accordingly.

LORD JOHNSTON and LORD CULLEN concurred.

IN the Aberdeen case the Court were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was wrong, and that the sewers in question should be entered in the Valuation-roll, and, with consent of parties, fixed the annual value at £17,000.

IN the Lanark case the Court were of the same opinion, and fixed the annual value at £187, 10s.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—GORDON, FALCONER, & FAIRWEATHER, W.S.—PARTY—R. G. BOWIE, W.S.—Agents.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Appellants.—

Sol.-Gen. Anderson—J. A. T. Robertson.

MRS CATHERINE WALKER, Respondent.—Macmillan, K.C.—

J. R. Christie.

No. 100.

Mar. 6, 1913.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Revenue—Increment Value Duty—Site Value on occasion of sale—Method of ascertainment—Deductions—Meaning of “like” deductions—Deduction in respect of goodwill and matters personal to parties—Finance (1909-1910) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V. cap. 8), secs. 2, 25.

A valuation of a tenement under the Finance (1909-1910) Act for the purposes of duties on land values, fixed the following values as at 30th April 1909 :—(1) Original total value, £400, (2) original assessable site value (got by deducting £380 for buildings), £20. In June 1911 the tenement was sold by the owner for £650 to a purchaser, who had for many years occupied the tenement as a tenant, and had carried on a draper's business there as well as used it as his dwelling-house. Nothing had occurred between 1909 and 1911 to add to the value either of the site or buildings. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, for the purposes of increment value duty, fixed the site value on the occasion of the sale at £270, by deducting from the purchase price of £650 the sum formerly deducted as the value of the buildings, viz., £380.

An appeal was taken to a referee, who fixed the site value at £70, a figure which he arrived at in the following way :—Being of opinion that the property had not altered in value since the original valuation, but that the figures in that valuation were too low, he fixed the value of the buildings at £400, and deducted from the purchase price of £650 (1) under sec. 25 (4) (a) the value of the buildings, viz., £400, and (2) under sec. 25 (4) (d) a sum of £180, being the portion of the price paid which was, in his opinion, attributable to goodwill or personal considerations. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue contended (1) that under sec. 25 (4) (a) the deduction for buildings should have been £380, the same amount as had been deducted in the original valuation, in respect that the expression “like deductions” in section 2 (2) (a) was equivalent to “same deductions”; (2) that, in the circumstances, no deduction for goodwill or personal considerations under sec. 25 (4) (d) fell to be allowed.

Held (1) that the referee had rightly revalued the deduction to be made in respect of buildings, the expression “like” not being equivalent to “same”; (2) (diss. Lord Cullen) that the referee was entitled to attribute £180 to goodwill or personal considerations, and to deduct that sum; and, accordingly, that the site value on the occasion of the transfer was £70.

Opinions that where property consisting of lands and buildings increases or decreases in value the increase or decrease does not necessarily fall to be attributed to the site, but may be attributed in whole or in part to the buildings.

On 8th June 1911 Mrs Catherine Walker sold a tenement in Dalry to James Burns Walker, and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue fixed the site value on the occasion of the sale (for the purpose of increment value duty under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910,*) at £270.

Valuation Appeal Court.
Ld. Johnston.
Lord Salvesen.
Lord Cullen.

* The Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V. cap. 8), enacts :—

Sec. 2. “(1) For the purposes of this part of this Act the increment value of any land shall be deemed to be the amount (if any) by which the site value of the land, on the occasion on which increment value duty is to be col-

Mar. 6, 1913.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Mrs Catherine Walker appealed to a referee (Thomas Binnie junior), who reduced the value to £70.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue craved and obtained a stated case for appeal from the referee.

The case set forth * :—" Having in presence of parties inspected the property which forms the subject of the appeal, and having thereafter heard parties on the appeal, I find that the following facts are agreed or admitted :—(1) That John Walker, the husband of the appellant, died on 10th January 1911, he being at that date possessed of the property above referred to, which is burdened with a feu-duty of 5s. (2) That on 6th March 1911 the value of the property was returned for estate-duty purposes by or on behalf of the appellant as executrix of John Walker at £400, and that on 9th August 1911 that value was accepted by the Inland Revenue district valuer on the understanding that it should form the basis of the different values under the Finance lected as ascertained in accordance with this section, exceeds the original site value of the land as ascertained in accordance with the general provisions of this part of this Act as to valuation. (2) The site value of the land on the occasion on which increment value duty is to be collected shall be taken to be—(a) where the occasion is a transfer on sale of the fee simple of the land, the value of the consideration for the transfer . . . subject in each case to the like deductions as are made, under the general provisions of this part of this Act as to valuation, for the purpose of arriving at the site value of land from the total value."

Sec. 12. "A person shall not be entitled to claim any deduction for the purpose of ascertaining the site value of any land on any occasion on which increment value duty becomes payable, if the deduction is one which could have been, but was not, claimed for the purpose of ascertaining the original site value of the land."

Sec. 25. "(1) For the purposes of this part of this Act the gross value of land means the amount which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition, free from incumbrances and from any burden, charge, or restriction (other than rates or taxes), might be expected to realise. (2) The full site value of land means the amount which remains after deducting from the gross value of the land the difference (if any) between that value and the value which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller, might be expected to realise if the land were divested of any buildings and of any other structures (including fixed or attached machinery) on, in, or under the surface, which are appurtenant to or used in connection with any such buildings, and of all growing timber, fruit trees, fruit bushes, and other things growing thereon. (3) The total value of land means the gross value after deducting the amount by which the gross value would be diminished if the land were sold subject to any fixed charges and to any public rights of way or any public rights of user, and to any right of common, and to any easements affecting the land, and to any covenant or agreement restricting the use of the land [subject to certain conditions]. (4) The assessable site value of land means the total value after deducting—(a) The same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value and . . . (d) any part of the total value which is proved to the Commissioners to be directly attributable to the expenditure of money on the redemption of any land-tax, or any fixed charge . . . or on effecting the release of any covenant or agreement

* A short narrative of the facts, and of the opinion of the referee as disclosed in the stated case and in his further statement, will be found in the first three paragraphs of Lord Salvesen's opinion.

(1909-10) Act, 1910. (3) That no increment value duty was claimed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on the occasion of the death of the said John Walker. (4) That the provisional valuation, as at 30th April 1909, under the Act just cited was served upon the appellant or her solicitors on 30th August 1911, the details thereof being:—

Mar 6, 1913.
Inland Revenue v. Walker.

Original gross value, ... £405

Deductions from gross value—

(a) Difference between gross value and value of the fee-simple of the land divested of buildings, trees, &c., . . . £380

(b) Feu-duty, ground-annual, or tack-duty, . . . £5

Original full site value, ... £25

Original total value, ... £400

Original assessable site value, ... £20

(5) That no appeal was intimated against the provisional valuation, which has accordingly become final. (6) That by disposition dated 3rd and 8th, and recorded 9th June 1911, the property was sold by the appellant to James Burns Walker, her brother-in-law, and his wife. (7) That the consideration payable to the appellant for the transfer was £650. (8) That the Inland Revenue district valuer states that, when he agreed on 9th August 1911 to accept a value of £400 as the value of the property for estate-duty purposes, he was not aware that it had been transferred on 8th June 1911 for the consideration of £650 above mentioned; but that the transfer and the consideration therefor must have been within the knowledge of the appellant on 9th August 1911. That the appellant states that she has no means of knowing how and when the said disposition came to the knowledge of the district valuer. (9) That no works had been executed or capital expenditure made upon the property during the period from 30th April 1909 (the date as at which the provisional valuation was made) and 8th June 1911 (the date of the transfer above mentioned). (10) That by an assessment dated 29th April 1912 the site value, on the occasion of the said transfer, has been determined by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue at £270, and that the Commissioners have accordingly fixed the increment value on the said occasion at £250, being the amount by which the site value on the occasion exceeds the original site value fixed by the provisional valuation; and that increment value duty has been claimed from the appellant on the said sum of £250. (11) That by notice of appeal dated 22nd May 1912 the solicitors for the appellant appealed against the the said assessment on the following grounds:—‘That no increment value (sic) is due on the occasion in question.’ ‘That the value of the site has not increased since the date of the original valua-restricting the use of land which may be taken into account in ascertaining the total value of the land, or to goodwill or any other matter which is personal to the owner, occupier, or other person interested for the time being in the land; and (e) Any sums which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, it would be necessary to expend in order to divest the land of buildings, timber, trees, or other things of which it is to be taken to be divested for the purpose of arriving at the full site value from the gross value of the land, and of which it would be necessary to divest the land for the purpose of realising the full site value . . . Any reference in this Act to site value (other than the reference to the site value of land on an occasion on which increment-duty is to be collected), shall be deemed to be a reference to the assessable site value of the land as ascertained in accordance with this section.”

Mar. 6, 1913.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

tion.' 'That no explanation of how the claim for increment value duty is made up has been given.'

"I am of opinion that at 8th June 1911, the date of the occasion above mentioned, the fee-simple of the property, if sold in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition, free from incumbrances, and from any burden, charge, or restriction (other than rates or taxes), might have been expected to realise £475. That the fee-simple of the land, if sold at the time under the above conditions, but divested of buildings, trees, &c., might have been expected to realise £75; and that, subject to the burden of the feu-duty already mentioned, it might have been expected to realise £70. At the hearing before me I was requested by the solicitor for the appellant to state my decision in the form of a special case for the judgment of the Court on points of law advanced by him, and I accordingly do so.

"It was contended before me, on behalf of the appellant:—(a) That there has been no increase in the value of the site within the meaning of section 2 of the Act above cited between 30th April 1909 and 8th June 1911; and that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue having agreed to accept £400 as the basis of the different values under the Act, as stated in paragraph 2, the site value on that basis was £20 at both dates. (b) Alternatively, that the consideration of £650 paid for the property by James Burns Walker was greatly in excess of its value in the open market at 8th June 1911; that in paying that price he was actuated partly by sentiment, partly by family affection towards his brother's widow, and partly by a dread that, if the subjects were acquired by an outsider, he might be compelled to quit the premises he had long occupied in the property, namely, his shop in which he carried on business as a draper, and his dwelling-house; and that, on a sound construction of the Act, and particularly section 25 (4) (d), a deduction falls to be made from the consideration paid on the transfer to him in respect of goodwill or other matter personal to him as occupier of part of the property.

"It was contended before me, on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue:—(a) That in fixing the increment value on the occasion of the transfer of the property to James Burns Walker the site value, on a sound construction of section 2 (2) (a) of the Act, must be taken to be the value of the consideration for the transfer, subject to the like deduction—in this case the same deduction, as there had been no capital expenditure made upon the property—as was made in the provisional valuation for the purpose of arriving at the site value from the total value; and that, in arriving at the site value on the occasion as stated in paragraph 10, the directions in section 2 (2) (a) have been duly followed. (b) That, on a sound construction of section 12 of the Act, it is not competent for the appellant, on the occasion of the said transfer, to claim any deduction for goodwill or other matter personal to James Burns Walker, no such deduction having been claimed when the original site value was fixed.

"I decide that contention (a) of the appellant is not a question of law but is a question of fact, and I decide that the site value of the land on the occasion of the transfer on 8th June 1911 is £70, and I find the appellant entitled to her expenses in this appeal, modified at two-thirds, and remit these to the Auditor of the Court of Session for taxation. If the Court determine that I am wrong in deciding that contention (a) of the appellant is a question of fact, and that it forms a sound contention in law, I decide that the site value of the land on the said occasion is £20, and I find the appellant entitled to her expenses in this appeal, and remit these to the said Auditor for taxation. If the Court determine that contention (b) of the appellant is correct, I decide that the site value of the land on the said occasion is £70, and I find the appellant entitled to her expenses in this appeal, modified at two-thirds, and remit these to the said Auditor for taxation. If the Court determine that either contention of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue is correct, I decide that the site value of the land on the said occasion is £270, and I find the said Commissioners entitled to their expenses in this appeal, and remit these to the said Auditor for taxation.”

Mar. 6, 1913.
Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

The case was heard before the Valuation Appeal Court on 19th November 1912. The arguments of parties sufficiently appear from the statements of the referee and the opinions of their Lordships.¹

On 17th December 1912 the Court remitted the case to the referee for a further statement.

The further statement was in the following terms:—

“In regard to contention (a) of the original appellant, I am of opinion—1st. That as matter of fact the Commissioners of Inland Revenue did agree to accept £400 as the basis of the different values under the Act, as stated in paragraph 2; this opinion being founded on the correspondence between the district valuer and the original appellant's solicitors. 2nd. That as matter of fact there had, on the hypothesis that the original site value was a fair one, been no increase in the value of the site between 30th April 1909 and 8th June 1911. But, for the reasons after given, I have come to the conclusion that the values in the provisional valuation are all too low.

“In regard to contention (b) of the original appellant, I must explain that I had considerable difficulty in coming to a decision on this point. I should have liked to get from James Burns Walker personally a statement of the motives by which he was actuated in paying the consideration of £650 for the property; but on the date when I inspected the property and heard parties on the appeal—viz., 28th June 1912—Mr Walker was, as I learned by inquiry at his house, very seriously ill, and in fact he died on 14th July 1912. For this reason I was unable to get from him any statement as to what was in his mind when he purchased the property, and as far as I could learn from the parties there was no other person to give me any information on this point. I have, therefore, had to form my conclusions on the matter as best I could. After full consideration, I am satisfied as matter of fact that in paying the purchase price of £650, James Burns Walker was actuated by some one or other of the considerations alleged in contention (b) of the original appellant. Further—I am of opinion that in law the facts warrant a deduction in respect of some such personal element from the purchase price, under section 25 (4) (d) of the statute. Further—I consider, assuming such a deduction competent in law, that the sum of £180 should be allowed in respect thereof. For the reasons stated above, I was ¹ The following cases were cited:—Bradford-on-Avon Assessment Committee v. White, [1898] 2 Q. B. 630, Channell, J., at p. 638; Chandler's Wiltshire Brewery Co., Limited, and London County Council, [1903] 1 K. B. 569, Wright, J., at p. 572; Erskine's Trustees v. Crombie, (1870) 9 Macph. 54; Attorney-General v. Jameson, [1905] 2 I. R. 218, Fitzgibbon, L.J., at p. 230.

Mar. 6, 1913.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

not able to arrive directly at the sum just mentioned; I could only arrive at it by ascertaining to the best of my ability the market value of the subjects, and then taking the difference between this and the consideration on sale as necessarily the proportion of the consideration on sale given for the personal element, the figures of the calculation being—

Consideration on sale	£650	0	0
Less market value of property at 8th June 1911 estimated by me at	470	0	0

Leaving	£180	0	0
-------------------	------	---	---

as the proportion of the consideration on sale given for the personal element.

“ If the Court should decide that the deduction claimed cannot competently be allowed under the statute, and that the purchase price of £650 must be accepted as the occasional total value, without deduction in respect of any personal consideration, then, on that alternative hypothesis, I am of opinion that, of the said sum of £650, the sum of £552 represents the value of the buildings or other appurtenants to the site, and the sum of £98 represents the value of the site. Or to put this in another way—

Accepting the consideration on sale as the occasional total value	£650	0	0
Whereas the total value in the provisional valuation was	400	0	0

Shows a rise in value between 30th April 1909 and 8th June 1911 of	£250	0	0
--	------	---	---

Of this, the amount attributable to a rise in the value of the buildings is £552 less £380, the amount allowed for buildings in the provisional valuation	£172	0	0
And the amount attributable to a rise in the value of the site is £98 less £20, the original site value in the provisional valuation	78	0	0

£250	0	0
------	---	---

“ In regard to contention (a) of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, I, as a layman, feel great diffidence in offering an opinion on a question of law. In response to the directions of the Court I have to state that, in my opinion, the Commissioners are wrong in contending that the words ‘the like deduction’ are in every case synonymous with the words ‘the same deduction.’ I think that buildings, even where there has been no capital expenditure made upon them, may, from various causes, rise or fall in value between two given dates, just as everyone knows as a fact that bare ground rises and falls in value. The contention of the Commissioners is that the deduction for the value of the buildings must, on the occasion, be the same as was allowed in the provisional valuation—viz., £380.

“ In regard to contention (b) of the Commissioners, I am of opinion that section 12 of the statute does not render incompetent the deduction claimed for goodwill or other matter personal to James Burns Walker. And that for this reason: a deduction for matter personal to James Burns Walker, the purchaser of the property on 8th June 1911, could obviously not have been claimed by the original appellant in the particulars which she was called upon to furnish to the Commissioners for the original valuation at 30th April 1909. The only person who could claim such a deduction was James Burns Walker, and he could not claim it until he became owner of the subjects.

"Following the directions of the statute, I arrive at the following conclusion as to the assessable site value on the occasion of the sale to James Burns Walker:—

Consideration on sale, ... £650 0 0
Deduct—

Under section 25 (4) (a) 'the same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value, ... £552 0 0

Under section 25 (4) (b), (c), and (e), no deductions were claimed by the original appellant, so I allow none, ... nil

£552 0 0

Result—Assessable site value, ... £98 0 0

"At this point I may perhaps state how my estimate of £470 as the market value of the property at 8th June 1911 was made up.

The rental of the property at that date was £38, and this I capitalised at 12½ years' purchase, ... £475 0 0

(which is the figure corresponding to gross value in the provisional valuation).

Deducting the capitalised value of the feu-duty of 5s. at 20 years' purchase, ... 5 0 0

Gives as the market value £470 0 0 (corresponding to total value in the provisional valuation).

Deducting from this the difference between gross value and value of the fee-simple of the land divested of buildings, trees, &c., which difference I estimate at, ... 400 0 0
(as against £380 in the provisional valuation)

Leaves as the market value of the site, ... £70 0 0
(this corresponding to assessable site value in the provisional valuation).

"I do not think that, speaking generally, there has been any material alteration in the value of properties in Dalry between 30th April 1909 and 8th June 1911. If, therefore, the figures just given are accurate (and they are supported by transactions in the neighbourhood quoted to me by the valuers of the Inland Revenue), then it follows that the various values in the provisional valuation were under-estimated. As will be seen from the correspondence between the original appellant's solicitors and the district valuer, the latter originally estimated the total value of the property as at 10th January 1911—the date of John Walker's death—at £450, which very closely approximates to my estimate of its market value a few months later. In order, however, to meet the views of the original appellant's solicitors (vide correspondence), the district valuer reduced his estimate of the total value to £400, with the result that, in the

Mar. 6, 1913.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

provisional valuation, he brought out the full site value at £25. Now the site, which is in one of the main streets in Dalry, has an area of acres 0·062 (dec.) or 300 square yards of net building ground, with a frontage of 54 feet, so that the full site value of £25 is equal to 1s. 8d. per square yard. Such a price per square yard would fairly represent the value of ground devoted to small villas or cottages on the outskirts of a country town, but it seems to me far too low a price to apply to a site on a main street close to the centre of a town like Dalry. I am very reluctant to criticise a Government valuer, but I cannot help thinking that an error has crept into his calculations in this particular case. Of course, the provisional valuation has now become final, but I must criticise it in order to make my own conclusions clear.

"Finally, I should perhaps explain how the findings, which I gave in the stated case, were arrived at.

"My first or principal finding, fixing the site value on the occasion at £70, was my estimate of the market value of the site on the occasion.

"My second finding, fixing the site value on the occasion at £20, needs no explanation.

"My third finding, fixing the site value on the occasion at £70, was arrived at by taking the consideration on sale, . £650 0 0 and deducting for buildings, . £400 0 0 and for matter personal to James Burns

Walker,	180 0 0
		580 0 0

Leaving as site value on the occasion	. £70 0 0

"My last finding, fixing the site value on the occasion at £270, was arrived at by taking the consideration on sale, . £650 0 0 and deducting for buildings the same amount as in the provisional valuation, . 380 0 0

Leaving as site value on the occasion	. £270 0 0"

No further argument was submitted for the parties.

At advising on 6th March 1913,—

LORD JOHNSTON.—The present appeal is concerned with the proper amount to be assessed, as the increment value duty under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, on a small property in the main street of the burgh of Dalry, which brought £650 when sold in 1911 to the brother of the deceased owner. The original site value was fixed as at 30th April 1909 at £20. The Commissioners value the site value, on the occasion of sale, viz., 9th June 1911, at £270, and claim as the increment value duty one-fifth of the difference between the £270 and the original site value of £20, or £50. An increase in the site value to the extent of twelve and a half times the original site value, in two years in the site of a small property in a small country town, must be admitted to be an extravagant result of the Act. But it is maintained by the Crown that it is an unavoidable result of the phraseology of the statute whatever the intention may have been.

The statute (section 2 (1)) defines "increment value" as the amount by which the site value of any land, as ascertained in accordance with this Mar. 6, 1913. section, i.e., section 2, on the occasion when increment value duty is to be collected, exceeds the original site value, as ascertained in accordance with section 25. The declared object of the Act was to tax what was popularly described as the unearned increment of land—the increase in the value of bare land, occasioned by circumstances beyond the owner's control and to which he had not contributed. The conception of that object imports the ascertainment of the difference between real value at two different times. In construing and applying a statute we cannot rely upon the declared object of its promoters, however much it may be common knowledge. But it is a consideration that cannot be ignored, that the general scope of this Act is in accordance with its promoters' declared object. And I do not think that there is much doubt that the intention and expectation of the Legislature was so also.

On the other hand the Crown maintain that, whatever the object of the Act, the result of its provisions is to tax the difference between a real value and a mere statutory conception or fictitious value. It may be so, for the provisions of the Act are wrapped up in such a cloud of words, that it is quite possible that they may, if literally read, achieve a result not dreamt of by those who framed the statute.

The important figures in the case, following the order of the Act of 1910, are these :—

(1) Original gross value as at 30th April 1909, ...	£405
(2) Original full site value, ...	£25
Consequent difference between original gross and original full site value, ...	£380
Capitalised value of feu-duty, ...	£5
(3) Original total value, ...	£400
(4) Original assessable site value, ...	£20
(5) And consideration for transfer on sale at 9th June 1911, ...	£650

As admittedly there had been no expenditure between 1909 and 1911 on the property, the Inland Revenue Commissioners took the site value on the occasion of sale to be the consideration for sale, less the difference between original gross value and original full site value, or £650 - £380 = £270. In this they are clearly wrong, and can only defend themselves by construing the word "like" occurring at the end of section 2 (2) as equivalent to "same." I do not delay by examining this contention further, but merely say that, in my opinion, where the statute says "like" it means "like," and not "same." But this only disposes of a fringe of the question at issue.

Another incidental point may similarly be dealt with at once. John Walker, the owner, died on 10th January 1911. The property was sold by his widow to her husband's brother, James Burns Walker, on 9th June 1911, at £650. The provisional valuation was not served (on John Walker's widow) till after John Walker's death, and as it was not objected to, it became final. But meantime the value of the property had been returned for estate-duty at £400, and it is said that that value was accepted by the Inland Revenue district valuer on the understanding that it should form the basis of the different values under the Finance (1909-10) Act, Mar., 6, 1913. 1910. That seems in a sense to have been the case. But its effect could only be to fix £400 as the value for the provisional and final original valuation as at 30th April 1909, and for the increment-duty accruing on John Walker's death on 10th January 1911. And that effect it has received. It could not regulate the value for increment-duty on the occasion of sale on 9th June 1911, even if the valuer had been made aware of the transaction, which he denies. For he had no authority to accept it as such in the circumstances, and I am satisfied did not do so. This contention of the widow may therefore be at once disposed of.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Ld. Johnston.

Mrs Walker was dissatisfied with the assessment of the increment value by the Commissioners on occasion of the sale, and appealed. A reference was accordingly made under the statute to Mr Thomas Binnie, who has reduced the occasional site value to £70 and consequently the increment value to £50, being £70 - £20. Against his award the Inland Revenue Commissioners have appealed to this Court.

The ground of Mrs Walker's contention for reduction is thus stated by her, viz., that the consideration of £650 paid by James Burns Walker was not paid merely for the property as a marketable subject, and was indeed greatly in excess of the value of the property in open market at 9th June 1911; that in paying this price James Burns Walker was actuated partly by sentiment, partly by consideration for his brother's widow and family, and partly by fear of disturbance. As regards the latter, it is the case that he was advanced in life, and actually died pending the reference, and that he had for a great number of years, as many as thirty I think, occupied the premises, partly as his dwelling-house and partly as the shop in which he carried on his business of draper. And Mrs Walker maintained that, on a sound construction of the Act, section 25 (4) (d), a deduction fell to be made from the consideration on sale to James Burns Walker, in respect of goodwill or other matter personal to him as occupier. This contention Mr Binnie has sustained, and has accordingly reduced the occasional site value as above stated. The grounds on which Mr Binnie had based his conclusion, and the data on which he had reached his figures, not being quite clear from the case as originally presented, we asked Mr Binnie to supply us with further information. This we now have, and are enabled to dispose of the case.

The original values have been finally and irrevocably fixed under the statutory procedure. Mr Binnie considered that they were considerably under the true value as at the statutory date. But he states this opinion, not as in any way seeking to disturb the datum level of values provided by the Act, but merely as explaining part of his own subsequent valuation.

It is necessary, then, to consider carefully the statutory method of arriving at occasional site value. The Act, section 2 (2), says that it shall be taken to be the value of the consideration for transfer on sale, that is, the purchase price, subject to the like deductions as are made under section 25 (4) for the purpose of arriving at the original site value from the total value. Section 25 (4) enumerates these deductions (reading only those with which this case is concerned) thus: "(a) The same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value"; and "(d) Any part of the total value which is proved to the Commissioners to be directly attributable . . . to goodwill or any other matter which is personal to the owner, occupier, or other person interested for the time being in the land." These two deductions must be taken separately.

Mar. 6, 1913.
Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

The first deduction is, divesting the statutory provision of its circuitry, simply the difference between gross value and full site value, or the difference between the hypothetical market value of the subject as it stands at the time, and the hypothetical market value of the bare site, that is, in popular language, its "prairie value." This difference is really not so much the value of the buildings, &c., on the site per se, as the value added to the bare site by the buildings and other structures on, in, or under the surface, which are appurtenant to or used in connection with any such buildings, and of growing timber, &c.,—that is, the value added to the bare building ground by man's expenditure of money and labour. The statute, section 25 (2), talks as if this is to be estimated as a deduction to be made from gross value to arrive at full site value, and section 25 (4) (a) talks of it as the amount to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value. But there is no reality in the definition. I defy any valuer to follow the theoretical lines laid down for him by the draughtsman. He must estimate the gross value, and he must estimate the full site value, things which he is competent to estimate, and the difference is this deduction which he is not in a position to value otherwise than by deducting estimated full site value from estimated gross value, but which he is assumed to value in order to arrive at full site value. And the strange thing is that full site value is not wanted, and is of no use except for the purpose of ascertaining this deduction, which is a thing really wanted to be created for an ulterior purpose, viz., that of section 25 (4) (a). Now the trouble in following the statutory direction of section 25 (4) (a) is that gross value was necessarily ascertained under section 25 (1) when arriving at original total value, from which original site value was deduced, but that, in the case of occasional values, the valuator is presented with total value directly, in the form of the consideration for the transfer on sale, and has not had to get at it by the process of ascertaining gross value. But if the letter of the statute is to be followed, the valuer, having been presented with total value in the form of the purchase price, which is a real thing, must throw it over and, going back on the track, must estimate for himself, section 25 (1), according to the best of his opinion, the value of the fee-simple of the land if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition, free from all burdens and restrictions, and then also estimate for himself (section 25 (2)) the value of the divested land if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller. How far he may use the purchase price as a guide or help in these estimates is entirely for himself. Mr Binnie, following the letter of the statute, although, as he explains, there has been absolutely no change in any of the values between 1909 and 1911, for sufficient reasons which he explains estimates gross value in 1911 at £475 as against £405 original, and full site value at £75 as against £25 original, and therefore the difference between them at £400 as against £380 original. And this last figure of £400 becomes the first, or (a), deduction of section 25 (4) from the purchase price of £650. There remains £250. He next considers whether any deduction falls to be made

Ld. Johnston.

Mar. 6, 1913. under section 25 (4) (d)—whether there is ground for such in fact, and whether the deduction is competent in law. I think that the latter question should be first considered. Mr Binnie holds, and in this I agree with him, that the facts alleged by Mrs Walker warrant in law some deduction in respect of the personal element from the purchase price.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Ld. Johnston.

Any part of the purchase price which can be attributed to such considerations as have been advanced by the original owner's widow appears to me to be exactly what is intended to be covered by this branch of the subsection. I pass over the suggestion of the charitable intentions of Mr James Burns Walker towards his brother's family, as perhaps somewhat fanciful and intangible. But goodwill and the avoidance of disturbance, which is but another phase of goodwill viewed from a special standpoint, are neither fanciful nor intangible, and if part of the price is attributable to these considerations, it forms, in my opinion, a good deduction in terms of section 25 (4) (d). It is part of the total value directly attributable, not to the site, but to a matter which is personal to the occupier. If, taking the figure of the sale in 1911, an apparent rise in site value, as compared with 1909, from £20 to £250, is established, where no such increase has occurred in reality, and if this apparent rise is attributable to a matter personal to the occupier, it results that if the increment value duty is to be calculated on such apparent increment the Revenue is taking toll, not of an increment in site value, but of something quite different which the statute never meant to be taxed. This deduction is therefore, I think, within, and properly within, the terms of the subsection.

If so, what part, then, of the total value or purchase price, if any, is directly attributable to this matter? It has been contended, and I am aware that my brother Lord Cullen so holds, that there is neither proof that any such consideration entered into the purchase price, nor of the proportion to be attributed to it. Unfortunately we have here no direct proof, owing to the death of Mr James Burns Walker pending the reference to Mr Binnie. But we have circumstances, in the first place, in which such an additional price for goodwill, or avoidance of disturbance, was reasonably to be presumed, because the conditions precedent to it existed, and, in the second place, a substantial part of the price is not accounted for, and so substantial—nearly 50 per cent above Mr Binnie's well-supported estimate of true value—that it cannot be attributed to mere difference of opinion between valuers, but has to be accounted for. Was Mr Binnie bound to assume that Mr James Burns Walker simply made a gross mistake in the value of the property, which he had so long occupied, or was hopelessly ill-advised, when Mr Binnie had before him the tangible fact of Mr James Burns Walker's double occupation of the subjects, both as a residence and as a place of business? Mr Binnie states that he was, after full consideration, satisfied that as matter of fact, in paying the purchase price of £650, James Burns Walker was actuated by some one or other of the considerations alleged by the original appellant. I am not prepared to disagree with him, for I think that the inference was one of fact which he was entitled to make, and which I should have made myself had I been in his position. So much in the application of the provisions of this Act is committed to the opinion and discretion of valuer and referee, that I do not think that this Court is justified in calling on them to show that they had absolute legal proof Mar. 6, 1913. which would satisfy a Court of law of every consideration on which they proceeded.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

In the next place, I think that it was quite competent for Mr Binnie, if he was satisfied that such reason for the excessive price existed and had no proof of the precise amount actually attributed to it by the purchaser, to put his own value upon it. His function under the Act is to put values on things according to his own judgment. Nay, I would say that, even if he had had such proof, he was still bound to put his own value upon it. Neither the evidence of the purchaser that he did put a definite amount, nor the express attribution of a portion of the price in the contract of sale or conveyance, would have precluded the Inland Revenue from requiring Mr Binnie to apply his mind to the real amount or value of the consideration. I think, therefore, that Mr Binnie has properly disposed of this case, by proceeding to put a value on the consideration in question in the best way he could. I do not think that it was necessary for him to disclose the mental process which he went through in arriving at his figures. But he has done so, and I cannot find fault with it. He says: "I consider, assuming such a deduction competent in law, that the sum of £180 should be allowed in respect thereof. For the reasons stated above, I was not able to arrive directly at the sum just mentioned; I could only arrive at it by ascertaining to the best of my ability the market value of the subjects, and then taking the difference between this and the consideration on sale as necessarily the proportion of the consideration on sale given for the personal element, the figures of the calculation being:—

Consideration on sale,	£650
Less market value of property at 8th June 1911, estimated by me at	470

Leaving	£180
---------	------

as the proportion of the consideration on sale given for the personal element."

I prefer this ground of judgment. But Mr Binnie has suggested another, viz., that, if he is not entitled to make any deduction for the alleged personal element, and is bound to hold that the sum of £650 must be attributed entirely to site and buildings, he must then consider whether the buildings as well as the site have not had their share in the appreciation. I am entirely with him in the view that increase or decrease in value cannot all be attributed to site. I can conceive of cases in which, viewed from the point of view of market value, the bare land, as building ground, may not have increased in value, and yet the subjects as a whole may have increased, and that even though in the interim nothing has been spent on the extension or improvement of the buildings. In fact the demand which regulates market price may from time to time create any amount of permutation between the relative proportions attributable to land and to buildings. But where, as here, there has been an increase so extravagant that it is impossible to attribute it to the intrinsic increase in value of the combined subject in open market, I think that it would be an improper application of the Act empirically to proceed to divide the increase between land and buildings, which

Mar. 6, 1913. do not justify it, where there is, as here, another and satisfactory mode of accounting for it. In other circumstances the alternative course taken by Mr Binnie might be necessary.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Ld. Johnston. Mr Binnie explains that his third finding fixing the site value on the occasion at £70, was arrived at by taking the consideration on sale, £650 and deducting for buildings, ... £400 and for matter personal to James Burns Walker, ... 180

580

leaving as site value on the occasion £70

I think, for the reasons above stated, that this finding was correct and should be affirmed, but I think that Mrs Walker was entitled to the full expenses of her appeal to Mr Binnie, and that she is entitled as respondent to her expenses in the case before this Court.

LORD SALVESEN.—The question in this case relates to the increment value duty on a small property situated in Dalry. The material facts which are stated by the referee are as follows :—The late John Walker, the owner of the property, died on 10th January 1911. The property consists of a piece of ground extending to about 300 square yards, with a frontage of 54 feet to New Street. On this site there is a house, the lower storey of which was occupied as a draper's shop, the occupier being Mr James Burns Walker, a brother of the late owner. He had long occupied the shop, in which he carried on his business, and resided in the upper floor of the building. He paid £38 annually of rent for his premises. The only burden on the property is a feu-duty of 5s.

On 6th March 1911 the value of the property was returned for estate-duty purposes by the respondent, as executrix of her husband, at £400, and on 9th August 1911 that value was accepted by the Inland Revenue district valuer. A provisional valuation as at 30th April 1909 under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, was served upon the appellant on 30th August 1911; and as no appeal was entered this provisional valuation has become final. The only material figures therein contained are: (1) £400, the original total value; and (2) £20, the original assessable site value, the difference representing the value of the buildings. The property had in the meantime been sold in June 1911 to the occupier, Mr James Burns Walker, for a sum of £650—no capital expenditure having been made upon the property during the period from 30th April 1909 to 8th June 1911. The referee is of opinion that there has been no material alteration in the value of property in Dalry between these dates; but he thinks that the property was undervalued in the provisional valuation, and that it ought to have been valued at £470, £400 of which would be attributable to the buildings and £70 to the site. (As the capitalised value of the feu-duty remains constant in the calculations, I leave it, for the sake of simplicity, entirely out of count.) He was accordingly of opinion that the site had increased in value as compared with the provisional valuation by the sum of £50, and that increment value duty was leviable upon this sum. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, on the other hand, claim that the difference between the sum actually paid for the property, namely, £650, and the value of the buildings as fixed in the provisional valuation, £380, must be treated for the purposes of the Act as an increment in the value of the site; and that duty accordingly falls to be paid upon £270, less £20, the original site value.

Mar. 6, 1913.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Lord Salvesen.

Before disposing of the appeal we thought it necessary to obtain some further facts; and these have been stated by the referee in an additional report. He holds that the difference between the price actually paid and his valuation of the market value of the subjects, namely, £180, must be attributed to considerations personal to the purchaser, in which case the increment value of the site would be the £50 arrived at by him. If, on the other hand, £650 is to be treated as the market value of the subjects, then he holds that the value of the buildings must be regarded as £552 and the site as £98; from which latter sum the original site value of £20 falls to be deducted, leaving the increment value of the site £78.

The controversy between the parties turns on the construction of sections 2 and 25 of the Finance (1909-10) Act. The former section contains the leading provision, which is in these terms: "For the purposes of this part of this Act the increment value of any land shall be deemed to be the amount (if any) by which the site value of the land, on the occasion on which increment value duty is to be collected as ascertained in accordance with this section, exceeds the original site value of the land as ascertained in accordance with the general provisions of this Part of this Act as to valuation." Accordingly, if the site value has remained constant or has diminished, no increment value duty would prima facie appear to be leviable. The same section goes on to provide: "(2) The site value of the land on the occasion on which increment value duty is to be collected shall be taken to be (a) where the occasion is a transfer on sale of the fee simple of the land, the value of the consideration for the transfer."

There is also a provision (d) which may have a bearing on the construction of section 25, to the effect that where the occasion is a periodical occasion on which the duty is to be collected in respect of the fee simple of any land, the total value of the land on that occasion falls to be estimated in accordance with the general provisions as to valuation. There follows a qualification which is applicable to the whole of subsection (2), and which is expressed in these terms: "Subject in each case to the like deductions as are made under the general provisions of this Part of this Act as to valuation for the purpose of arriving at the site value of land from the total value."

On referring to section 25, which contains the regulations as to valuation, one finds that the gross value of land is defined as the amount which the fee-simple of the land if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition free from incumbrances might be expected to realise. Similarly the full site value of the land is defined as meaning the amount which remains after deducting from the gross value of the land the difference between that value and the value which the fee-simple of the land if sold at the time in the open market might be expected to realise if the land were divested of any buildings and other structures; and the total value of land is the gross value after deducting the capitalised value of any

Mar. 6, 1913.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Lord Salvesen.

incumbrances. Subsection (4) proceeds to define the assessable site value, which in the case before us is defined as being the total value after deducting the value of buildings or other structures as in subsection (2), and "(d) any part of the total value which is proved to the Commissioners to be directly attributable to . . . goodwill or any other matter which is personal to the owner, occupier, or other person interested for the time being in the land."

These being the provisions which we have to construe, and which are necessarily complex in form, because of the infinite variety that must exist in the quality of heritable subjects, the problem here is to apply them to what is a comparatively simple case, always keeping in view the leading principle of the Act, that the duty falls only to be levied on the increment of site value. Here we have property belonging in fee-simple to the owner and having only two elements of value, namely, the value of the site and the value of the buildings upon it. This property was sold by a willing seller to a willing purchaser; and prima facie such a sale, whether the result of a private transaction or of a public roup, is the market value of the whole. To what extent that market value is contributed to by the value of the buildings must always be a matter of valuation, and if there be no other considerations entering into the price the value which remains after deducting the value of the buildings represents the assessable site value. When that figure is compared with the assessable site value as ascertained by the provisional valuation, you ascertain whether there has been any increment in value, and if so, the amount of the increment.

Here, however, the transaction is complicated by the fact that there were personal considerations which entered into the price paid by the purchaser. If the goodwill of the draper's business had belonged to the seller and had been included in the price, a deduction would require to be made of the value of such goodwill before it could be ascertained whether the value of the heritable subjects as a whole had been increased. The simplest case of all would have been if the parties had bona fide stated in the conveyance the sum at which they respectively agreed to sell and purchase the goodwill so far as that pertained to the heritage and was capable of being valued apart from it. We are familiar with cases of this kind in dealing with the sale of licensed premises, where it sometimes happens that the value of the heritable goodwill exceeds the value of the heritable subjects themselves treated as subjects to which no licence attached. In the present case there were no elements of value belonging to the seller and conveyed by her, but it is said that there were considerations which were personal to the purchaser as the occupier of the shop in the building. It was contended that the buyer, James Burns Walker, paid a sum in excess of the value of the subjects because of the affection which he entertained towards his brother's widow. Even if that could be ascertained as matter of fact I do not think that it would be a part of the total value which could be taken into account in fixing the assessable site value under section 25 (4) (d). But it is scarcely the subject of legitimate conjecture, in a case where the facts are not known, that the buyer took this method of making what was in effect a present to his brother's widow. The other element, however, is in a different position. It is said that the purchaser feared that if the subjects were acquired by an outsider he might be compelled to quit the premises in which he had for a Mar. 6, 1913.

long time carried on business as a draper. This is a matter which I think did have a commercial value for him, because in the first place he would ^{Inland} have to face the cost of removal, and it might be that if a rival draper's ^{Revenue v.}
business was established in his old premises he might lose some of the busi- ^{Walker.}
ness which depended on the fact that a business of a particular kind had ^{Lord Salvesen.} been carried on there for many years. It was also an element which the seller might well have in view in demanding a higher price from the purchaser than she would have obtained from one who was merely buying the property as an investment. It was, however, in my opinion, a part of the total value which was personal to the occupier. It was not personal to the owner, because if the occupier had died this element of value would have disappeared.

But it is not enough to say that such an element might enter into the price; it must be proved that it in fact did so. I think that is established by the valuation of the referee of the subjects as heritable subjects at the sum of £470, which I presume is conclusive between the parties and is, in any event, well warranted according to the ordinary principles of valuation. As I read the referee's findings, these include a comparison with neighbouring subjects similarly situated, as well as the application of an appropriate number of years' purchase to the actual rental paid by the tenant. Had that rental for any reason been less than the rental of similar subjects in the neighbourhood, a valuation based solely upon it would have been misleading. But the referee expressly finds that the figures on which he proceeds were supported by transactions in the neighbourhood quoted to him by the valuers of the Inland Revenue.

I think, accordingly, that the referee's conclusion in fact that £180 of the price actually paid represented an element of value which was personal to the purchaser was legitimate, and that accordingly the site value on the occasion has been properly fixed at the sum of £70.

Even if this were not so—and we were obliged to take the case on the footing that there was no personal element which entered into the price—the result, in the view that I take, would not be substantially different.
The consideration on sale would then represent the market value of the subjects as such. I entirely demur to the view contended for on behalf of the Inland Revenue, that on this assumption you are to deduct from the price exactly the same sum as was deducted in the provisional valuation in respect of the value of the buildings, where such buildings have not been added to or improved. The result, of course, would be that the site value would have appreciated on this method of valuation by £250 in the course of a few months, a figure more than eleven times greater than the valuation fixed by the provisional valuation, and that although the referee was of opinion that there had been no actual appreciation, but that the site had been undervalued to the extent of £50 in the provisional valuation. This would be a result so divorced from actuality and so utterly opposed to the leading provision of the Finance Act itself that I should be very slow to accept it. In the case where the subjects as a whole have been undervalued and their true value is ascertained on the occasion of a sale, I can see no principle upon which the whole increase of value is to be attributed to the

Mar. 6, 1913. Inland Revenue v. Walker. site. Where both site and buildings have remained unaltered, as is found in the present case, the difference may be attributed either to an increase in the value of the buildings, which may quite well happen if the prices of material have in the meantime gone up, or to an increase in the value of the site, as where there has been a growing demand for land in the locality, or partly to the one and partly to the other. Here the referee holds that the difference is attributable to the extent of £172 to an undervaluation of the buildings, and to the extent of £78 to an undervaluation of the site. The latter sum would on this footing be the sum on which increment value duty falls to be calculated.

It is easy to figure cases in which the method for which the Inland Revenue contends in the present case would be disastrous to the Crown. Take, for instance, the case of a warehouse which at the date of a provisional valuation was well let and which had for years been unoccupied before the occasional site value came to be ascertained. I know of concrete cases where such property has become practically valueless, so far as the buildings are concerned, through the conditions of trade having entirely altered. When grain was carried in sailing vessels whose arrival was uncertain, provision had to be made for the requirements of the community by storing it in warehouses, for the use of which substantial rents were paid. Now that similar cargoes are conveyed in steamers, the date of whose arrival can be fixed with almost mathematical precision, the necessity for storing grain has to a large extent disappeared, the buyers' requirements being periodically supplied by fresh arrivals of steamers. The result has been that many such warehouses have become practically unsaleable, and instead of adding value to the site, perhaps diminish it by the necessity of removing the buildings in order to make way for new ones of a different type. It would be absurd in such a case to stereotype the value of the building at the time when the sale took place by reference to its value as fixed by a provisional valuation when it was a lettable and valuable commercial subject. An even stronger case would be where buildings had been allowed to become dilapidated and the whole value consisted in the value of the site. Where in such a case the price paid was largely in excess of the assessable site value as previously ascertained but below the combined value of the site and buildings, there would be no increment value on which duty could be charged, although in fact the site had doubled or quadrupled in value. I cannot imagine the Legislature had this in view, nor do I see any warrant for the contention that the value of the buildings, assuming that they remained physically the same, is always to be treated as a fixed quantity ascertainable only by reference to the provisional valuation.

The only other point on which I desire to offer an opinion has reference to the view which I understand is held by one of your Lordships, that the gross value of a particular piece of land falls, under section 25, to be ascertained by a valuer irrespective of the amount at which the land has actually been sold at the very time when the valuation falls to be made. For my own part I see no warrant in section 25 (1) for such a view. The language is, of course, general, because it applies to cases where there has been no actual transaction as well as to cases in which there has been a transaction. In the former case—as, for instance, when land continues to be held by a body corporate or unincorporate—the value can only be ascertained by Mar. 6, 1913. means of a valuation; but when there has been an actual sale in the open market there is no need, and no justification, for resorting to what is at best only an approximate method of ascertaining the value in the open market. I cannot appreciate the view that the price paid by the purchaser here may have been the price fixed by an unwilling seller and so in excess of the market value. There is no suggestion that the respondent was in any sense an unwilling seller; and assuming that no personal considerations entered into the transaction, I cannot conceive that she got more than the market price of her property. If so, then Mr Binnie's value is that of that market price. £552 represents the value of the buildings and £98 the value of the site divested of buildings. On questions of value the referee is prima facie conclusive; and it would be an odd result if we were required by the Act in arriving at the assessable value of the site to deduct from the gross value a figure as representing the value of the buildings which has been reached on the footing that the market value of the subjects was £180 less than the price actually paid by a willing purchaser to a willing seller. There may be anomalies in the Act; but I do not think that this is one which results from a fair construction of its provisions. I can conceive a case where, although the total amount actually realised for a piece of land covered with houses was less than the amount of the provisional valuation, increment-duty would still be chargeable if, on a revaluation of the buildings, the valuator found that they had been overvalued in the provisional valuation, or had greatly depreciated in value; but even such a result would not be outwith the scope of the Act, as its leading enactment provides for a duty being levied upon any increment value of a site, and it is this alone with which the Act proposes to deal. But I could not be a party to a decision which would result in holding that, when a referee has fixed the value of the site at £70 on one method of calculation and at £98 upon another, we should, nevertheless, be driven to the conclusion that its true value was £270 for the purposes of the Act. The fallacy which I humbly conceive underlies this view consists in assuming that the value in the open market of the fee-simple of land falls to be ascertained, not by reference to the market price actually obtained, but by some calculation as to what it would fetch if it were exposed for sale. When reliance is placed on Mr Binnie's valuation of the buildings on this property at the sum of £400, it must be kept in view that he reached this on the footing that some considerations personal to the occupier entered into the price, whereas if this assumption were erroneous he valued the buildings at £552.

I have therefore reached the conclusion that the referee was right in holding that the increment value duty leviable on the respondent falls to be calculated on the sum of £50; or, in the event of its being held that no part of the total value was attributable to a matter personal to the occupier of the subjects, on the sum of £78.

LORD CULLEN.—The property in question in this case was the subject of valuation in terms of section 26 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The "total value" as at 30th April 1909 was fixed at £400, and the "assessable site value" at £20. In June 1911 the property was sold by the

Mar. 6, 1913. respondent Mrs Walker to her brother-in-law, James B. Walker, for £650. James B. Walker was the tenant of the premises, which consisted of a dwelling-house and shop. The Crown now claim increment value duty on the occasion of this transfer on sale, and the question at issue relates to the mode of calculating the site value on the occasion under the provisions of the statute.

Inland Revenue v. Walker.

Lord Cullen.

The subject of the duty is denominated (section 1) "the increment value of any land," and increment value is to be deemed to be (section 2 (1)) "the amount (if any) by which the site value of the land, on the occasion on which increment value duty is to be collected as ascertained in accordance with this section, exceeds the original site value of the land as ascertained in accordance with the general provisions of this part of this Act as to valuation." In ascertaining the site value on an occasion, where the occasion is a transfer on sale, the statutory calculation begins (and it may also end) with the price paid. Section 2 (2) (a) of the statute enacts that, on the occasion of a transfer on sale, the site value of the land "shall be taken to be . . . the value of the consideration for the transfer," subject to "the like deductions as are made, under the general provisions of this Part of this Act as to valuation, for the purpose of arriving at the site value of land from the total value."

Starting then with the price here paid—£650—one proceeds to consider what are the allowable deductions from it.

There is an allowable deduction under section 25 (4) (a). It consists of "the same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value." Before the referee it was contended for the Crown that in estimating this deduction it fell to be taken at the same figure as in the original valuation at 30th April 1909. The Crown did not pursue this contention at the hearing before us, and it appears to me to have been unsound. Section 2 allows "the like deductions"; and, in the interval between 30th April 1909 and an "occasion" which gives rise to a claim for increment value duty, the respective values may have changed.

In order to give effect to the deduction in question it is necessary to fix, as at the period of the occasion, the "gross value" and the "full site value." The difference between these forms the amount of the deduction. Gross value and full site value are respectively the subject of definition in section 25 (1) and (2). Both definitions hinge on value in open market as on a sale by a willing seller. Now this standard of value is not necessarily represented by any price which is paid. A price paid may be anything. It may, on the one hand, be a nominal price or a price short of open market value to any extent. It may, on the other hand, be in excess of open market value, as where an owner, instead of becoming a willing seller in open market, makes himself an unwilling seller and obtains from a particular offerer a pretium affectionis. Hence for the purpose of estimating, in accordance with their definitions, gross value and full site value, as on the occasion of a transfer on sale, the price paid does not necessarily afford a test of open market value. It may correspond with that value or it may not. A valuer will take account of the price paid; but he may legitimately hold that the open market value is a different amount.

In the present case the referee, applying the statutory definitions, says:—

"I am of opinion that at 8th June 1911, the date of the occasion above mentioned, the fee-simple of the property, if sold in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition, free from incumbrances, and from any burden, charge, or restriction (other than rates or taxes), might have been expected to realise £475." This is his determination of gross value as on the occasion of the sale in question. The referee then goes on to determine the full site value, which he states at £75. The difference between the gross value and the full site value as so determined is £400. There are no materials before us on which, in my opinion, we can hold the referee's said determination of gross value and full site value as on the occasion in question to be wrong. The price paid was £650. But, as I have said, a price paid is not necessarily a test of open market value. The referee holds that the price of £650 was in excess of such open market value, and in this the respondent agrees. It would seem to follow, therefore, that the amount of the allowable deduction under section 25 (4) (a) of the statute is £400. If this sum be deducted from the price of £650, there is left £250, as being, so far as the calculation has gone, the site value on the occasion. And on a comparison of this figure with the original assessable site value—£20—there is brought out an increment value, for the purposes of the statute, amounting to £230. This is the sum on which the Crown now claims increment value duty.

If the above calculation is in accordance with the statute, and if no further deductions fall to be made, it is clear that, to a large extent, the increment value brought out does not represent an increase in actual site value, but represents the excess of the price paid over the open market value of the property. And it is urged that as increment value, under its definition in section 2, is to be ascertained by comparing two "site values," such a result must be contrary to the intendment of the statute. This criticism proceeds on the assumption that the "site values" so to be compared are both actual site values. They are, however, statutory values, artificial in their definition, and it may be that the application of the statutory definitions will, in some cases at least, bring out results which are also artificial under the denomination of increased site values. Occasional site value here in question is, under section 2, a value which is to be "ascertained in accordance with this section." And a consideration of how the section would apply to other and simpler cases which may be figured will, I think, show that the statutory increment value may be something which does not at all correspond with increase of actual site value. Let me suppose the case of a bare site subject to no incumbrances, burdens, or restrictions. In such a case the gross value, full site value, total value, and original assessable site value would all be the same, to wit, the value of the land if sold in the open market by a willing seller. And let it be supposed that this value was £100, and that the original assessable site value was entered up at that figure. If thereafter the open market value of the site rose to £150, and the owner then sold it for £100, say to his son, there would be no increment value bearing duty, notwithstanding that there had been an increase of the actual site value. For in the case of a sale the statutory occasional site value can never be greater than the amount of the price paid (section 2). Suppose, again, that the same site remained stationary in point of open

Mar. 6, 1913. market value at £100, but that the owner, by making himself an unwilling seller on private bargain, was fortunate enough to sell the land to some one who, for reasons peculiar to himself, paid a pretium affectionis, say £150. As there would be no room for any deductions, this price of £150 would, under section 2, be the site value on the occasion, and there would result an increment value subject to duty, although, ex hypothesi, there had been no increase of actual site value. The conclusion, therefore, seems to me to be unavoidable that, while the tax created by the statute might have been one to be levied only on increase of actual site value, it is a tax leviable on an "increment value" which may or may not correspond with increase of actual site value, and which, in cases like the present, will include what may be described as the windfall to an owner, arising from his having been fortunate enough to sell his property for a price which exceeds its open market value as on a sale by a willing seller.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Lord Cullen.

Another view, however, has been suggested as to the mode of calculating the allowable deduction under section 25 (4) (a) on the occasion of a transfer on sale such as the present. As I understand it, the definition of gross value in section 25 (1)—which hinges on open market value—is to be discarded, and gross value is to be constructed from the price paid, whatever may be its relation to open market value. The foundation of this view is the provision in section 2 that the deductions subtractable from the price are to be the like deductions as would have been subtractable from total value had the calculation been one for arriving at original assessable site value from total value; from which provision the true inference is said to be that the price is not merely stated as the amount from which such deductions may be taken, but is stamped with the statutory character of total value of the property on the occasion. And so taking the price, whatever it may be, as the statutory total value on the occasion, a corresponding gross value on the occasion is to be constructed from it (according to a process which does not figure in the statute) by adding to the price the value of any incumbrances, fixed charges, or restrictions subject to which the property has been sold at that price. I can see no warrant in the statute for this view. The statute does not say, or, to my mind, imply, that any price which may be paid is to be held to be the total value of the property on the occasion according to its definition of total value. What it says is that the price paid is to be primarily deemed to be the site value on the occasion, but that there may be subtracted from it in reaching the increment value subject to duty the like deductions, if any, as would have been subtractable from total value if the process of calculation had been one for reaching original assessable site value from total value. If the view under consideration is followed out in figures, it will be seen that, while the price is formally introduced into the calculation proposed, it is allowed no influence on the resulting increment value, and that the calculation is one of no utility. It may be superfluous to present the calculation in figures. But let me state it. The referee here estimates the full site value on the occasion at £75, and, deducting £5 as the capitalised value of the fixed charge of feu-duty, he estimates the actual open market value of the burdened site on the occasion at £70. These values he reaches by direct estimate. The price paid was £650. Gross value, according to the referee's determination and following its statutory definition, is £475. This Mar. 6, 1913. figure, however, is to be discarded, and there is to be substituted for it a gross value constructed on the basis of the price, conceived as total value ^{Inland Revenue v. Walker.} on the occasion. This is to be done by adding to the price the capitalised value of the fixed charge of feu-duty, thus making gross value £655. As Lord Cullen. full site value has already been determined to be £75, the difference between it and the said gross value is £580. This sum, therefore, is the amount of the allowable deduction from the price of £650 under section 25 (4) (a). And on so deducting it there remains £70, which is just the referee's already determined estimate of the actual open market value of the burdened site on the occasion. Thus the introduction of the price into the calculation has no influence on the result, and the calculation so based on it is meaningless.

I can see no warrant in the statute for the view that gross value, on any occasion when it falls to be estimated for the purpose of ascertaining increment value, is to be estimated otherwise than in accordance with its statutory definition. The definition is based on the value of the property if sold in open market by a willing seller; and a price paid in any particular case may differ indefinitely from this standard of value.

The matter, however, does not rest here, for the respondent claims a further deduction under the provision contained in the last part of subsection (4) (d) of section 25. This provision permits of a deduction of "any part of the total value which is proved . . . to be directly attributable to . . . goodwill, or any other matter which is personal to the owner, occupier, or other person interested for the time being in the land." "Total value" is a value strictly appropriate (by definition) to the land as a real subject. Logically, therefore, there is no room for a deduction from it in respect of personal matters. But the deduction is made applicable, inter alia, to the case of fixing the site value on the occasion of a transfer on sale, and under section 2 the occasional site value is to be taken primarily to be the consideration paid for the transfer. Now, a consideration paid for such a transfer may be a mixed one—it may be given in respect of the transfer of the land and of something else. In such a case there may be room for splitting up the consideration so as to eliminate from it in the calculation of the claim for duty any part of the price which is not paid for the land, to which alone the increment value duty relates. The statutory definition of what may be thus eliminated (reading "price" for "total value") is "any part of the price which is proved to be directly attributable to goodwill, or any other matter which is personal to the owner, occupier, or other person interested for the time being in the land."

The respondent's contention raises, in the first instance, a question of fact. She alleges that the price of £650 paid by James B. Walker was "greatly in excess of its value in the open market at 8th June 1911"; and, further, that "in paying that price he was actuated partly by sentiment, partly by family affection towards his brother's widow, and partly by a dread that, if the subjects were acquired by an outsider, he might be compelled to quit the premises he had long occupied in the property, namely, his shop in which he carried on business and his dwelling-house." The respondent does not here say what part of the price she assigns to the

Mar. 6, 1913. mixed personal motives ascribed by her to the purchaser. The referee did not make any pronouncement on the fact in the original case. But in his "further statement" he says that, in his opinion, the price of £650 was, to the extent of £180, paid by James B. Walker from the mixed personal motives ascribed to him by the respondent. In my opinion the referee had no sufficient ground for coming to this conclusion in fact. He says that he was unable to get any statement from James B. Walker on the subject, and that he found that there was no one else from whom he could get any information. And in these circumstances he simply compares the price of £650 with his open market value of £470, and assumes that James B. Walker must have paid the difference of £180 from such motives as the respondent ascribes to him. This appears to me to be an unwarrantable inference in fact. There is no room for more than mere conjecture on the subject. The only ascertained fact is that Mr Walker paid for the transfer of the property a price of £650, which, ex concessis, exceeded its open market value by £180.

Inland
Revenue v.
Walker.

Lord Cullen.

But, esto that it is to be taken as matter of fact that James B. Walker paid £180 of his price of £650 under the influence of the mixed motives ascribed to him by the respondent and by the referee, there remains the question of law, whether this fact gives room for a deduction under the provision contained in the last part of subsection (4) (d) of section 25 already quoted. The provision is elastic in expression. It provides, in this connection, for a price paid being split up, and for the elimination from it of any part of it which is proved to be directly attributable to goodwill or any other matter which is personal to the owner, &c. On a construction of the provision it appears to me to refer to cases where a buyer pays a lump price, in consideration of which he obtains a transfer of the land and also a transfer or surrender of something else of a personal character to which some ascertainable part of his lump price is "directly attributable" as not being paid for the land. And I am unable to bring into this category any part of the price of £650 in the present case which may have been paid for the land by James B. Walker from a sentiment of benevolence on his part towards the respondent or from a fear of losing his occupancy of the premises if he did not buy them.

I am therefore of opinion that the claim of the Crown for increment value duty on the sum of £230 is well founded.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the decision of the referee on contention (b) of the original appellant is right, and affirm the same in so far as it fixes and determines that the site value of the subjects mentioned in the stated case on the occasion of the transfer is £70."

Sir PHILIP J. HAMILTON GRIERSON, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—PATRICK & JAMES, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN MACKAY HUNTER HAMILTON (James Hamilton's Executor), No. 101.

Appellant (Reclaimant).—Morison, K.C.—G. C. Stewart.

THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Respondent.—Clyde, K.C.—C. H. Brown. Mar. 7, 1913.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Trustee—Transaction—Discharge of bankrupt's co-cautioner with consent of trustee—Commissioners—Necessity for consent of commissioners—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 176. Hamilton's Executor v. Bank of Scotland.

The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 176, enacts:—"The trustee may, with consent of the commissioners, compound and transact or refer to arbitration any questions which may arise in the course of the sequestration regarding the estate, or any demand or claim made thereon, and the compromise, transaction, or decree-arbitral shall be binding on the creditors and the bankrupt."

A cautioner under a letter of guarantee was discharged by the creditor with the consent of the trustee on the sequestrated estate of a co-cautioner.

Held that the consent of the trustee to the discharge was an act of management to which the foregoing section did not apply, and that the concurrence of the commissioners was unnecessary.

Cautioner—Discharge—Giving time—Creditor assuming control of debtor's business.

Averments by a cautioner for a limited company to the effect that the creditor, a bank, held shares in the company, and had assumed control and carried on the business in the interest of the shareholders and to the prejudice of the cautioners, held insufficient to support the contention that the creditor by his actings had given time to the debtor, and had so essentially altered the relation of parties as to discharge the cautioner from his obligation.

Cautioner—Discharge—Recall of guarantee—Effect of recall—Giving time.

A letter of guarantee, granted in favour of a bank in security of advances made by it to a limited company, empowered the bank to give time to the debtor without affecting the liability of the cautioners, and provided that the guarantee should continue in force until recalled.

Opinion that the recall of the guarantee by a cautioner, while preventing further advances to the debtor on the credit of the revoking cautioner, would not in every case debar the bank from giving time to the debtor after the date of the recall.

JOHN MACKAY HUNTER HAMILTON, executor-dative of the deceased James Hamilton, as such executor and as an individual, presented an appeal against a deliverance of Thomas Patrick Laird, C.A., trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said James Hamilton, on a claim in the sequestration lodged by the Bank of Scotland on 24th March 1910. 2^d Division.
Lord Hunter.

The claim was for £21,865, being the sum due under a letter of guarantee, dated 19th and 20th March 1903, granted by James Hamilton, John Leslie Hunter, and three other persons, guaranteeing payment of all sums, not exceeding £20,000 and interest, due or to become due to the Bank by the Lanemark Coal Company, Limited. The letter also stated:—" . . . And we further declare that you may at any time or times at your discretion grant to the said Lanemark Coal Company, Limited, or to any drawers, acceptors, or indorsers of bills of exchange or promissory-notes, received by you

Mar. 7, 1913.

Hamilton's
Executor v.
Bank of Scotland.

from them or on which they may be liable to you, any time or other indulgence, and compound with them or with the said drawers, acceptors, or indorsers respectively, without discharging or satisfying the liability of us or any of us; . . . And it is further declared that this guarantee is to remain in force until recalled by us, or our heirs or executors, in writing." The Lanemark Coal Company, Limited, went into liquidation on 27th January 1909, the amount of its indebtedness to the Bank then being £25,105. Mr Hamilton died on 10th September 1907, and his estate was sequestrated on a petition presented by the Bank of Scotland on 3rd December 1909.

On 17th February 1912 the trustee in the sequestration ranked the Bank to the amount of the sum claimed, less sums received prior to the date of the sequestration.

In his appeal against this deliverance Mr Hamilton's executor averred, inter alia, that after Mr Hamilton's death the appellant, on 30th September 1907, wrote to the Bank recalling the guarantee. The letter stated, "the obligation of the estate under the bond for cash-credit held by you in security of advances to the Lanemark Coal Company is withdrawn." On 1st October 1907 the Bank replied in these terms:—"We have to acknowledge your letter of yesterday withdrawing the obligation of the late Mr Hamilton in connection with the Lanemark Coal Company, Limited, at our Ayr branch. Until a proposal to the satisfaction of the directors is forthcoming, we cannot, as you are aware, release the obligation of Mr Hamilton, and in order to protect the Bank's interests we have instructed the Ayr agent to make the account inoperative."

He further averred:—(Cond. 5) ". . . The Bank were largely interested in the said Lanemark Company as shareholders therein. And during 1907 and 1908 the Lanemark Company had ample liquid assets to meet its creditors and pay off the Bank's indebtedness, which amounted to from £20,000 to £30,000. But if the company had then been wound up, nothing would have remained for the shareholders of the company. In order, therefore, to protect their interest as shareholders, the Bank, through their treasurer and their agent at Ayr, on the one hand, and Mr R. A. Murray, on behalf of the company, negotiated to make a new satisfactory arrangement as mentioned in said letter, and arrangements were definitely made to the Bank's satisfaction, and the obligation of the late Mr Hamilton was thereby released. In particular, a new arrangement was made in October 1908, under which the Bank advanced a further sum of £1000 for carrying on the company. And on the 13th October 1908 Mr Murray telegraphed the treasurer of the Bank: 'Referring our meeting will you kindly wire Ayr confirming arrangement advance on open account £1000,' and the Bank replied, giving the instructions desired. Further, during 1907 and 1908 the Bank controlled the whole business of the company, and carried it on in their own interests as shareholders and to the prejudice of the interests of the said guarantors. The directors of the company were under the control of the Bank. The shares held by the Bank were sufficient to enable them to control the business of the company, and they did in fact control and carry on the business during these years. They appointed a new secretary and law-agent. In January 1908 an offer of £30,000—a sum sufficient to pay the company's whole debts—was made by Messrs John Watson, Limited, but the Bank succeeded in getting this offer rejected on 24th January 1908, and carried a resolution that the business of the company was not to be sold except at a price which would yield the shareholders 10s. per £. The Bank thereafter financed and continued the said company's business, and in consequence of its actings the company incurred further trading losses, and went into liquidation on 27th January 1909. The said liquidation was caused entirely by the actings of the Bank. But for the financial advances made by the Bank the company could not have continued its business, nor would it have incurred the trading losses which ultimately compelled liquidation. The Bank seriously prejudiced the position of said guarantors, as the company was then only able to pay to its creditors a dividend of about 10s. per £. The whole of these proceedings were carried on by the Bank without the appellant's knowledge or consent." (Cond. 6) "In December 1906 the Bank, without the consent of the late Mr James Hamilton, agreed to increase the overdraft allowed to the Lanemark Coal Company, Limited, from £20,000 to £30,000. In security of this additional overdraft of £10,000 the Bank obtained . . . supplementary guarantees for £5000. . . . The Bank, however, made it a condition precedent to their granting the increased overdraft, that they should be allowed to appoint a new manager with control over the management of the company, and also an additional director. The Bank shortly thereafter exercised this power, and appointed a new manager and nominated a new director. The manager appointed by the Bank subsequently became also the managing director of the company."

Mar. 7, 1913.
Hamilton's
Executor v.
Bank of Scotland.

The appellant further averred that Mr J. L. Hunter, one of Mr Hamilton's co-cautioners, executed a trust-deed for creditors on 25th January 1909, that the bank lodged a claim upon his estate for £13,168, that on 22nd December 1909 they received a dividend of £4745, and on the same date granted a discharge in favour of Mr Hunter of all his obligations under the letter of guarantee. This discharge was granted with the express consent in writing of Mr Hamilton's trustee, but without the consent of the commissioners on his bankrupt estate.

Answers were lodged for the Bank of Scotland.

The appellant pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The Bank of Scotland having by their actings freed and relieved the late Mr James Hamilton and his estate of all liability under the said letter of guarantee founded on by them, the present appeal should be sustained: (3) The trustee's deliverance ought to be recalled in respect . . . (b) the bank have discharged the late Mr Hamilton of his obligations under the said guarantee; (c) that the Bank have given time to the debtor since the obligation under the guarantee was recalled; (d) that the Bank have illegally discharged Mr Hamilton's co-cautioners.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The appellant's averments being irrelevant, the appeal should be dismissed.

On 21st December 1912 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Hunter) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the first plea in law for the respondents, and dismissing the appeal.*

* "OPINION.—[After dealing with a matter with which this report is not concerned]—The real case for the appellant, if he has a case at all, is that the cautionary obligation is, in the circumstances, not binding on the estate of the bankrupt. On this matter I find myself brought face to face with a large number of complicated averments and a varied assortment of pleas in law. It is not always easy to say whether the averments are intended to

Mar. 7, 1913.

Hamilton's
Executor v.
Bank of Scotland.

The appellant reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 18th, 19th, and 21st February 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer;—(1) Mr Hunter, Mr Hamilton's co-cautioner, had been discharged by the Bank with the consent of Mr Hamilton's trustee, but without the consent, in writing, of his commissioners,¹ contrary to the provisions of section 176 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.² In effect this amounted to the discharge of Mr Hunter without Mr Hamilton's consent, and therefore operated as a discharge in favour of Mr Hamilton.³ The consent of the commissioners was required to every "administrative act of importance,"⁴ and an appeal could be taken from their decision under section 169 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. (2) Mr Hamilton was also freed by the actings of the Bank in assuming control of the business of their debtor, as set forth in condescendences 5 and 6. They had placed themselves in a position in which it was impossible, consistently with their duty to bear on one or more of the pleas in law. On this ground the appellant seemed to suggest that the most advisable course for me to adopt would be to allow a proof without any limitations and without determining any point. The Bank, however, argued that although they did not dispute the appellant's title to challenge the deliverance, it was to be kept in view that he had desired the sequestration, and that any pecuniary interest in the estate which he had was dependent upon the creditors being paid in full and a reversion remaining over. The declared dividend is 3d. per £. They therefore maintained that the relevance of the appellant's averments, which, if allowed, without limitation, to go to proof, would result in a long, costly, and intricate inquiry, ought to be carefully examined, not only generally, but in detail. I think this is a case where that course ought to be followed; and I should allow a proof, if at all, only upon specific averments, which, in my opinion, would, if proved, lead to my sustaining a plea in law in the appellant's favour.

"In considering the appellant's averments I think that they may be conveniently treated under the three heads: (1) Whether time was given to the debtor by the creditor, and the cautioner thereby released; (2) whether in view of the actings of the creditor the situation was so altered or the position of the cautioner so prejudiced as to release him from his obligation; (3) whether one of the late Mr Hamilton's co-cautioners was released without the consent of the appellant.

"The averments relative to giving time to the debtor were, according to the argument submitted to me, said to be contained in condescendence 6, though plea 3 (c) appears rather to refer to the actings of the Bank subsequent to the cautioner's death. I do not, however, find that the appellant makes any specific averment that the Bank came under a positive obligation not to sue the debtor which prejudiced or might have prejudiced the cautioner's position. The principle upon which giving time to the debtor releases the cautioner is laid down in Oakeley v. Pasheller, 10 Bligh, N. R., 548, as being that, if you agree with the principal to give him time, it is contrary to that agreement that you should sue the surety, because if you sue the surety you immediately turn him upon the principal, and therefore you act in breach of the agreement into which you have entered with the principal—(See Lord Hatherley in Oriental Financial Corporation v. Over-

¹ Mercantile Bank of Sydney v. Taylor, [1893] A. C. 317.

² 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79. Quoted in the rubric.

³ Mercantile Law Amendment Act (Scotland), 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 9.

⁴ Edgar v. Kennedy & Hutton's Trustee, (1905) 7 F. 452, per Lord McLaren, at p. 455.

the shareholders, to sue the company, and this amounted to "giving time" to their debtor.¹ They had essentially altered the relations of parties, and thereby freed the cautioners from their obligation.² It was no answer to say that the letter of guarantee expressly empowered the Bank to give time, because that condition only held good so long as the guarantee remained in force, and came to an end when the guarantee was recalled.³

Argued for the respondents;—(1) Section 176 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, had no application, and therefore the consent of the commissioners to Mr Hunter's discharge was unnecessary. Their concurrence was only required in certain specified cases, such as the compromise of a claim, or the sale of the estate.⁴ In other cases, such as the valuation of claims,⁵ the trustee could act by himself. The consent to Mr Hunter's discharge was a mere step in the administration of the estate, which the trustee could competently take on end, Gurney, & Company, L. R., (1871) 7 Ch. 142, at pp. 150 and 152. In the latter case the Lord Chancellor indicated that it is competent to the creditors to reserve all their rights against the surety, in which case the latter is not discharged. In Rouse v. Bradford Banking Company, [1894] A. C. 586, Lord Herschell, at p. 594, after discussing the rule as to giving time to the debtor freeing the cautioner, points out that time is only given within the meaning of the rule if there is a binding agreement arrived at for good consideration. It has also to be kept in view that the cautionary obligation expressly provides:—'And we further declare that you may at any time or times at your discretion grant to the said Lanemark Coal Company, Limited, or to any drawers, acceptors, or indorsers of bills of exchange or promissory-notes received by you from them or on which they may be liable to you, any time or other indulgence, and compound with them or with the said drawers, acceptors, or indorsers respectively, without discharging or satisfying the liability of us or any of us; and that this guarantee shall apply to and secure any ultimate balance of the sums that shall remain due to you, after applying any dividends, compositions, and payments which you may receive.' In face of that express provision I do not think that any averments are made which if established would warrant my sustaining the plea founded upon giving time to the debtor.

"In the next place, the actings of the Bank subsequent to the death of the debtor are said to be such as to preclude them from suing on the guarantee. These averments are to be found in the 5th article of the concordance. It is said in the first place that a new satisfactory arrangement such as was referred to in the Bank's letter of 1st October 1907 was come to in 1908, and the obligation of the late Mr Hamilton released. This averment proceeds, I think, upon a wrong construction of the letter referred to. What is there alluded to is a satisfactory proposal as to releasing the cautioner, and I do not find any averment that such a proposal was sub-

¹ Polak v. Everett, (1876) 1 Q. B. D. 669; C. & A. Johnstone v. Duthie, (1892) 19 R. 624.

² Bonar v. McDonald, (1850) 7 Bell's App. 379; Hamilton v. Watson, (1845) 4 Bell's App. 67, per Lord Campbell, at p. 103; Holme v. Branskill, (1877) 3 Q. B. D. 495; Stiff v. Eastbourne Local Board, (1869) 20 L. T. (N. S.) 339; Watts v. Shuttleworth, (1860) 29 L. J., Ex. 229, per Pollock, C.B., at p. 234; Bell's Prin. sec. 259; Gloag & Irvine on Cautionary Obligations, p. 865.

³ Coulthart v. Clementson, (1879) 5 Q. B. D. 42; Doig v. Lawrie, (1903) 5 F. 295; Harris v. Fawcett, (1873) L. R., 8 Ch. 866; In re Silvester, [1895] 1 Ch. 573; Hudson on Building Contracts, (3rd ed.) vol. 1, p. 697.

⁴ Secs. 114, 136, 176.

⁵ Sec. 66.

Mar. 7, 1913.
 HAMILTON —
 Hamilton's
 Executor v.
 Bank of Scotland.

his own authority. (2) There was no averment of anything which amounted to "giving time," or of anything which so affected the obligation as to discharge the cautioners. The Bank had no duty to protect the interests of the cautioners, so long as they did nothing to prejudice their right to sue the debtor. In any event, they had express power under the guarantee to grant indulgence to the debtor, and this condition was not affected by the recall. All the acts founded upon took place after the guarantee was revoked in September 1907.

At advising on 7th March 1913,—

LORD SALVESEN.—The most important question in this appeal is whether the late Mr Hamilton was freed from his obligation as a cautioner by a discharge granted by the Bank to his co-cautioner, Mr Hunter. It is conceded that if this discharge was granted without the consent of the trustee mitted to, far less approved of by, the Bank. The other points of complaint against the Bank in article 5 of the condescendence are that the Bank held certain shares in the company; that they acquired control over the management and refused or procured the refusal of an offer of £30,000 for the company assets—a sum sufficient to pay the company's whole debts. It is admitted in answer that the Bank were registered holders of £4700 belonging to customers of the Bank, the total capital of the company being £60,000. For the purposes of the argument I assume that the Bank in virtue of this holding, and otherwise, influenced the action of the company. In so acting they are said to have acted in their interests as shareholders and to have sacrificed the rights of the cautioners. I do not know what duty, according to the appellant's argument, the Bank owed to the cautioners or in what respect they failed in the fulfilment of that duty. They were entitled to be shareholders, and so far as I can see they and the other shareholders who constituted the company were entitled to refuse an offer for the assets and to hold out for a sum that would yield a return of 10s. per share to the shareholders—as it is suggested they did—if in their opinion it was in their interests to do so. That was not, if I may so express it, a dealing by the creditors with the debtor, but solely the act and policy of the shareholders, i.e., the company. The position of the cautioner was not affected thereby. It did not preclude him from suing the Lanemark Company as principal debtor for relief of the cautionary obligation (Doij, 5 F. 295), or from making payment directly to the creditor and getting an assignation which he might have made effectual against the debtor. It would not, I think, serve any good purpose for me to refer in detail to any of the cases which were cited to me by the appellant (e.g., Hamilton, 4 Bell's App. 67; Bonar, 7 Bell's App. 379, and other cases). It is sufficient for me to say that nothing contained in the judgments delivered in them appears to me to support the proposition that a creditor in such an obligation as the present is in breach of duty to a cautioner by acting such as are founded on by the appellant.

"The last, and to my mind the most difficult part of the case, arises out of the averments relative to the discharge of Mr Hunter, one of the co-cautioners of Mr Hamilton in the letter of guarantee. These averments are contained in articles 7, 8, and 9 of the condescendence. [His Lordship summarised the averments.] The appellant argued to me that the consent given by the trustee was ex facie bad, as it did not bear to have been granted with the approval of the commissioners upon the bankrupt estate, and upon this ground it was maintained that I ought, without inquiry, to reverse the deliverance pronounced by the trustee. Section 176 of the Bankruptcy Act, upon which this argument is founded, provides: 'The trustee may, with consent of the commissioners, compound and transact or refer to arbi-on Mr Hamilton's sequestrated estate this would be the legal result. The Mar. 7, 1913.

 discharge itself is produced, and it is therefore incumbent upon the Bank to show that it was granted with such consent. The appellant contended, Hamilton's in the first place, that no relevant averment of such consent was set forth in Executor v.
 answer 9, which is the part of the Bank's record which deals with this Bank of matter, and alternatively that, assuming that the letter of 17th December Scotland.
 1909 founded on is according to its terms a sufficient consent to the dis- Lord Salvesen.
 charge in question, it was invalidated by the circumstances under which it was granted, as averred in cond. 9. Of these averments the appellant asks a proof. [His Lordship dealt with an objection to the letter by Mr Hamilton's trustee consenting to Mr Hunter's discharge, with which this report is not concerned.]

The second objection raises a point of law. The appellant contended that as the letter does not bear to have been granted with the consent of the commissioners, and it being admitted that there is no minute signed by them authorising the trustee to consent, no consent binding on the bankrupt's estate has in fact been given. This argument was based on section 176 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which provides that "the trustee may, with consent of the commissioners, compound and transact or refer to arbitration any questions which may arise in the course of the sequestration regarding the estate, or any demand or claim made thereon." I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this section does not apply. I think the words "compound and transact" are really equivalent to "compromise." To hold otherwise would be in effect to decide that the trustee cannot transact any business in connection with the bankrupt estate without the consent of the commissioners. Their duties are defined by section 85, and while under that section it is imperative that they shall concur with the trustee in submissions and transactions, and while upon them is laid the duty of deciding as to the paying or postponing payment of a dividend, there is no indication that their concurrence in other acts of management by the trustee is essential to their validity. One of the most important duties of a trustee is to adjudicate on claims lodged on the estate, and the deliverance of the trustee himself in a general sense is as much a "transaction" as the granting of a consent to the discharge of a co-cautioner. The fallacy underlying the appellant's argument is that, dissociating the word "transact" from the word "com-tration any questions which may arise in the course of the sequestration regarding the estate, or any demand or claim made thereon, and the compromise, transaction, or decree-arbitral shall be binding on the creditors and the bankrupt.' In my opinion this section does not apply. The Bank had already made a contract with Mr Hunter, and what occurred was not a compounding or transaction of a claim or demand in the sequestration within the meaning of the language used in the section. Further, the appellant has made no averment and founded no plea upon the absence of the commissioners' consent to the course pursued by the trustee. I was informed at the bar that the commissioners had in fact approved what was done.

 Had I, therefore, taken a different view of the scope of the section referred to, I should not have disposed of this part of the case without an amendment of the record and proof or admission of the facts bearing upon the question of consent or absence of consent of the commissioners. . . .

"Upon the whole matter, I sustain the first plea for the respondents, and dismiss the appeal."

Mar. 7, 1913. pound," with which it is connected in section 176, he erroneously treats it as equivalent to "act." I am therefore for repelling this objection. Hamilton's Executor v. Bank of Scotland. [His Lordship dealt with another objection with which this report is not concerned.]

Lord Salvesen. The next contention which it is necessary to notice is that the Bank gave time to the principal debtor without the consent of the cautioners, and thereby released the latter from their obligation. The averments on this head are said to be contained in cond. 5 and the letters there referred to. In my opinion they fall short of what is necessary in order to sustain such a plea. It is noteworthy that, while there is a quite definite plea on this head, the words "giving time" or any equivalent form of expression do not occur in the condescendence. It has been often held that mere delay on the part of a creditor in enforcing his demand against the principal debtor will not discharge the cautioner. A creditor whose claim is sufficiently guaranteed has no motive to press the principal debtor for payment. If the cautioner considers that the payment ought to be exacted, he can either pay up the amount due to the creditor and proceed to enforce the debt as his assignee, or he can, as in the case of Doig,¹ without taking this course call upon the principal debtor to free and relieve him of the liability he has undertaken. Either of these remedies would be barred by the creditor having postponed his right to exact payment by an arrangement with the debtor; but the appellant makes no sufficient averment of such an arrangement. It may well be that it would have been inconsistent with the attitude taken up by the Bank in continuing to finance the principal debtor that they should have instantly demanded payment of his debt; but the appellant must in effect aver that they had disabled themselves from doing so in order that the plea of giving time can be relevantly proponed. This he has nowhere done.

In this view it is unnecessary to consider what is the effect of the clause in the original letter of guarantee, under which it was expressly agreed that the Bank might at their discretion grant to the principal debtor any time or other indulgence without discharging the liability of any of the cautioners. It was argued on behalf of the appellant that so soon as he revoked the guarantee this condition became inoperative. I was at first much impressed with the argument presented on this subject, and I think that circumstances may easily be figured where, if the creditor, notwithstanding the protest of a particular cautioner who had revoked the guarantee, disabled himself from suing the debtor, he could not plead the clause in the original letter of guarantee as entitling him to hold the cautioner still bound. But there is nothing of the kind in the present case, and the so-called revocation by itself primarily operates so as to stop further advances to the principal debtor on the credit of the revoking cautioner. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the conditions on which the original guarantee was granted remained operative, and if the Bank in good faith granted time to the debtor, their so doing would not necessarily free the cautioner from his liability. [His Lordship then dealt with another objection with which this report is not concerned.]

LORD DUNDAS and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

Mar. 7, 1913.

Lord Dundas intimated that the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, who was absent at the advising, also concurred in Lord Salvesen's opinion.

Hamilton's
Executor v.
Bank of Scotland.

THE COURT adhered.

MACKAY & YOUNG, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

THE SCOTTISH INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS, Petitioners.—

No. 102.

Sol.-Gen. Anderson—A. R. Brown.

THE ROYAL INFIRMARY OF EDINBURGH, Respondents.—

Mar. 8, 1913.

Macmillan, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Insurance — National Insurance — Employment — Contract of service — Medical staff of infirmary—Master and Servant—National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55), sec. 1 (1) and (2), and First Schedule, Part I (a).

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v.
Edinburgh
Royal Infirmary.

The National Insurance Act, 1911, enacts, Part I. section 1 (1) and (2), and First Schedule, Part I. (a), that persons employed within the meaning of the Act shall include all persons who are engaged in any "employment in the United Kingdom under any contract of service."

Held that persons appointed to act in an infirmary (1) as resident physicians and resident surgeons; (2) as non-resident house physicians, non-resident house surgeons, and clinical assistants; and (3) as supervisors of the administration of anaesthetics, were not persons employed within the meaning of the Act, in respect that, as the managers of the infirmary had no control over the manner in which these members of the staff carried out their treatment of the patients, no contract of service existed between them.

ON 30th January 1913 the Scottish Insurance Commissioners, established under the National Insurance Act, 1911, presented a petition, in accordance with the provisions of section 66 thereof, for the decision by the Court of a question which had arisen under that Act.

The petition, after quoting the sections of the Act affecting the question,* proceeded as follows:—

* The National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55), Part I., enacts:—

Sec. 1 "(1). Subject to the provisions of this Act all persons of the age of sixteen and upwards who are employed within the meaning of this part of this Act shall be, and any such persons who are not so employed but who possess the qualifications hereinafter mentioned may be insured in manner provided in this part of this Act, and all persons so insured (in this Act called 'insured persons') shall be entitled, in the manner and subject to the conditions provided in this Act, to the benefits in respect of health insurance and prevention of sickness conferred by this part of this Act.

"(2) The persons employed within the meaning of this part of this Act (in this Act referred to as 'employed contributors') shall include all persons of either sex, whether British subjects or not, who are engaged in any of the employments specified in Part I. of the First Schedule to this Act, not being employments specified in Part II. of that Schedule."

Part I. (a) of the First Schedule is in the following terms:—

"(a) Employment in the United Kingdom under any contract of service or apprenticeship, written or oral, whether expressed or

Mar. 8, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Edinburgh Royal Infirmary.

"A question has arisen as to whether the classes of employment hereinafter specified are employment within the meaning of Part I. of the Act, and the petitioners desire, instead of themselves deciding the question, to submit the same for the decision of your Lordships in terms of section 66 (1) (iii.) above recited. The classes of employment to which this application relates are employments at the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh of (a) resident physicians and resident surgeons; (b) non-resident house physicians and non-resident house surgeons and clinical assistants; and (c) supervisors of the administration of anæsthetics.

"The material facts relative to the above-mentioned classes of employment, so far as the petitioners have been able to ascertain, are as follows:—

"(a) Resident Physicians and Resident Surgeons.

"Resident physicians and resident surgeons at the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh are appointed by the Board of Managers on the recommendation of the respective members of the honorary medical and surgical staff, to whom they are to be attached. They reside within the Infirmary, and the duties which they are appointed to perform are the care and treatment of patients in the institution. No one is eligible for appointment who is not a duly registered practitioner. Each resident physician and resident surgeon is responsible to the physician or surgeon under whom he acts for the treatment and professional care of all patients under his charge, and is subject to his control in these matters. He is responsible to the superintendent of the Infirmary for the discipline and general conduct of the wards. He exercises supervision over the conduct of the nurses attached to his wards. The appointments run for periods of six months from 1st October in one year to 31st March in the next, and from 1st April to 30th September in the same year.

"The resident physicians and resident surgeons are bound to observe the regulations prescribed by the managers, a print whereof is herewith produced and referred to. Every applicant for appointment as implied, and whether the employed person is paid by the employer or some other person, and whether under one or more employers, and whether paid by time or by the piece, or partly by time and partly by the piece, or otherwise, or, except in the case of a contract of apprenticeship, without any money payment."

Part II. of the First Schedule contains, inter alia, the following provisions, viz:—

"EXCEPTIONS.

"(g) Employment otherwise than by way of manual labour and at a rate of remuneration exceeding in value £160 a year, or in cases where such employment involves part time service only, at a rate of remuneration which, in the opinion of the Insurance Commissioners, is equivalent to a rate of remuneration exceeding £160 a year for whole time service."

"(h) Employment of a casual nature otherwise than for the purposes of the employer's trade or business, and otherwise than for the purposes of any game or recreation where the persons employed are engaged or paid through a club, and in such case the club shall be deemed to be the employer."

a resident physician and resident surgeon is required to fill up a printed form of application, which is in the following terms:—

Mar. 8, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Edinburgh Royal Infirmary.

“The Royal Infirmary,
“Edinburgh, 19 .

“The Right Honourable and Honourable the Managers of the Royal Infirmary.

“My Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—I beg to apply for the appointment of , to the

under the charge of , for six months from , and undertake, in the event of your granting my application, not to relinquish my duties prior to the expiry of that period, unless I shall previously have obtained your sanction to my so doing.—I am, my Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

“‘(State qualifications here.)’

“There is no salary attached to the office. Each resident receives board and lodging free, and an allowance of £2, 10s. in lieu of laundry for the period of his engagement. The value of the board and lodging, taken along with the said allowance, does not exceed £160 per year.

“(b) Non-Resident House Physicians, Non-Resident House Surgeons, and Clinical Assistants.

“Non-resident house physicians, non-resident house surgeons, and clinical assistants are appointed by the Board of Managers on the recommendation of the respective members of the honorary medical and surgical staff, to whom they are to be attached. They must be duly qualified medical men, and a number of them subsequently become resident physicians and resident surgeons on completing their term of six months as clinical assistants. Their duties are to assist in the care and treatment of patients. They are occupied in the performance of their duties for two or three hours daily on an average. Their appointment remains in force for six months, but may be renewed by the Managers for a further period of similar duration. Each is responsible to and under the control of the physician or surgeon under whom he acts professionally, and to the Superintendent of the Infirmary for the discipline and general conduct of his wards or department when such is under his charge.

“They are subject to the regulations above referred to so far as is compatible with non-residence in the Infirmary. Each applicant for appointment is required to fill up the form of application above quoted.

“There is no remuneration for the work, but a number of the holders of the office are allowed lunch at the residency.

“(c) Supervisors of the Administration of Anæsthetics.

“These are appointed by the Board of Managers on the recommendation of the various members of the honorary staff to whom they are to be attached. They must be duly qualified medical practitioners. The holders of the office are generally young medical men who have commenced practice on their own account, and who may also be acting as private assistants to surgeons and specialists. Their duties are to supervise and direct the administration of anæsthetics in the various operating theatres of the institution. Each supervisor is attached to a particular surgeon under whose directions he acts, and whom he attends when required. The physician or surgeon is entitled to give directions to the administrator not only as regards the time, place, and

Mar. 8, 1913.
Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Edinburgh Royal Infirmary.

general mode of performance of his duties, but also as regards the particular method of administration, including the prescribing of the particular anæsthetic to be administered. The Board of Managers regard the physician or surgeon and not the administrator as the person responsible.

"The said supervisors are subject to the before-mentioned regulations and also to the further 'rules for supervisors of the administration of anæsthetics,' adopted 21st October 1912, a print of which is produced. The time occupied in the performance of their duties varies from one to two hours per day on an average.

"They receive an honorarium of £20 per annum, a rate of remuneration which, in the petitioners' opinion, is not equivalent to a rate of remuneration exceeding £160 a year for whole time service.

"All the members engaged in the three classes of employment (a), (b), and (c) above specified are liable to be suspended by the Superintendent for any insubordination or improper conduct, or any infraction of the said regulations."

Answers were lodged for the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, in which it was stated:—" (2) These respondents maintain that the three classes of persons—(a), (b), and (c), referred to in the petition—are not employed within the meaning of Part I. of the National Insurance Act, 1911, and that there is not a contract of service between any of these persons and the respondents or the Board of Managers on their behalf within the meaning of Part I. (a) of the First Schedule to said Act. On an application made to them under section 66 (a) of said Act, and after a public hearing, the English Insurance Commissioners under said Act have decided as follows, viz.:—'That resident medical officers at hospitals employed under the conditions referred to at the hearing on the 22nd October 1912 are not employed under a contract of service within the meaning of the National Insurance Act, and are accordingly not required to be insured thereunder, even if their rate of remuneration does not exceed in value £160 a year.' (3) In any event, these respondents maintain that the supervisors of the administration of anæsthetics constitute a class of employment excepted from the operation of the Act under Part II. (A) of the First Schedule to the Act. . . ."

Counsel were heard before the First Division (without Lord Macenzie) on 8th March 1913.

Argued for the petitioners;—The question raised in this petition was whether these various classes of professional gentlemen had entered into contracts of service with the Managers of the Infirmary. There was no necessary implication that because they were professional men they could not be the servants of the managers.¹ Although similar questions arising under this statute with regard to clergymen had been decided in England against the view that was presented here by the petitioners,² these decisions did not rule the present case, because they proceeded on the ground that a clergyman was not employed but was appointed to an office. At the same time, the position occupied by the medical staff here satisfied the three tests of Mar. 8, 1913. employment laid down in the Church of England Curates case, by Parker, J.,¹ with regard to appointment, power of dismissal, and duties owed. With respect to the duties owed, the relation of master and servant existed where the employer had control of the services of the employed.² In the present case the managers had control of the services of these gentlemen as to the time, the place, and the manner of the performance of the services, and it was immaterial whether the immediate control of the treatment of the patients was exercised by the managers directly or through their representatives, the honorary physician or surgeon.³

¹ Hillyer v. Governors of St Bartholomew's Hospital, [1909] 2 K. B. 820, per Farwell, L.J., at p. 825; Foot v. Directors of Greenock Hospital, 1912 S. C. 69.

² In re Employment of Church of England Curates, [1912] 2 Ch. 563; In re Employment of Ministers of United Methodist Church, (1912) 28 T. L. R. 539.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Edinburgh Royal Infirmary.

Argued for the respondents;—The persons concerned were not employed under contracts of service. Their contracts with the managers were contracts for services, which were clearly recognised in law as being something different from contracts of service.⁴ The root idea of a contract of service was that a servant was "a person subject to the commands of his master as to the manner in which he shall do his work."⁵ The essential matter was not whether there was control over the persons rendering the services, but whether this control extended over the actual services rendered.⁶ Any control which the managers had over these professional gentlemen was as to the hours and place of the performance of their duties, but not as to the method in which the duties should be performed. All that the managers undertook to provide was a competent medical staff, but they neither did, nor professed to, control the manner in which medical treatment was carried out.⁷ The case of *Walker*⁸ was distinguishable in the latter respect; there the profession of the football club was, by means of hired players, to provide a game of football.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition presented by the Scottish Insurance Commissioners under the National Insurance Act, 1911, in terms of the provisions of section 66 of the Act, which provides that "if any question arises (a) as to whether any employment or any class of employment is or will be employment within the meaning of this part of this Act," the Commissioners may, if they think fit, instead of deciding that question themselves, submit it for decision to the Court. The particular question that

¹ [1912] 2 Ch., at p. 570.

² Pollok on Torts, (9th ed.) p. 81; Simmons v. Heath Laundry Co., [1910] 1 K. B. 543; Walker v. Crystal Palace Football Club, Limited, [1910] 1 K. B. 87.

³ Walker v. Crystal Palace Football Club, Limited, [1910] 1 K. B. per Cozens-Hardy, M.R., at p. 92.

⁴ Simmons v. Heath Laundry Co., [1910] 1 K. B. 543, Fletcher Moulton, L.J., at p. 549.

⁵ Yewens v. Noakes, (1880) 6 Q. B. D. 530, per Bramwell, L.J., at p. 532.

⁶ Simmons v. Heath Laundry Co., [1910] 1 K. B. 543, per Fletcher Moulton, L.J., at p. 549; Hall v. Lees, [1904] 2 K. B. 602, per Collins, M.R., at p. 614.

⁷ Evans v. Liverpool Corporation, [1906] 1 K. B. 160, per Walton, J., at p. 166; Murphy v. Enniscorthy Guardians, [1908] 2 I. R. 609; Hillyer v. Governors of St Bartholomew's Hospital, [1909] 2 K. B. 820, per Farwell, L.J., at p. 825, and Kennedy, L.J., at p. 829; Foot v. Directors of Greenock Hospital, 1912 S. C. 69.

⁸ Walker v. Crystal Palace Football Club, Limited, [1910] 1 K. B. 87.

Mar. 8, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Edinburgh Royal Infirmary.

has been submitted to us is as regards three classes of persons in connection with the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, to wit, the resident physicians and the resident surgeons; the non-resident house physicians, non-resident house surgeons, and clinical assistants; and the supervisors of the administration of anæsthetics.

The facts bearing upon the position of these various classes of persons are set forth in the petition, and there is no difference of opinion as to their being correctly set forth. Roughly speaking, it comes to this, that the resident physicians and the resident surgeons are appointed for periods of six months, that they have to reside in the Infirmary, and that their duties are in connection with the patients, they being subordinated in all matters of professional treatment and care of the patients under their charge to the honorary physicians and surgeons. Then the non-resident house physicians and non-resident house surgeons and the clinical assistants, not being residents, do not give their services at all times of the day; in the same way, supervisors of the administration of anæsthetics are only present if necessity calls for them in operations. In the carrying out of his work a member of any of these classes of persons is either the senior medical man present, in which case he is himself the judge of what is the proper course of treatment to be carried out at the moment, or he is acting with senior physicians or surgeons, in which case he is under the orders of whoever is the head physician or surgeon present at the moment. In no case is he, or can he be, interfered with by the Managers of the Infirmary in his treatment of the patients.

Now the Act provides:—[His Lordship quoted section 1 and Part I. of the First Schedule]. The matter, therefore, seems to turn entirely upon whether these people are employed under a contract of service. I am of opinion that they are not. Various cases have been quoted to us by which the subject has certainly been illuminated. And it cannot be more tersely put than it has been put by Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in Simmons v. Heath Laundry Company,¹ where he says the question depends on whether the matter is a contract of service or a contract for services. It is a very convenient way of expressing the real question at issue. I think this is a contract for services and not one of service. The test is, I think, as Mr Macmillan put it to us, control in the matter of service rendered. There are many cases where there is a proper control of service and yet, when you come to the details of how that service is carried out, there is no practical control, because there may be skill in the servant which the master does not possess; indeed the servant is often engaged solely because he happens to possess skill which the master does not possess, but nevertheless, in the general direction of what the servant is or is not to do, the master is supreme.

Now if the business of the Infirmary Managers was to treat the patients, then there might be control; but that is not the business of the Infirmary Managers, as is pointed out in the case of Hillyer v. Governors of St Bartholomew's Hospital,² which was quoted to us. The managers of a hospital do not go to the public with a profession of themselves operating on or nursing or treating patients. They only hold themselves out as providing an institution where patients will be able to meet with skilled persons who will do those things. And that is the real distinction between this case and the case of Walker v. Crystal Palace Football Club, Limited,¹ because the latter case, I think, is only supportable upon the view that the profession of the company there was to provide a game of football, and, as they could not do this themselves, they could only do it through employees, whom they accordingly hired for the purpose of doing that which they could not do themselves, but which was their business. Here the treatment of the patients is not the business of the Infirmary Managers. All the Managers do is to provide the Infirmary; when it comes to the treatment, that is done by the skilled persons who give their services gratuitously or upon very inadequate terms.

¹ [1910] 1 K. B. 543, at p. 549.

² [1909] 2 K. B. 820.

Mar. 8, 1913.
Scottish Insurance Commissioners v.
Edinburgh
Royal Infirmary.
Ld. President.

Accordingly I am of opinion that we should answer the question by saying that these persons, one and all of them, do not fall within the expression "contract of service," and, consequently, are not employed within the meaning of the Act.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and for the reasons your Lordship has given. I think that the relation of master and servant has not been established between the Governors of the Infirmary and the resident physicians and surgeons and others referred to in this petition. These gentlemen are not employed by the Infirmary, as I understand it, under a contract of service, and the Governors of the Infirmary have, accordingly, no power to regulate their treatment of patients or even to interfere with their treatment in any way whatever. They are subject to the orders and at the disposal of the honorary physicians and surgeons, but not of the Governors of the Infirmary. I think that any apparent difficulty which might arise at first sight upon the statement of this question is completely removed by a correct definition of the expression "contract of service," because the relation of master and servant exists only between persons of whom one has the order and control of the work done by the other, not only as regards its object, but also as regards the method of execution. It is satisfactory to know that the view which your Lordship has taken has the authority both of the Court of Appeal in England and of the Chief Justice in America, whose judgment is cited by that Court.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur with your Lordships, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT found that the classes of employment mentioned in the prayer of the petition were not employments within the meaning of Part I. of the Act.

JAMES WATT, W.S.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

¹ [1910] 1 K. B. 87.

No. 103.

HENRY CAMPBELL, Pursuer.—A. M. Mackay.
OSBORNE & HUNTER, Defenders.

Mar. 8, 1913.

Campbell v.
Osborne &
Hunter.Process—Jury trial—Transmission of cause for trial at sittings—Failure to lodge papers within time specified in Rolls of Court—Act of Sederunt, 19th November 1910, sec. 3.

The Act of Sederunt, 19th November 1910, enacts, sec. 3, that where the Lord Ordinary has issued an interlocutor ordering a cause to be tried at the sittings, the process shall forthwith be transmitted to the Clerk of the Division, and that copies of certain papers shall also be handed to the Keeper of the Rolls.

The Lord Ordinary having on 20th February made such an order, the agent responsible tendered the necessary papers to the Keeper of the Rolls on the afternoon of 5th March, but the Keeper refused to accept them, on the ground that, under a notice inserted in the Rolls of Court, midday of 5th March was the latest time at which they could be received.

On a note for authority to the Keeper to receive the papers and include the cause among those to be taken at the sittings, the Court refused to grant that authority, but instead thereof discharged the Lord Ordinary's order, and remitted to him to proceed.

1st DIVISION. ON 12th December 1912 Henry Campbell brought an action of damages against Osborne & Hunter.

Lord
Skerrington.

On 18th February 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) approved of an issue, and appointed Friday, 4th July, as a diet for the trial of the cause.

On 20th February the Lord Ordinary, on the motion of the pursuer, the defender not objecting, discharged the diet for 4th July, and appointed the issue to be tried at the sittings in the ensuing vacation.*

On 28th February 1913 a notice appeared in the Rolls to the effect that the sittings of the Divisions for jury trials in the ensuing vacation would begin on 22nd March. A note was appended in which agents were referred to the Act of Sederunt of 19th November 1910, and in which it was intimated that the prescribed papers should be handed to the Keeper of the Rolls of the appropriate Division not later than 12 o'clock noon on the 5th March, and that otherwise the case would not be taken at the sittings.

On the afternoon of 5th March the pursuer's agent tendered the prescribed papers, viz., a copy of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and a print of the record and issue, to the Keeper of the Rolls of the First Division, but the latter refused to accept them or to include the cause in the Roll of jury trials for the ensuing vacation.

The pursuer thereupon presented a note in which he prayed the Lord President "to move the Court to grant authority to the Keeper of the

* The Act of Sederunt, 19th November 1910, enacts that where a party has given notice that he wishes a cause to be tried at the sittings, and where the Lord Ordinary has pronounced an interlocutor to that effect, (sec. 3) " . . . the process shall forthwith be transmitted by the agent of the party giving such notice to the Clerk of the Division to which the cause is marked. A copy of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing the trial to proceed at the sittings along with a print of the closed record and of the adjusted issue or issues shall also be handed to the Keeper of the Rolls of such Division."

Rolls to receive the said copy interlocutor and print, and thereafter ^{Mar. 8, 1913.} to include the present cause in the list of causes for trial at the forthcoming sittings before the First Division, and to publish the name of ^{Campbell v. Osborne & Hunter.} the same in the appropriate Rolls of Court, or otherwise to postpone the hearing in the present cause from the forthcoming sittings for jury trials till a date to be afterwards fixed, and to remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary with power to fix of new a diet for the trial of the cause . . . ; and on 8th March his counsel, in the Single Bills of the First Division (the Lord President being absent), moved for an order in terms of the first crave of the note, or alternatively of the second crave.

THE COURT, without delivering opinions, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the note for the pursuer, on his motion discharge the order for trial of the cause at the sittings in the ensuing vacation, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as accords."

ST CLAIR SWANSON & MANSON, W.S., Agents.

MRS FANNY SUSANNAH COPELAND OR BARKWORTH, Petitioner.—

Horne, K.C.—MacRobert.

JOHN EDMUND BARKWORTH, Respondent.—Wilson, K.C.—

Lord Kinross.

No. 104.

Mar. 12, 1913.

Barkworth v.
Barkworth.

Jurisdiction—Husband and wife—Access to children—Jurisdiction to entertain petition for access where spouses have foreign domicile—Expenses—Parent and child—Minor and pupil.

In an action at the instance of a husband for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, the Lord Ordinary repelled a plea of no jurisdiction and granted decree. Thereupon the wife, who resided in England, presented a petition for access to the minor children of the marriage, whose residence was with their father in Scotland. While the petition was still pending, the Court, on a reclaiming note, recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the action of divorce and sustained the plea of no jurisdiction, on the ground that the husband's domicile was English.

Thereafter they dismissed the petition for access, holding that it followed from the previous decision that they had no jurisdiction to entertain it; but allowed the wife her expenses in the petition, on the ground that, at the time she presented it, she was entitled to do so.

ON 26th September 1912 Mrs Fanny Susannah Copeland or Bark-^{1ST DIVISION.} worth, residing in London, presented a petition for access to the children of the marriage between her and John Edmund Barkworth, residing at Edrom, in Berwickshire. It was stated in the petition that the parties were married in 1894, and that there were three children of the marriage, a boy born in 1895 and a boy and a girl born in 1896; that the children were living with their father; and that the spouses had lived apart since 1897. It appeared in the course of the proceedings that all the children were at school in England. Answers were lodged by Mr Barkworth on 16th October 1912.

On 25th October 1911 an action of divorce for desertion had been brought by the husband against the wife. In this action the Lord Ordinary (Dewar), by interlocutor dated 6th February 1912, repelled a plea by the wife of no jurisdiction, and, by interlocutor dated 9th

Mar. 12, 1913. July 1912, granted decree of divorce. The wife had reclaimed against this latter interlocutor at the date when the petition for access was presented.

Barkworth v.
Barkworth.

On 4th February 1913 the First Division, after hearing counsel upon the reclaiming note in the action of divorce, recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors and dismissed the action on the ground of no jurisdiction, the Court holding that the husband's domicile was English.

Counsel were heard upon the petition and answers before the First Division (without Lord Kinnear) on 18th February 1913.

At the hearing the question whether the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the petition was raised by the Court, and it was argued for the petitioner that the Court had jurisdiction, in respect that the home of the father and children, to which the latter returned in their holidays, was in Scotland. No argument on this question was submitted for the respondent, who took no exception to the jurisdiction of the Court.

At advising on 12th March 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition at the instance of a married lady, and the prayer of the petition is that the Court should give certain orders as to allowing her access to her children.

When the petition was brought affairs were in this position: An action of divorce for desertion had been brought by the husband against the wife, and on 9th July 1912 the Lord Ordinary, who had previously repelled a plea of no jurisdiction which had been tabled by the defender, pronounced decree of divorce. This petition was boxed upon 26th September 1912. A reclaiming note was taken against the decree of divorce, and when that reclaiming note came up here in the month of February 1913 the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was recalled, upon the ground that there was no jurisdiction in the matter, the Division holding that the domicile of the husband was not Scottish but was English.

That fact seems to me to alter entirely the position of affairs when this petition was presented, because we have this petition now at the instance of a lady who has successfully pled, in the action of divorce, that the marriage is not liable to be dissolved by the Scots Court because of want of jurisdiction over the spouses. I think that that fact involves as a corollary the dismissal of this petition, for I think it is impossible that we should have no jurisdiction to settle the question of the marriage and, at the same time, have a jurisdiction to deal with the family arrangements about the children. The parties to this petition are at this present moment married people. If the wife does not choose to live with the husband that is her own matter, but I am quite clear that if she wants any redress upon the question of the children she must apply for it in the Court where the domicile of the spouses is, namely, the Court of England. The only fact in regard to the husband is that he has got a house and lives in Scotland. The children themselves are in England for a large part of the year, because they are at school there. I need scarcely say that if there was any order of the English Court upon the matter we should give the assistance of this Court to see that it was carried out in Scotland, but as matters stand I think the petition falls to be dismissed.

I think the petitioner here is entitled to her expenses. I do not go upon Mar. 12, 1913. any question of the conduct of the parties because that would be deciding Barkworth v. upon a fact as to which I know nothing, but I think that, in the position Barkworth. in which the wife was, namely, a wife divorced for desertion and the husband not seeing eye to eye with her as to what access should be given to her children, she was entitled to bring the petition at the time she did. Ld. President.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree with your Lordship.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I also agree.

THE COURT dismissed the petition, but found the petitioner entitled to expenses.

BELL, BANNERMAN, & FINLAY, W.S.—GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.—Agents.

MRS MARY GIBB OR M'EWEN AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).— No. 105.
Sandeman, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.
 STEEDMAN & M'ALISTER, Defenders (Respondents).— Wilson, K.C.— Mar. 13, 1913.
Paton. M'Ewen v. Steedman & M'Alister.

Expenses—Nuisance—Remedial measures—Remit to ascertain effect—Expenses of remit.

During the course of an action for interdict of a nuisance the existence of the nuisance was established, and the defenders then executed certain remedial measures, which, however, the pursuers maintained had been unsuccessful. The Court thereupon remitted the matter to a man of skill, who reported that the nuisance had been effectually removed.

Circumstances in which the Court allowed the defenders the expenses of the remit.

(REPORTED ante, 1912 S. C. 156.)

On 6th October 1909 Mrs M'Ewen and others brought an action against Steedman & M'Alister to interdict them from working a gas-engine in premises occupied by them in Ardgowan Street, Glasgow, so as to cause vibration to adjoining premises of which the pursuers were proprietors, and to be a nuisance to the tenants and occupiers thereof.

On 21st November 1911 the Court found the nuisance proved, but, without granting interdict, allowed the defenders an opportunity of taking remedial steps for the removal of the nuisance.*

The defenders thereupon executed certain remedial works, and communicated with the pursuers, who replied that their engineer now "found little or nothing to complain of," but that their factor maintained that "the vibration continues just as before," and that all their tenants had signed a memorandum to the effect that "the vibration is in no way abated."

On 21st February 1912 the defenders moved the Second Division to find that the remedial works were satisfactory, and that in respect thereof it was unnecessary to grant interdict. The motion was opposed by the pursuers, and the Court, on the same date, remitted to Professor Hudson Beare to report whether the remedial measures were effective or not. He reported that the measures were effective.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of
 Lanarkshire.

* Reported ante, 1912 S. C. 156.

Mar. 13, 1913. On 13th March 1913 the defenders of new moved the Court to find that the remedial works were satisfactory and that interdict should be refused. They also moved that the pursuers should be found liable in the expenses of the remit.

M'Ewen v.
Steedman &
M'Alister.

The pursuers opposed the motion for expenses and argued;—If the Court delayed granting interdict after the nuisance had been proved in order to give the defenders an opportunity of executing remedial measures, that was an indulgence to the defenders and the pursuers were entitled to be kept indemnes until the Court was satisfied that the nuisance had been abated. The method which the Court chose of satisfying itself that the nuisance was abated, was to remit to a neutral expert, and the expenses of that remit should be borne by the defenders.¹ The pursuers acted reasonably in opposing the defenders' motion on 21st February for they had good reason to suppose that the nuisance still continued.

Argued for the defenders;—The expenses of the remit had been occasioned by the improper and ill-founded opposition of the pursuers to the defenders' motion on 21st February, and accordingly these expenses should fall on the pursuers.

THE COURT, without delivering opinions, pronounced an interlocutor finding that the remedial works were satisfactory, and that it was unnecessary to grant interdict, dismissing the petition, and finding the pursuers entitled to additional expenses up to 21st February 1912, and the defenders entitled to expenses since that date, including the expenses of and incident to the report.

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—GRAHAM MILLER & BRODIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 106. WATSON, LAIDLAW, & COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Clyde, K.C.—Sandeman, K.C.—R. B. King.

Mar. 14, 1913. POTT, CASSELS, & WILLIAMSON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Dickson—Macmillan, K.C.—Normand.

Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited,
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.

Patent—Infringement—Measure of damages.

In an action by a patentee for damages in respect of the sale of articles infringing his patent, the measure of damages may prima facie be taken to be the amount of profit which the pursuer would have obtained if he had himself effected the sales wrongfully effected by the defender. But the amount of damages so ascertained will be diminished if, and to the extent to which, it appears on a consideration of circumstances such as the nature of the trade, the area of its exercise, the volume of competition, and the defender's energy and skill in pushing trade upon the market, that the pursuer would not have effected these sales himself.

Opinion (per Lord Dundas and Lord Salvesen) that there may be circumstances in which a pursuer may also fairly claim, as an item of damages, that he has been compelled, owing to the defender's illegal competition, to sell some of his patented articles at a lower price than formerly.

¹ Dodd v. Hilson, (1874) 1 R. 527.

(Reported ante, on a question of relevancy, 1909 S. C. 1445.)

Mar. 14, 1913.

On 9th March 1907 Watson, Laidlaw, & Company, Limited, engineers, Glasgow, brought an action against Pott, Cassels, & Williamson, Laidlaw, & engineers, Motherwell, and the individual partners of the firm. The Co., Limited, conclusions of the action were (1) for interdict against the defenders v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson. infringing a patent belonging to the pursuers, and (2) for £5000 in name of damages.

Defences were lodged, in which the validity of the pursuers' patent was challenged. A proof was led as to this matter, the question of damages being by arrangement held over; and on 9th June 1910 the Second Division, on a reclaiming note from an interlocutor of Lord Salvesen, pronounced an interlocutor interdicting the defenders from infringing the pursuers' patent, and remitting to Lord Dewar to dispose of the question of the amount of damages due for the infringement.¹ The defenders having appealed against this interlocutor, the House of Lords was equally divided as to the validity of the patent, and the appeal was dismissed.²

2D DIVISION.
Lord Dewar.

The defenders then made a tender of £1500. This tender was refused, and a proof was led before Lord Dewar on the question of the amount of damages, the import of which appears from the opinions of Lord Dundas and Lord Salvesen, infra.

On 30th March 1912 Lord Dewar pronounced an interlocutor decerning against the defenders for payment of £1500 in full of damages.*

Against this interlocutor the pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 27th and 28th February and 1st March 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The Lord Ordinary's award of damages was inadequate. The damages claimed were £5000; and loss to this extent was fully proved. The rule as to assessing damages for the infringement of a patent was stated by Lord Kinnear in the case of

¹ Reported (1910) 27 R. P. C. 541.

² Reported (1911) 28 R. P. C. 565, 48 S. L. R. 782.

* "OPINION.—In the year 1907 the pursuers (Watson, Laidlaw, & Company, Limited) raised this action against the defenders (Pott, Cassels, & Williamson) for interdict against the infringement by the defenders of the pursuers' patent, No. 10,034 of 1903, for improvements in centrifugal machines, and for damages laid at £5000. At an early stage parties agreed by joint minute to reserve proof on the question of damages until a judgment on the question of infringement had been obtained. The pursuers obtained judgment, and thereafter the case was remitted to me to dispose of the question of the amount of damages due by the defenders to the pursuers in respect of the manufacture by them of the improvements on centrifugal machines in infringement of said letters-patent.

"I have now taken the proof and read the whole evidence and documents, and considered the authorities to which counsel referred me, and I am of opinion that the loss which the pursuers have sustained through the defenders' infringement of their patent may be fairly fixed at the sum of One thousand five hundred pounds (£1500). As the question is entirely a jury one, and as there did not appear to be any real dispute between parties regarding the elements to be taken into consideration in estimating the pursuers' loss, I do not think that it is either desirable or necessary to give reasons for fixing the amount of damages at the sum I have named. But as the case may, perhaps, go further, it is right that I should add that the witnesses on both sides gave their evidence frankly and fairly."

Mar. 14, 1913. United Horse Shoe and Nail Company, Limited, v. Stewart & Company,¹ and his Lordship's opinion was practically affirmed by the House of Lords on appeal.² The subsequent cases³ illustrated the application of the rule in various circumstances. The rule was that, as every sale of a patented article in infringement of the patent was an injury to the patentee, prima facie the measure of damage was the profit the patentee would have gained had he carried through the sales effected by the infringer. A certain deduction had to be made from the figure so arrived at, as it was not certain that the patentee would have secured all the sales which the infringers effected. This consideration, however, was not in the present case entitled to the same weight as was given to it in other cases, because here the market for the patented article was very limited, and the parties had practically a monopoly of it; and the difference which turned the scale in favour of one or other of them was the right to the patent. It was not incumbent on the pursuers in claiming damages to show that the volume of their business had diminished.⁴

Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited,
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.

Argued for the respondents;—The pursuers had elected to claim damages and not the profits made by the defenders. It was necessary, therefore, for the pursuers to show what their loss was; and the damages would be measured by the amount of their loss.⁵ There were only three ways in which their business could have suffered:—(1) they might have been compelled to reduce their prices—but any claim on this head was rejected as untenable by Lord Macnaghten in *United Horse Shoe and Nail Company, Limited, v. Stewart & Company*⁶; (2) the volume of their trade might have been reduced; or (3) the expansion of their business might have been checked. The figures proved that none of these consequences had ensued on the defenders' competition. The pursuers had entirely failed to show, therefore, that their business had suffered, and only nominal damages could be awarded. The assessment of the damages was a pure jury question,⁷ and there was no general rule or presumption to be followed. But, even assuming there was, as the pursuers contended, a presumption of loss of profit based on the sales made by the defenders, that presumption was displaced in the present case, because it was shown that both parties had always been competing in the market, that the defenders had the most efficient traveller, and that the purchasers of the machines were not aware of the virtues of the patent. Moreover the respondents had acted in bona fides in selling their machines.

¹ (1886) 14 R. 266.

² (1888) 15 R. (H. L.) 45, 13 App. Cas. 401.

³ Boyd v. The Tootal Broadhurst Lee Co., Limited, (1894) 11 R. P. C. 175; Meters, Limited, v. Metropolitan Gas Meters, Limited, (1911) 28 R. P. C. 157.

⁴ On the question of expenses Jack v. Black, 1911 S. C. 691, was referred to.

⁵ United Horse Shoe and Nail Co., Limited, v. Stewart & Co., 15 R. (H. L.) 45, per Halsbury, L.C., at p. 45, Lord Watson, at p. 48; Meters, Limited v. Metropolitan Gas Meters, Limited, 27 R. P. C. 721, per Eve, J., at p. 731, 28 R. P. C. 157, per Cozens-Hardy, M.R., at p. 161; Frost's Law of Patents, (4th ed.) vol. i. p. 520.

⁶ 15 R. (H. L.) 45, at p. 50.

⁷ Pneumatic Tyre Co., Limited, v. Puncture Proof Pneumatic Tyre Co., Limited, (1899) 16 R. P. C. 209, per Lord Russell, C.J., at p. 214; Meters, Limited, v. Metropolitan Gas Meters, Limited, 28 R. P. C. 157.

At advising on 14th March 1913,—

Mar. 14, 1913.

LORD DUNDAS.—On 7th June 1910 this Court decided the question of infringement in favour of the pursuers, and ordered inquiry as to damages. The defenders appealed to the House of Lords; and on 26th June 1911 the appeal was dismissed, the noble and learned Lords being equally divided in opinion. The case is reported in 27 R. P. C. 541 and 28 R. P. C. 565. Proof as to damages has now been led before the Lord Ordinary, who has assessed them at £1500, an amount which coincides with that of a tender by the defenders; the coincidence, I gather, was not accidental. His Lordship observes that “the question is entirely a jury one.” The case is certainly not one which according to our modern practice would be considered suitable for, or would be remitted to, trial by jury; but one can agree with his Lordship’s observation in the sense, which I suppose he meant, that the assessment of damages in a case of this sort can rarely, if ever, be arrived at by a process of exact arithmetical calculation. The Lord Ordinary, however, adds that “as there did not appear to be any real dispute between parties regarding the elements to be taken into consideration in estimating the pursuers’ loss, I do not think that it is either desirable or necessary to give reasons for fixing the amount of damages at the sum I have named.” The debate at our bar seemed to me to demonstrate that there was a large measure of dispute between the parties as to the principles on which damages ought to be assessed and the elements to be considered in doing so. The pursuers maintained that the figure of £5000 claimed in the summons was fairly supported by the evidence; the defenders, while not reclaiming against the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, argued that damages have not truly been established beyond a nominal amount. I am unable upon the proof to discover a basis for arriving at a sum in the region of £1500. I therefore greatly regret that the Lord Ordinary has given us no indication of his own views in regard to the rules upon which damages ought here to be assessed or the method by which he reached the figure of £1500. We are left to assess the damage de novo upon the evidence and the arguments before us. If upon these materials I could arrive at a figure not widely differing from £1500, I should consider it improper to disturb the Lord Ordinary’s award; but in the absence of any indication as to how that result was reached by his Lordship, or of any figures given in evidence which would, to my mind, justify it, I am bound to say that, for reasons to be stated, I think the pursuers are entitled to a much more substantial amount of damages than the Lord Ordinary has awarded.

We have to ascertain, it may be by rough and ready methods, the amount of loss the pursuers have sustained as the natural consequence in fact of the defenders’ sales of machines containing the pursuers’ patented invention, which the Court has decided to be a useful and meritorious one. The invention consisted of a conical elastic buffer or buffer-bearing for the spindles of centrifugal machines, combining both support and control. The defenders have admittedly sold a large number of machines containing this invention. Each such sale was a legal wrong, and prima facie a ground of damages; and the measure of damage is prima facie the amount of profit which the pursuers would have made if they had effected these

Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited.
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.

Mar. 14, 1913. sales themselves. This view is, I think, a sensible one, and supported by the authorities to which we were referred. But the prima facie aspect in any given case may be, more or less readily, and more or less materially, altered by other considerations arising on a purview of the whole circumstances. For example, the nature of the trade in question, the area of its exercise, and the volume of competition must be considered. If the area of trade competition is very wide and the number of rival competitors in the field very numerous, the less reason will there be for assuming that a pursuer would, if the defender had not sold a given number of his patented article, have himself been in a position to effect as large a number of sales and at his usual profit. Again, the prima facie presumption may be greatly weakened if it appears that the number of infringing sales was due largely to the superior business energy, skill, and activity of the defender in pushing trade upon the market. Whether or not a pursuer may fairly claim, as an item of damages, that he has been compelled, owing to the defender's illegal actings, to sell some of his machines at a lower price than usual, is, I think, a question to be decided on the circumstances of each case. In the *United Horse Shoe and Nail Company, Limited*¹—an instructive case upon the whole of this subject—Lord Macnaghten considered the claim inadmissible in the circumstances, as he thought the lowering of the price was not the natural or direct result of the infringement, but arose rather from a timorous and half-hearted policy on the pursuers' part; but the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), whose interlocutor was restored by the House of Lords, thought the reduction of price a relevant consideration; and in Meters, Limited,² a substantial sum of damages was allowed on that head. The Court must in each case consider the whole circumstances, and assess, as best it can, the damages which the pursuer has suffered as the fair and natural consequence of the defender's illegal conduct. I think it unnecessary to refer in detail to the cases cited to us; but I believe that what I have said is in harmony with the decisions.

The pursuers' case has been fully and carefully presented in evidence. We have definite figures proved which afford a basis, not, indeed, for exact calculation, but for reaching some figure which may represent a fair award, viewing the matter broadly, as I suppose a jury might do. The defenders do not present any counter array of figures. I think it is fairly established that the loss of profits which the pursuers might have realised if they had effected all the infringing sales of machines (252 in number), and of spare parts, amounted to very nearly £5000. One must consider what percentage or amount ought fairly to be deducted. A considerable deduction must, no doubt, be made. In the first place, I observe that the market for centrifugal machines of the description in question is a comparatively limited one—mainly the sugar trade, particularly in Java and Barbadoes; and that the active competitors in this market were the pursuers and defenders—other competing persons being few and practically negligible. These facts are important in the question of damages, and show a position stronger for the pursuers than was present, e.g., in the Horse Shoe and Nail case.¹ But the defenders argued strenuously that the peculiar feature of the pursuers' special Mar. 14, 1913.

¹ 14 R. 266, rev. 15 R. (H. L.) 45, 13 App. Cas. 401.

² 27 R. P. C. 721, affd. 28 R. P. C. 157.

buffer was of little or no moment in regard to the sales in question, and that centrifugal machines containing the defenders' buffer were equally saleable ^{Watson,} on the limited market; and further, that the large number of actual sales of ^{Laidlaw, &} the infringed article was due, entirely or mainly, to the superior energy, skill, ^{Co., Limited,} and activity of their selling agent, Mr Akkerman. It seems to me that the ^{v. Pott,} first of these arguments hardly lies in the defenders' mouths to state, look- ^{Cassels, &} ing to their own rather peculiar course of conduct. It is plain on the proof ^{Williamson.} that the defenders thought the pursuers' invention so far valuable that they altered their own machines so as to include it, and copied and circulated abroad the pursuers' circulars (with illustrations) of their invention; and even introduced a cable code word to express the pursuers' conical buffer.
The cross-examination of Mr Williamson on these points contains passages which strike me as scarcely candid evidence. As regards the excellent business qualities of Mr Akkerman there seems to be only one opinion.
He possesses a high certificate in the fact that he has been taken into the employment of the De Bromo Company, who purchase and re-sell the pursuers' machines in Java. It is not perhaps surprising that a gentlemen of such aptitude in business should take a somewhat sanguine view of his own ability to secure custom for any article he chose to put on the market for sale. I think we must make a substantial discount on Mr Akkerman's evidence in this respect, when we look at the real evidence contained in the correspondence produced. The correspondence discloses again and again that Mr Akkerman (then acting for Mr Hellendoorn, the selling agent in Java of the defenders' machines) attached peculiar importance in his orders to obtaining the pursuers' "new style." I do not think it much matters that their special buffer is not always or often specifically referred to; it is clear that Mr Akkerman found that machines containing that buffer were most desired, and ordered them accordingly. I think this goes to diminish very considerably what I may call the personal equation of Mr Akkerman; but that factor does remain a material element in the case, and ought to be so regarded in the assessment of damages.

The defenders made it a point that the volume of the pursuers' sales of their machines did not diminish during the years 1906 and 1907, when the infringing sales were made, but on the contrary increased, falling again in 1908 and rising in 1909; and they further pointed to the fact that the pursuers' sales during 1906 and 1907 showed a marked decrease in water-driven machines, in regard to which no infringement is said to have taken place. I am not much impressed by these arguments. It has never, I think, been held that a pursuer, in order to recover damages for infringement, must disclose his books to the adversary, the Court, and the public, with the view of proving that his business as a whole was depressed, and suffered during the period of infringement. Though the pursuers maintained or increased the number of their machines sold in 1906-7, it does not follow that the defenders have done them no business injury. The problem is complex, and the presumption is against the infringers. But for their illegal conduct the pursuers might—probably would—have sold more machines than they actually did.

It remains to consider some minor but not unimportant points of the

Mar. 14, 1913. argument. The defenders contended that from the figure to be arrived at as representing loss of profits which the pursuers would have realised if they had themselves effected the sales made by the infringers, a deduction must be made of £647, because twenty-seven of the machines specified in the list, No. 249 of process, appear to have been bought and sold without particular reference to the pursuers' special buffer. It is to be kept in view, however,

Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited,
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.

Lord Dundas. that these machines were in fact supplied by the defenders with that buffer. I do not think the whole sum should be deducted, though probably a material part of it should be. On the other hand, the pursuers claim to add a sum of £808, being loss of profit through reduction of prices in consequence of the defenders' illegal competition. The sum is vouched and spoken to by Mr William Murray. I am not sure that the claim is open to the criticism bestowed by Lord Macnaghten upon an analogous demand in the Horse Shoe and Nail case¹; and I consider that to some extent it may fairly be given effect to, though it would be unsafe to allow full weight to it. I have already pointed out that the matter seems, on the authorities, to be one for decision having regard to the circumstances of each case. Speaking in a rough and general sense, these two items of £647 and £808 may probably be set off against one another.

I have now indicated in a general way the elements which I consider ought to be taken into account in assessing damages in a case like this, and my views as to the particular circumstances here present. One must, in familiar parlance, use a broad axe. I am clearly of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to very substantial, and not to merely nominal, damages. I can find no basis in the evidence to support a figure in the region of the Lord Ordinary's award of £1500. The problem is no doubt difficult; but upon the best consideration I can give to the case I think that £1500 is a quite inadequate sum, and that we should not be treating the defenders with any severity, but it may be with some leniency, if we assess the damages payable to the pursuers (as I propose that we should do) at a sum of £3000.

LORD SALVESSEN.—The claim in this case is for damages in respect of the infringement of a patent for improvements in centrifugal machines. The patent has been held valid by a final judgment of the House of Lords, and although two of the noble and learned Lords were of opinion that it was not a valid patent, that circumstance can have no bearing on the assessment of damages, except in so far as it supports the view that the defenders in infringing the patent acted in good faith. The method of assessing damages in such cases has been fixed by a series of decisions. A patentee is entitled prima facie to recover from the infringer the profit which he would have made had the infringing machine been supplied by himself. In the present case this is not difficult of ascertainment. Parties are agreed that the defenders made and sold 252 machines which infringed the pursuers' patent, and the profits which the pursuers made upon similar machines have been accurately ascertained from their books. Taking the bare machines without the mixer and frame, which the defenders could have lawfully supplied, the profits on these machines amount to £4557, 9s.

¹ 14 R. 266, rev. 15 R. (H. L.) 45, 13 App. Cas. 401.

Besides the method just indicated, the pursuers have furnished us with two alternative methods of arriving at their loss. Their statement No. 593 of process discloses the loss of profit upon those parts of the machine which included or required to be adapted to the buffer bearings, to which alone the patented improvements applied. On the assumption that the defenders could have supplied their orders by buying these portions from the pursuers and otherwise completing the machines themselves, the loss of profit on the 252 machines would be reduced to £3339, 12s.; but as I read the decision in the case of Meters, Limited,¹ the defenders are not entitled to have the damages assessed on this moderate footing. The subject of the patent in that case was only a small part of the mechanism employed in a prepayment gas meter. It was nevertheless held that the profit on the whole meter was the proper factor to take in calculating the amount of the patentee's damages. The circumstances of the present case are such as to make this rule peculiarly applicable. The pursuers and the defenders were rival manufacturers, and between them enjoyed a practical monopoly of the supply of centrifugal machines for sugar factories in Java and the West Indies, which were their chief markets. Accordingly it is very unlikely that the pursuers would have supplied separately the portions of the machines which embraced the "buffer bearings," and as they granted no licences to manufacture their improvements they could practically make sure of getting an order for the whole machine from any customer who desired the patented improvements. Sufficient allowance has, I think, been made in the earlier statement (already referred to) by excluding the mixer and frame from the calculation. The parties here being in keen competition, it may be assumed that the pursuers would not have granted the defenders, if they had endeavoured to place their orders with them directly, the right to manufacture the patented improvements so as to oust them from the market which they hoped to capture by means of their invention.

The second of the two alternative methods of assessing damages is based on the opinion of Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in Meters, Limited.¹ After dealing with the method of assessing damages in cases where the patentee has granted licences, and stating that in such cases the measure of damages is the amount of royalty exacted, he says: "I am inclined to think that the Court might, in some cases where there did not exist a quoted figure for a licence, estimate the damages in a way closely analogous to this. . . . I am inclined to think that it would be right for the Court to consider what would have been the price which—although no price was actually quoted—could have been reasonably charged for that permission, and estimate the damage in that way. Indeed I think that in many cases that would be the safest and best way to arrive at a sound conclusion as to the proper figure." Now the pursuers here have given evidence as to what would have been a reasonable royalty to exact, and they say that 10s. per inch of the diameter of the basket was the sum which they might fairly have charged by way of royalty. Mr Laidlaw justifies this by mentioning that the defenders, in a somewhat similar case, made a claim of 20s. per inch of the diameter of the basket. There is no counter evidence, and taking this

Mar. 14, 1913.
Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited.
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.
Lord Salvesen.

¹ 28 R. P. C. 157, at 164.

Mar. 14, 1913. method of assessment, which has much to commend it, we were informed that their claim would work out at £4384, which is not far short of the figure arrived at by the first method. The pursuers further claim the profits on a number of parts supplied by the defenders to various people, as detailed in the supplementary list No. 249 of process. These items were incurred in connection with alterations and repairs of machinery. The profit which the pursuers lost by not supplying these spare parts, most of which were actually for the patented "buffer," and the rest for alterations necessary to receive it, amounts to £238, 17s. 4d., and is made up in the same way as the claim in respect of loss of profits on the sale of infringing machines. I think this amount falls to be added to the loss of profits on the sales of complete machines.

Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited,
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.

Lord Salvesen.

The pursuers' prima facie loss having thus been satisfactorily ascertained at a figure approaching to £5000, I confess that I have some difficulty in understanding why the Lord Ordinary should have reduced their claim to £1500. Where actual pecuniary loss is claimed, although it may be difficult of precise ascertainment, it is not a satisfactory method to assess the loss as a jury would when fixing compensation for injury to person or character. In such cases there is no principle by means of which the injury done can be transmuted into a money equivalent. It is otherwise where the Court have to deal with the invasion of a right of property, where, although the damages in many cases have to be estimated, the basis of estimation must be disclosed to judge of its fairness. I find that in all similar reported cases the Judges have given reasoned opinions justifying the results at which they arrived, and they have laid down certain broad principles on which the assessment ought to proceed. I distrust an estimate which is arrived at without indicating the mode by which it has been reached, all the more when as here it precisely corresponds with the amount of the defenders' tender. The Lord Ordinary says: "There did not appear to be any real dispute between parties regarding the elements to be taken into consideration in estimating the pursuers' loss." I do not appreciate that observation, seeing that the pursuers maintained their demand for £5000, and the defenders, although not reclaiming against the Lord Ordinary's award, strenuously maintained that only nominal damages were due. On these grounds I do not attach so much importance as I would otherwise have done to the award of the Judge of first instance, more especially as it has not been influenced by any view that one set of witnesses were more reliable than the other.

The number of infringing machines sold by the defenders being definitely ascertained, and the profits which the pursuers would have made had these machines been supplied by them being also sufficiently proved, the only matter that is left in uncertainty is whether, if the defenders had acted within their rights, the pursuers would in fact have sold this additional number of machines. On this point the presumption is in favour of the pursuers, although it is not so strong as if there had been no substitutes already in the market. Where the subject of the patent is an entirely new article—the "Thermos flask," if it had been the subject of a valid patent, occurs to me as an illustration—it could scarcely be denied that every sale of an infringing flask constituted a source of loss to the patentee. Even in such a case, however, allowance might have to be made by way of a commission to the infringer for pushing the sale and so saving expense to the patentee. The present case is not so strong, for the older type of centrifugal machine had worked reasonably well before the pursuers' improvements were patented. At the same time the defenders are scarcely in a position to deny that the improvements were such as to commend themselves to purchasers, for they took the trouble of copying the circulars which the pursuers issued to the trade. Not merely so, but their leading selling agent, Mr Akkermann, throughout the correspondence expressly ordered all the centrifugal machines he required with the pursuers' latest improvements; and during the period covered by the pursuers' claim not a single machine of the older type was supplied. The same remark applies to Mr Brocklehurst, who represented the defenders in Barbadoes, and who was very insistent that what he called the deeper buffer should be supplied. On the other hand, there is no doubt very strong evidence given by Mr Akkermann, whose credibility can scarcely be impeached, as he is now in the service of the pursuers' selling agent in Java, that his orders were secured largely by personal influence; and that he could have induced his personal friends and customers to take the defenders' machines even although not supplied with the latest improvements. There is also evidence from certain other customers, who seem to have been merely middlemen and had no technical knowledge of the different types of machines, that they were not aware when they were supplied by the defenders with machines to their order that they were fitted with "conical buffers." It was also strongly maintained by the defenders' counsel that the really attractive part of the new design consisted in the ball bearings, admittedly not patented, and not in the buffer bearing. Further, it was said that the pursuers could not have supplied so many additional orders though they had obtained them; and it was pointed out, as controverting their claim, that they supplied more centrifugal machines during the years 1906 and 1907, when the defenders were infringing the patent, than they did in 1908, when the defenders had ceased to infringe. This last argument does not appear to me to be of great weight, seeing that the total number of machines supplied in any given year necessarily depended on the state of the sugar trade and the number of extensions that were being made in sugar factories; and admittedly 1906 and 1907 were specially prosperous years. Any inference which might be drawn from the figures is also displaced by the circumstance that in 1909 the machines supplied by the pursuers rose to a much higher total than in any of the preceding years. Assuming that substantial allowance must be made on the various heads above referred to, I do not see that, taking them all together, it would be reasonable to reduce the pursuers' claim so as to bring it below a sum of £3000, or twice the sum which the Lord Ordinary has awarded.

The pursuers have a further claim of £808, 8s. 10d., which is based on loss of profit through their having to sell their machines at reduced prices in consequence of the unfair competition of the defenders. There is much to be said in support of this claim; but, on the other hand, it was (as I understood) admitted that £647 falls to be deducted in respect of twenty-seven orders in which the conical buffer played no part. These two items may

Mar. 14, 1913.
Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited,
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.

Lord Salvesen.

Mar. 14, 1913. perhaps be fairly set against each other. The result, therefore, in my opinion, is that the pursuers ought to be awarded damages to the extent of £3000; and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered accordingly.

Watson,
Laidlaw, &
Co., Limited,
v. Pott,
Cassels, &
Williamson.

LORD GUTHRIE.—The question in this case, namely, the assessment of damages for the loss sustained by the pursuers through the defenders' infringement of their patent of 1903 for improvements in centrifugal machines, is stated by the Lord Ordinary to be entirely a jury question, and he has assessed the damages on this footing at £1500. The Lord Ordinary's view that the question is entirely a jury one is in accordance with opinions delivered by many eminent Judges. For instance, in the United Horse Shoe and Nail Company, Limited, v. Stewart & Company,¹ the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury) said: "While I agree with the Lord Ordinary that they (the pursuers) can only recover compensation for the actual loss which they have sustained, the estimate of the particular sum which is to be arrived at when assessing compensation for the injury is purely a matter for a jury, and can rarely be made the subject of exact arithmetical calculation." But, although this is true, it does not follow that the Lord Ordinary should have left us without any means of judging whether the result arrived at by him was a reasonable one. It seems to me that, in this case, we were entitled to know from the Lord Ordinary, in the first place, on what basis his calculation was made—Has he taken, as his starting point, the total number of infringing machines made and sold by the defenders, or, if not, what smaller number? Next, whatever number of machines he may have taken as the basis of his calculation, has he reckoned the whole profit which the pursuers might have made, or, if not, what proportion? Then, on the other side of the account, we were entitled to know what elements of deduction, if any, the Lord Ordinary took into account in arriving at the figure of £1500 brought out by him, although it would not have been necessary for him to state what sums he reached under each head of deduction. Had the Lord Ordinary stated the basis on which he proceeded in arriving at his result I should have felt greater difficulty in interfering with his judgment. Or, again, had the result reached by him varied by a sum of say not more than £200 or £300 from that which seems to me just, I should not have felt warranted in altering the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. But, in the absence of any indication of how the Lord Ordinary reached his result, and being of opinion as I am that the proper verdict is at least double that found by the Lord Ordinary, I have no hesitation in concurring with your Lordships. I think it has been sufficiently proved that, of the profit of between £4000 and £5000 proved in the evidence, at least £3000 could and would have been earned by the pursuers.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur, but I may add that, if I had been disposing of this case myself, I do not think I would have held £3000 to be an adequate sum of damages.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and ordained the defenders to make payment of the sum of £3000.

WEBSTER, WILL, & CO., W.S.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—AGENTS.

¹ 15 R. (H. L.) 45.

GILBERT M'FEETRIDGE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Sandeman, K.C.— No. 107.
Macquisten.

STEWARTS & LLOYDS, LIMITED, Defendants (Reclaimers).— Mar. 14, 1913.
Constable, K.C.—J. R. Christie.

M'Feetridge
 v. Stewarts &
 Lloyds,
 Limited.

Minor—Capacity to contract—Foreign—Lex loci contractus—Minor with foreign domicile contracting in Scotland—Forisfamiliated minor—Termination of father's guardianship.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58)—Agreement by workman to take compensation—Reduction on ground of minority and lesion.

Process—Proof—Proof or jury trial—Action by workman for reduction of agreement to accept compensation, and for damages for injury.

A minor, whose domicile was Irish and whose father resided in Ireland, took service as a labourer with a firm in Scotland. He was injured by an accident in the course of his employment, for which he agreed, without consulting his father, to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. After compensation had been paid for some time he brought an action of damages for his injury at common law, in which he averred that he had accepted the statutory compensation in ignorance of his common law claim; and contended that, being a minor, he was not bound by the agreement, and that, in any event, it should be reduced on the ground of minority and lesion.

Held (1) that the pursuer's capacity as a minor to enter into the agreement fell to be determined not by the lex domicilii (Irish law) but by the lex loci contractus (Scots law); (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Ormisdale) that, as the pursuer was forisfamiliated and his father was in Ireland, the agreement was to be regarded as made by a minor who had no curator, and was, therefore, not null and void but reducible if enorm lesion resulted; and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to an inquiry into the facts, but that, the case being unsuitable for jury trial, the inquiry should be by a proof.

Res judicata—Finding in arbitration under Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58)—Finality—Bar to subsequent action of damages at common law.

In an application under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, to end or diminish compensation payable to a minor workman, the arbitrator found that the workman had agreed to accept compensation at a certain rate, and reduced the amount.

The workman having thereafter brought an action against his employers for damages for his injury at common law and for reduction, on the ground of minority and lesion, of the arbitrator's finding that he had agreed to accept compensation, the defenders, on the ground that the arbitrator was final on questions of fact, pleaded that the matter was res judicata in respect of his decision.

The Court repelled the plea.

ON 14th February 1912 Gilbert M'Feetridge, labourer, Whifflet, with 2^d DIVISION, the concurrence of his father, brought an action against Stewarts & Ld. Ormisdale. Lloyds, Limited, Glasgow. The conclusions of the summons were for payment of £500 as damages for personal injury, and, if necessary, in order that effect might be given to this conclusion, for reduction of a finding, dated 13th November 1911, by the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) at Airdrie in an application by the defenders under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in which he found that the pursuer had

Mar. 14, 1913. agreed to accept compensation under the Act at the rate of 10s. 3d. per week.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

The pursuer averred that he was sixteen years of age and was a domiciled Irishman; and that by the law of Ireland minors had not capacity to enter into binding contracts. He also averred that on 19th April 1911, while in the defenders' employment, he received an injury to his right hand. His further averments were as follows:— (Cond. 6) "On or about 8th May 1911 an agent, who represented the defenders, called upon the pursuer and informed him that he was entitled to compensation. The pursuer's wages at the time of the accident were £1, 0s. 6d. per week, and the said agent stated to him that he was entitled to receive 10s. 3d. per week from his employers while he was disabled, and discussed with the pursuer whether he would accept a lump sum in full of the said weekly payment. The said agent did not inform the pursuer, and the pursuer was entirely ignorant of the fact, that he had any rights at common law, or that he could possibly have any claim in respect of his injuries except what was offered by the said agent. The pursuer had no legal advice, and the said agent did not suggest to him that he should take any. At said interview the pursuer stated that he would consult with his brother who was coming from Ireland as to whether he should take a weekly payment or compound same for the lump sum. He accordingly consulted with his brother, a boy of about eighteen years of age, and thereafter he called at the defenders' works, on or about 12th May 1911, and stated that he would accept the said weekly payment. The pursuer received payment of the said weekly sum of 10s. 3d. for the period from 19th April to 30th June 1911, and on the occasion of each payment he signed a receipt therefor, in the terms presented to him."* (Cond. 7) "On or about 9th August 1911 the defenders presented an application to the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Airdrie, under section 16 of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in which they craved an order ending or diminishing the said weekly payment. On the said application being served on the pursuer he, for the first time, consulted a solicitor, and on inquiry being made into the facts he was informed that he had a claim for compensation at common law. The pursuer accordingly lodged a defence to the said application, in which he maintained, inter alia, that it was incompetent for the Sheriff to decide that he had agreed to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act; that he had never made any agreement to accept such compensation; and that in any event the alleged agreement was not binding on him in respect he was in minority, and his curator did not give his consent to the acceptance by the pursuer of the said weekly payment as a discharge of all claims competent to him.

* The following was one of the receipts signed by the pursuer, the others being in similar terms:—

"Received this Twelfth day of May 1911 from Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited, British Tube Works, Coatbridge, the sum of One pound fifteen shillings and elevenpence, being weekly Compensation to date under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, under which Act I elect to claim for Personal Injury by Accident sustained by me on or about the 19th day of April 1911.

Witness, Charles J. Smith.
Witness, George Kerr.

Signature, Gilbert M'Feetridge, Occupation, Labourer.
Address, 13 North Bute St."

After proof in the said application the Sheriff-substitute, on 13th November 1911, found that the defenders had agreed to pay, and the pursuer had agreed to accept, compensation at the said rate of 10s. 3d. per week, and in respect the appellant was no longer wholly incapacitated as the result of the said accident, reduced the compensation payable to him to 2s. per week. The pursuer presented an appeal by way of stated case to the Court of Session * against the said findings, and on 22nd December 1911 the Second Division of the said Court refused said appeal, without prejudice, however, to pursuer's rights to establish a claim at common law, if he should decide to do so." (Cond. 8) "As already mentioned the pursuer, when he agreed to accept the said weekly payment, was in total ignorance of his legal rights. In particular, he did not know, and was not informed, that he had any rights at common law, or that by accepting compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act he might be held to have waived his common law claim. In point of fact he never elected as between his rights under the Workmen's Compensation Act and his rights at common law, and was never in a state of knowledge which made it possible for him so to elect. He never agreed to accept compensation within the meaning of the said Workmen's Compensation Act. Further, the pursuer being in minority could not without the consent of his curator at law validly elect between his different rights, and he could not and did not elect to accept compensation under the said Act to the exclusion of his common law claim." (Cond. 9) "The pursuer maintains that the finding of the said Sheriff-substitute in the said application at the defenders' instance does not present any bar to the present action; but he submits that, if necessary, the said finding should in the circumstances above stated be reduced. The total of the said weekly sums received by the pursuer amounted to £5, 2s. 6d., and the pursuer is willing, and hereby offers, to repay the same to the defenders."

Mar. 14, 1913.
M. Teetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having been a minor and having become a party to the alleged contract referred to in condescence 6 without the consent of his curator is not bound by the said contract. (3) The pursuer is entitled to set aside the said alleged contract on the ground of minority and enorm lesion.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (2) The pursuer having accepted of compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of the injuries sustained by him, the present action is incompetent, and the defenders should be assoilized. (3) The agreement of the pursuer to accept compensation having been judicially affirmed by the said judgment of the Sheriff-substi-

* The questions of law in the case were:—“(1) Was it competent in respect that there was no memorandum of agreement recorded for me to decide that the appellant agreed to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act? (2) Was the agreement binding on the appellant without the consent of his curator? The third question was whether the arbitrator should have assessed the compensation at a different rate from that fixed by him. The Court, on 22nd December 1911, answered the first question in the affirmative, declined to answer the second question, and it being a matter in the discretion of the arbitrator to fix compensation in the circumstances disclosed to him, answered the third question in the negative, and affirmed the decision of the arbitrator.

Mar. 14, 1913.
M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

tute, and, in the consequent proceedings, no relevant grounds for reduction of said judgment being stated, the matter is res judicata, and the present action, so far as it concludes for damages, is incompetent. (4) Separatim, the petitory conclusions of the summons being incompetent while the agreement to accept compensation stands unreduced, the pursuer's averments in support of these conclusions should not meanwhile be remitted to probation pending the issue of any competent proceedings for reduction of the agreement. (5) The pursuer having, while employed as a labourer in Scotland, entered into a contract made and to be performed in Scotland which was incidental to and arising out of such employment, the validity and effect of said contract fall to be decided by the law of Scotland.

On 2nd January 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the second, third, and fourth pleas in law for the defenders, assigning a diet for the adjustment of issues, and granting leave to reclaim.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action raised by a minor with the consent of his curator concluding for a sum of damages in respect of injuries alleged to have been received by the pursuer through the fault of the defenders. The defenders plead—'2. The pursuer having accepted of compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of the injuries sustained by him, the present action is incompetent, and the defenders should be assoilzied.' In answer to this plea, the pursuer, inter alia, maintained that he exercised his option to claim compensation under the Act and not to take proceedings independently of the Act without the consent of his father, who is his curator, and that, accordingly, the agreement so to do is null and void, and therefore no bar to the present proceedings.

"The general rule is that deeds granted by a minor having a curator, without the curator's consent, are null. There is nothing in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which modifies the common law in regard to a minor's capacity to contract—Stephens, [1904] 2 K. B. 225. There are, however, certain exceptions to the general rule, and the exception on which the defenders rely is this: that a minor who is engaged in a business can enter into contracts in the line of that business. It is thus expressed by Erskine, Inst. i. 7, 38: 'A minor who betakes himself to any business or profession as trade, manufacture, law, &c., cannot be restored against deeds granted by him in relation to that employment.'—See also Galbraith, M. 9027; M'Donald, M. 9038; Heddel, 5th June 1810, F. C.; Campbell v. Baird, 5 S. 335; Argo v. Smarts, 1 Irvine, 250; Stevenson, 10 Macph. 919; Dennistoun v. Mudie, 12 D. 613.

"It was maintained that the agreement in question was, within the meaning of this exception, incidental to the business in which the pursuer was engaged, viz., that of a workman or labourer. I am unable to give effect to this contention. In the first place, I think it is extremely doubtful whether the occupation of a general labourer can be regarded as a business or profession to which a person can be said to have betaken himself in the sense of the passage I have quoted from Erskine, for, in the ordinary case, beyond the initial contract of service, no occasion arises in the relation of master and servant for the workman in the regular course of his work to enter into any further or other agreements either with his employer or anyone else. In the second place the agreement in question had, in my judgment, nothing whatever to do with the proper business of the pursuer which was simply to contribute certain labour in return for an agreed-on wage. It was quite foreign to the scheme or intention of the contract of service and was really independent of it, although the accident which gave rise to the necessity of a new contract or agreement being entered into occurred in the

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 28th, 29th, and 30th January 1913. Mar. 14, 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) Under the Workmen's Compensation Act an injured workman might either claim compensation or proceed under the common law. He had the choice of procedure; but if he chose one mode of procedure he could not afterwards resort to the other.¹ Further, the pursuer could not prosecute this action without first reducing the receipts he had granted; and as he did not propose to do so, the action could not proceed. (2) The plea of res judicata was well founded. In the application to vary the agreement as to compensation the question as to the validity of the agreement was necessarily involved, and the arbitrator was bound to determine that question.² If he did so, his decision was final under the Workmen's Compensation Act.³ If he did not, then the respondent was met by the plea of competent and omitted.⁴ The question whether a

M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

course of the pursuer's employment. But the new contract was not like an order given for goods by a trader, an act performed in the natural and ordinary course of his business and with a view to promote that business. It was concerned with a totally different subject-matter, viz., the ascertainment of compensation. The situation which gave rise to the agreement was unexpected and novel, and it necessitated the exercise of a very different kind of judgment to that which the pursuer had to bring to bear on his day-to-day occupation. Looking to the different results, when measured in money, which might follow according to the way in which the option was exercised and the many considerations which required to be taken into account when weighing the possible advantages of the alternative courses, it was pre-eminently a position in which a minor was entitled, if he had a curator, to get his assistance. Here the pursuer had a curator but did not get his assent to the course he elected to follow. It appears to me a typical case for the application of the rule of Scots law, and that the defenders cannot hold the pursuer to the bargain or agreement entered into by him in the exercise of his own unaided judgment. The averment of the defenders that the pursuer's father had written through solicitors in Ireland does not, as I read the averment, infer the father's consent to or homologation of the option exercised by the pursuer, and, accordingly, I am prepared to hold, without further inquiry, that the pursuer is not barred by his election to take compensation under the Act from insisting in the present action.

"Apart from his incapacity as a minor to enter into the agreement, I should have been prepared to hold that, in the admitted circumstances, the acceptance of the weekly payments for ten weeks does not bar the pursuer from proceeding to recover damages at common law. I come to this conclusion on the ground that, because of his extreme youth and inexperience and the ignorance of his rights thence resulting, the meaning and effect of his accepting the weekly payments made to him was not understood by the lad, and that he was quite unaware that he was exercising an option under the Workmen's Compensation Act. What he was asked by the defenders' clerk or agent to do was to make up his mind between taking compensation in a lump sum or by weekly payments, and that was what he desired to consult and did consult his brother about. It is quite true that, so far as I can see, there was no attempt to rush him into any decision on the matter discussed. It is also true that the receipts signed by him described the

¹ Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 1 (2) (b).

² Johnstone v. Spencer & Co., 1908 S. C. 1015.

³ Second Schedule (4) and (17).

⁴ Southhook Fireclay Co., Limited, v. Laughland, 1908 S. C. 831; Nelson v. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, 1910 S. C. 360.

Mar. 14, 1913.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts
& Lloyds,
Limited.

Sheriff Court decree could ever support a plea of res judicata did not arise here, because the procedure was that laid down in the statute for the determination of questions of this kind. (3) The validity or invalidity of the agreement on the head of incapacity fell to be determined by the lex loci contractus, i.e., the law of Scotland. In Dicey's Conflict of Laws¹ the law was correctly stated in these terms:—"A person's capacity to bind himself by an ordinary mercantile contract is (probably) governed by the law of the country where the contract is made." The law of Scotland as to the effect of minority on the power to contract was succinctly stated in Mackay's Manual of Practice, p. 395.² Whether the pursuer had or had not a curator, the contract was saved as falling within the recognised exception in favour of agreements connected with a trade exercised by the minor. Such payments made to him as weekly compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, 'under which Act I elect to claim for personal injury by accident sustained by me.' But the meaning of this statutory election was not brought home to the pursuer. Indeed, the possibility of his having any right to compensation independently of the Act was not brought before him at all. What was discussed with him was 'lump sum or weekly payments.' All that the defenders say is, that their clerk had a long talk with the pursuer as to the compensation payable to him, and, again, that it was made quite clear to the pursuer that it was compensation under the Act that was being discussed, and that it was explained to him that, if he accepted a lump sum, it would terminate his right to receive any further payments, whereas, if he took weekly payments, he could arrange for having them redeemed afterwards for a single payment. The defenders do not suggest, far less distinctly aver, that they explained to the pursuer that he had any option between accepting compensation under the Act and taking proceedings independently of the Act, or that they satisfied themselves otherwise that he was aware of it. I read their statements as in no way contradicting the pursuer's averments to the effect that what was exclusively the topic of conversation between their clerk and the pursuer was, as I have said, 'lump sum or weekly payments.' Now, it may be that an employer owes no duty towards an employee of full age and ordinary experience to see that he fully comprehends what he is contracting about, but it seems to me to be otherwise in the case of a boy of sixteen, and that a bargain, the effects of which he could not be expected to appreciate without the aid of someone, be it his employer or some third party, ought not to be held to bar him from seeking redress at common law. The result of the decisions in this branch of the law appears to me to be that, if the Court is satisfied that the transaction was not a fair one, it may be ignored, and that the transaction cannot be held to be a fair one when one of the parties to it, through no fault of his own, was honestly in ignorance of his full legal rights. That, in my judgment, giving effect to all that the defenders say on record, was the position of the pursuer in the present action. He was in a position very similar to that of the foreign workman in the case of Valenti, 1907 S. C. 695. The pursuer in that case, it was held, being a foreigner, was not, in the ascertained circumstances, in a position validly to exercise the option which he had. Here I think that the pursuer owing to his youth and inexperience was not, in the circumstances disclosed and admitted by the defenders on record, in a position to exercise the option intelligently. Had he been a workman of full age and ordinary experience, the receipts would have brought home to him the nature and effect of agreements were not null or reducible.¹ That this contract was connected with the respondent's trade was obvious. It was an agreement that the respondent should take the compensation to which he was, as one employed in that trade, entitled; there was no agreement that he should renounce his common law rights. That result was not agreed on by the parties, but was an incident attached by statute to their agreement. The respondent could not therefore maintain that the contract was null or reducible. Again if the contract was not connected with the pursuer's business, it might be null or reducible according to the circumstances. If a minor who had a curator entered into a contract without that curator's consent, the contract was null. But here the respondent had not a curator; if a parent were either insane or inaccessible his child was held to be without a curator, and on this principle the respondent here must be held to be without a

¹ (2nd ed.) 538 (reference was also made to pp. 473 and 534); Fraser on Parent and Child, (3rd ed.) 711, 720, 723, 725.

² Fraser on Parent and Child, (3rd ed.) 452, was also cited.

Mar. 14, 1913.
M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

what he was doing, but the pursuer, being only a lad of sixteen, and the discussion had by him with the defenders' clerk antecedent to his granting the receipts having been concerned only with the matter of lump sum or weekly payments, the receipts themselves cannot, in my opinion, be taken as conclusive evidence of a deliberate and intelligent resolution to forego any right the pursuer had to take proceedings under the Act.

"It is said, however, that the matter is res judicata in respect of the decree or order of the Sheriff dated 13th November 1911. The curator was not a party to the arbitration, and I do not read the order as dealing with the question of the pursuer's capacity to contract at all. It is true that the second question of law stated by the Sheriff for the opinion of the Court is,—'Was the agreement binding on the appellant without the consent of his curator.' That question, however, is not specifically determined by the findings which he pronounced, and the Court, by their interlocutor of 22d December 1911, while dealing with the first and third questions stated for their opinion, expressly declined to answer the second question. In these circumstances I hold that the matter is not res judicata. If I am right in so holding, then it appears to me to be unnecessary to pronounce a decree in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons.

"As I hold that the pursuer being a minor had not, under Scots law, capacity to enter into the agreement without his curator's consent, it is not necessary for me to decide the question which was raised as to Irish law, but I may say that in my judgment, (first) the law is not sufficiently ascertained by the decision in Cooper v. Cooper, (15 R. (H. L.) 21), to warrant me in holding that under that law the contract in question was void on the ground of incapacity, and (second) that, assuming that the law is as stated by the pursuer when the contract is executed in Ireland, the application of the law of a foreign domicile is not recognised in our practice as universal in all circumstances, and does not fall to be given effect to in a case like the present, where the contract is executed and falls to be performed in Scotland and does not in any way affect the personal or domestic relations of the minor. I think that to hold otherwise would be against the interests of minors themselves seeking work in this country, and would be unjust to Scotsmen contracting with them, when in bona fide ignorance of the foreign law, and when the circumstances were not such as to lay on them any duty to inquire into the matter.

"I shall repel the second, third, and fourth pleas in law for the defenders, and order issues. I shall find the pursuer entitled to the expenses of the discussion in the Procedure Roll and grant leave to reclaim."

¹ Ersk. i. 7, 38; Galbraith v. Lesly, (1676) M. 9027; M'Donald, (1789) M. 9038; Heddel v. Duncan, June 5, 1810, F. C.; Argo v. Smarts, (1853) 1 Irv. 250; Wilkie v. Dunlop & Co., (1834) 12 S. 506; Stevenson v. Adair, (1872) 10 Macph. 919.

Mar. 14, 1913.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

curator. Further, the respondent was forisfamiliarized and was therefore freed from his father's curatory. If, on the other hand, the respondent had a curator, the facts showed that the latter had consented to the contract. It was true that if the pursuer had no curator or had the consent of his curator to the contract, the contract was nevertheless open to reduction; but this was so only if there was enorm lesion, and here there was no averment of enorm lesion, and the Court could see that there was none. In England the test by which the validity of agreements of this nature by minors was determined was whether the contract was for the minor's benefit.¹ Clearly here the agreement was for the respondent's benefit. Again it was suggested on record that this was a seductive bargain, such as was set aside in Valenti v. William Dixon, Limited.² But to maintain this point, it was not enough to allege that the respondent was ignorant of his rights. Fraud must be averred, and there was no such averment on record.³ In any event the case was not suitable for jury trial.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The respondent had not elected as between his statutory and his common law claims. He was ignorant that he had any claim at common law and all that he had been called on to consider was in what form he would take his statutory compensation.⁴ There was nothing that it was necessary to reduce. The receipts were merely prima facie evidence of payment and were not probative.⁵ All that could be urged against the respondent was an implied discharge. (2) There was no ground for the plea of res iudicata. The respondent did not quarrel the Sheriff-substitute's decision. It was admitted that there was an agreement, but the agreement could be set aside.⁶ (3) The respondent's capacity to contract fell to be determined by the law of his domicile, viz., Ireland,⁷ and by Irish law the contract was null. But supposing Scots law applied, this was a contract by a minor, who had a curator, without the curator's consent, and was therefore null.⁸ The fact that the father was outwith Scotland,⁹ or that the respondent was forisfamili-

¹ Stephens v. Dudbridge Ironworks Co., Limited, [1904] 2 K. B. 225; Cribb v. Kynoch, Limited, (No. 2), [1908] 2 K. B. 551; Mulholland v. Whitehaven Colliery Co., [1910] 2 K. B. 278; Gadd v. Thompson, [1911] 1 K. B. 304.

² 1907 S. C. 695.

³ Mackay v. Rosie, 1908 S. C. 174.

⁴ Dawson's Trustees v. Dawson, (1896) 23 R. 1006, per Lord Kinnear; Stewart v. Bruce's Trustees, (1898) 25 R. 965; Fowler v. Hughes, (1903) 5 F. 394; Little v. P. & W. MacLellan, Limited, (1900) 2 F. 387.

⁵ Commercial Bank of Scotland v. Rhind, (1860) 3 Macq. 643; Crawford v. Bennet, (1827) 2 W. & S. 608; The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 38, was also referred to.

⁶ Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited, (1904) 6 F. 770.

⁷ Cooper v. Cooper, (1888) 15 R. (H. L.) 21, per Lord Watson, at p. 29, Halsbury, L.C., at p. 25, Lord Macnaghten, at p. 30, 13 App. Cas. 88; Sottomayor v. De Barros, (1877) 3 P. D. 1, 5 P. D. 94; De Virte v. Macleod, (1869) 7 Macph. 347.

⁸ Stair, i. 6, 33; Bell's Com. (7th ed.) vol. i. pp. 129-31; Bell's Prin. (10th ed.) sec. 2088; Kincaid, (1561) M. 8979; Robertson v. Oswald, (1584) M. 8980; Bell v. Sutherland, (1728) M. 8985; Thomson v. Pagan, (1781) M. 8985; Hay v. Grant, (1749) M. 8973; Kirkman v. Pym, (1782) M. 8977; M'Gibbon v. M'Gibbon, (1852) 14 D. 605.

⁹ Scoffier v. Read, (1783) M. 8936; Morison v. Stewarts, (1747) M. 8972; More's Stair, vol i. note D. p. xlii.

ated,¹ would not save the contract; it could only be saved by showing that it was incidental to the pursuit of his trade. This could not be alleged of the agreement in question. It was outside the respondent's contract of employment.² The valuing of his injuries was not a task incidental to his service; nor was the discharging of his common law claim for these injuries. In any case, if the contract was not null it was voidable on the ground of enorm lesion. The facts here clearly showed that there was such lesion. The averments on record set forth in every respect a relevant case. The case should be sent to a jury³; but at this stage the respondent was entitled to a finding that the contract was null and void.⁴

Mar. 14, 1913.
M. Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

At advising on 14th March 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The circumstances which have led to the present summons are peculiar in several aspects, and the way in which the case was originally, and in which it is now, presented, after amendment, is also most peculiar. The pursuer is said to have been a lad of sixteen at the time of his alleged injury. He is Irish, and his father lives in Ireland. The circumstances out of which the injury to him arose were simple enough. He was working as a labourer in the defenders' premises beside a mechanically driven turning-lathe. His account of what happened is, that below the pinions of the machine, which were about 3 feet from the ground, there was a place hollowed out, which was 8 inches deep and measured 3 feet long by 18 inches broad; that he did not know of this hole, accidentally put his foot into it and stumbled, and, on his throwing out his right hand to save himself, it was caught by the pinions, and he lost the little finger and part of the thumb, which were so crushed that they had to be amputated. His averment is that in breach of the Factory Act, 1901, the defenders had failed to fence the pinions, and that it was by the fault of the defenders that he was thus injured.

After he received his injury he was visited by an agent for the defenders, and he avers that the agent informed him that he was entitled to compensation, and that the sum he could claim was 10s. 3d. a week—being half of the wages he was earning—as long as he was disabled from work. He states that he was not informed that he had any right to make a claim at common law; that he had no legal advice; and that the alternatives put to him were to accept the sum offered or to agree with the agent for a lump sum. After consulting his brother, who is a lad of eighteen, he intimated that he would accept the weekly payments. Accordingly he received weekly payments of 10s. 3d. for more than two months, and signed the receipts presented to him by the agent. He does not state what the terms of the receipts were, but there is no doubt as to their terms, and unless the receipts can be set aside on some legal ground relating to the circumstances in which they were obtained from him, or unless they are not binding on him because of his

¹ Dundas v. Allan, (1711) M. 9034; Anderson v. Anderson, (1832) 11 S. 10; Fraser on Parent and Child, (3rd ed.) 499.

² Dennistoun v. Mudie, (1850) 12 D. 613.

³ Campbell v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1899) 1 F. 887.

⁴ Valenti v. William Dixon, Limited, 1907 S. C. 695.

Mar. 14, 1913. minority, they could only be set aside on proof that they were to his enorm lesion, if the case falls to be dealt with under the law of Scotland.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

In August 1911 the defenders applied to the Sheriff-substitute of the jurisdiction for an order under the Workmen's Compensation Act ending or diminishing the weekly payment, and to this the pursuer lodged a defence, in which he maintained that it was incompetent for the Sheriff to decide that he had agreed to accept compensation under the Act; that he had never done so; and that being in minority, and there being no consent by his curator to the compensation paid being in discharge of all claims competent, the Sheriff could not act upon the footing of an agreement. The Sheriff-substitute, after proof, found that there was an agreement, and that as the pursuer was no longer totally incapacitated the compensation must be reduced, and fixed 2s. a week as the sum to be paid. Against this the pursuer appealed to this Court. The Court dismissed the appeal.

This case is now brought to enforce a claim at common law as for fault, and the pursuer maintains that he is entitled to reduction of the judgment pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute or to have it set aside by exception. When the summons was served only two pleas in law were stated by the pursuer, one to the effect that the sum claimed being reasonable decree should be given, the other that "if necessary to give effect to the petitory conclusion, the pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction." These pleas, it was evident, were not such as could raise more than one of the questions which were vital to the case, and amendment was made by adding a plea of incapacity of the minor to contract without consent of his curator, and a second plea based on the ground of enorm lesion.

The Lord Ordinary by his interlocutor has repelled three of the defenders' pleas—the second plea, which attacks the competency of the action on the ground that the pursuer had accepted compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act; the third plea, which proceeds on the contention of res judicata; and the fourth plea, which is directed to exclude proof under the petitory conclusions of the summons pending reduction of the agreement. He has ordered issues.

These being the circumstances under which the case comes up upon a reclaiming note, the Court has had from the bar a very learned and elaborate argument upon several questions, and very numerous authorities have been quoted. Many of these might have an important bearing upon the case at a later stage, if it is to be allowed to go to inquiry upon the facts. And that is really the question for present consideration.

I think it is impossible to doubt that at the time of the accident there was a contract of service between the pursuer and the defenders. He came to them for employment as a labourer, and received employment and accepted wages for his work. He had left his father's house and come to Scotland to take employment upon his own footing, if he could get it, (just as any lad may do), without there being any question whether he might go out as a worker without his father's consent. He left the position of a dependant, and left his home to come to Scotland, and to make his own way in the world, just as lads of his age are doing every day. He obtained employment, he drew the earnings of the employment, and those who employed him paid him the price of his service. As regards that matter, no question of difficulty arises. Any claim the pursuer can possibly have is and must be based upon the fact that the relation of employer and employed existed between the pursuer and the defenders. The questions which arise do so when the abnormal thing has happened—something which, to use the words of the Workmen's Compensation Act, arises out of and in the course of the employment—a thing which is not within the work of the employment, but, as Lord Macnaghten called it, something “untoward,” raising a claim not for work done, but for injury suffered when engaged at the work of the employment. It is as being a servant at the time of the accident that any claim, whether at common law or under the Employers Liability Act or the Workmen's Compensation Act, is open to the pursuer. If he was not employed, he had no business to be where he was doing work in the defenders' premises.

Mar. 14, 1913.
M^r Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

But there are several questions raised which are outside the mere question of employment and of accident occurring in the employment. There is the question whether the pursuer, being a minor, could contract to accept compensation on a particular footing as under the rules of Scots law. Then there is the question whether, if he could contract under the law of Scotland, he, being of Irish parentage, is entitled to found upon the law of Ireland, which, it is said, makes a person under twenty-one years of age incapable of contracting. There is the question whether, if the law of Scotland applies, the pursuer is entitled to set aside a contract made by him on the ground that it is to his enorm lesion. Lastly, there is the question whether the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, an appeal against which was rejected by this Court, must be held to be res judicata against the pursuer.

As regards this last, my opinion is clear that there is no ground on which the plea of res judicata can be maintained, and that the Lord Ordinary was right in refusing to give effect to it. The pursuer impugns the initial procedure out of which the petition of the defenders to the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator took its origin. The arbitration proceeded on an agreement which undoubtedly was entered into by the pursuer, but the pursuer is quite entitled to have that agreement and the consequent deliverance of the Sheriff set aside and the whole question of his right to damages at common law opened up, if he can establish grounds for setting aside the agreement by reduction. What has been done in the proceedings before the Sheriff can form no bar to the present summons on the plea of res judicata.

Upon the question whether the pursuer could contract without consent of his curator to take employment, it does not appear to me that there can be any doubt. Such a contract is not void. It has not only been held good, but there are cases in which it has been enforced at law against the minor at the instance of the employer. I shall refer to two such cases. One is the case of Heddel.¹ In that case a minor, who had engaged himself as a Sheriff-clerk-depute and into whose hands some money had come, applied the money, on the direction of the Sheriff-substitute, as he had no right to do, with the result that it was lost by the bankruptcy of a party to whom it was handed over. The minor was sued for the amount by the

¹ June 5, 1810, F. C.

Mar. 14, 1913. Sheriff-clerk, and the plea was set up for him that the pursuer could not succeed as against a minor. The Court, however, held that it was an established rule of law "that a minor, whenever he undertakes an employment by which he gains a part of his livelihood, becomes responsible . . . for all his acts done in that situation. If the rule were otherwise it would be most hurtful to minors, because if they were free from responsibility nobody would employ them, and they would be shut out from many situations and offices the duties of which they now discharge." Thus in that case the contract was upheld against the minor as fixing responsibility upon him, notwithstanding that there was no consent of curators. The contract was enforced against him. The other case is that of Argo v. Smarts,¹ where the Lord Justice-Clerk laid it down that "where a contract is entered into by a young man seventeen years of age, and withal so skilful a workman that he earns 20s. a week in Glasgow, it cannot be said that such protection"—viz, of curators—is necessary. That was a case in which the Court held him so sufficiently bound by his contract that he could not escape from imprisonment for desertion of service, the law at that time allowing such imprisonment. Thus in these cases the contract—a contract of service—was held binding on the minor. But if such a contract is binding on the minor to the effects disclosed in these cases, it plainly cannot be maintained that in a case like this the pursuer shall not be dealt with as capable of contracting.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewart &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

Next comes the question whether the pursuer, being an Irishman, the questions between him and the defenders fall to be dealt with according to the law of Scotland or according to the law of Ireland, upon the footing that his domicile is Irish. In other words, is the law of the place of the contract to prevail or the law of the domicile? Upon this question we had a learned and able argument. The opinion at which I have arrived is that the law of the place of the contract must rule. To me it appears that to apply the law of a foreign country in a case of contract for hire of labour would be to relegate such cases to the most inconvenient forum. An employer of labour is not called on to investigate where those who ask him to engage them have their domicile. He engages them because they desire to work in his country, and he is certainly not called on to ascertain what their domicile is and to inform himself as to the law of that domicile. If it were otherwise it would hamper persons coming from other parts of the kingdom in their efforts to obtain employment, for employers would be slow to engage a worker who if an accident happened to him could compel his master to accept an alien law which might be detrimental to his interest. But there is good authority for holding that if such a labourer desires to assert a claim against his employer he must assert it in the Courts of his employer's country and maintain it under the rules of law of that country. Nothing more contrary to reason can be imagined than that he should be entitled to insist that the law of the country he comes from should be applied against the employer who has no relation to him as regards nationality, the relation being only one of employment to do work for the master who is willing to pay him workmen's wages. It would require very clear legal dicta, laid down by high legal authority, to induce one to hold that a foreign law was to bind the employer because his servant—who came to this country in order to do business here by taking employment—happened not to have lost his domicile. This is not like a case of a son living with his father, or the case of a father being a party to the contract entered into, as where a father enters into a contract of apprenticeship for a son. In the first case the place of the domicile and the place of employment would be the same, and in the second there is much to be said for the law of domicile being applied to any legal questions arising out of or following on the contract. In the case of his living at home with his father, there can be no question. In the case of apprenticeship by the father it is known to the employer that the apprentice's position is that of one still under the protection and supervision of his parent—his natural guardian. The employer accepts the father—as an Englishman or an Irishman as the case may be—as making or being a party to the making of a contract for his unfors-familiated son. In such a case it may fairly be said to be reasonable that the father should be held entitled to found upon the law applicable to him as a contracting party. He presumably is an actor in the transaction. The contract is not one made by the lad himself for his own ends and apart from his father.

Mar. 14, 1913.
M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

The circumstances of this case are entirely different. The pursuer left his father's house and his own country and came to Scotland, and proffered his services as a labourer to a Scottish employer. He accepted for himself a stipulated sum of wages, by which he supported himself, freeing his father from any burden for his living. Can it be doubted that by so acting he became forisfamiliated, and if forisfamiliated that the lex loci must apply to his contractual relation with his master? Were there no authority to be quoted in favour of this view, I should hold it without hesitation, unless some clear authority could be brought forward in support of the opposite view. But in my opinion there is authority in favour of the view I take. Lord Fraser in his work on Parent and Child¹ states the law thus:—"A foreign minor in Scotland can receive here no further or other protection than is accorded by our laws to native minors." And he says that while the importance or character of a proposed contract may reasonably put a party on his inquiry in the case of one appearing to be a minor, yet that any deference which may be paid to the lex domicilii "does not necessarily exclude the lex loci contractus as to legal capacity from some of the most ordinary contracts of every-day life,"² an expression plainly applicable to a contract for ordinary manual labour. Perhaps as strong a case as can be brought forward in support of this view is one which was not quoted in the debate, but has been brought before us by Lord Salvesen—the case of Male v. Roberts.³ In that case the question arose very sharply, as the circumstances were that a young Englishman, being in Edinburgh, induced a friend to supply money to pay a debt for which he was being arrested as in meditatione fugæ. The lender sued him for repayment, and he pleaded that, being an Englishman and not major, he was in law an infant, and could not

¹ (3rd ed.) p. 720.

² Ibid, at p. 723.

³ (1799) 3 Esp. 163, 6 Rev. Rep. 823.

Mar. 14, 1913. contract. This contention was rejected by Lord Chancellor Eldon, who held that as the contract took its rise in Scotland the law of that country must govern the contract. The case is the more striking because the infant debtor was not in the position of having taken up his residence in Scotland. He was a circus performer, and therefore one who moved about with the circus company. It may be that there are certain classes of contracts, such as contracts affecting status, e.g., the contract of marriage, or cases of importance relating to heritable estate, or other important contracts such as Lord Fraser refers to, where the rule above expressed may not apply. But in a simple ordinary contract to serve a master in his business the circumstances present no difficulty in applying the law as it has been laid down.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewart &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

If the case is to be dealt with according to Scots law, the next question is whether the contract is to be held null and void on the bare ground that the pursuer was a minor. The Lord Ordinary has so held, in respect that there was no concurrence of the pursuer's curator. This might be sound if it could be maintained that he had a curator, whose consent should have been obtained, namely, his father. But his father was resident in a different country; he was not in a position to exercise, and was not exercising, any protective control over him. Persons entitled to the office of curator who are in other lands cannot give their aid to the minor, and there may be no knowledge of their existence on the part of the contracting party. There seems to be no authority for holding that in such circumstances an agreement between employer and employed can be held to be null and void because entered into without a curator's consent. Apart from this there is the fact that the pursuer is, as I hold, forisfamiliatus, and that this implies the practical extinction of the curatorial position of his parent. I differ, therefore, from the Lord Ordinary when he holds de plano that the pursuer is entitled to decree.

The last question is whether it is open to the pursuer, when an agreement has been made by him as a minor, to impugn that agreement on the ground that it is to his enorm lesion. It is difficult to see any ground on which he can be held to be excluded from taking up such a position. If he is held bound to submit himself to the law of Scotland, as regards the contract of service into which he entered, can he not take advantage of the law of Scotland in so far as it protects minors from being held bound by agreements which can be impugned on the ground of lesion? Here the pursuer's contention is that he has a claim at common law against his employer for fault causing him injury, and that an agreement by which he accepted compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, was to his enorm lesion. His right to have that allegation inquired into seems to admit of no doubt.

There must therefore be an inquiry. The pursuer desires to have that inquiry by a jury trial, which, in the ordinary case of a trial for injury by fault, would be the appropriate mode. But in the present case, I am of opinion that the Court should exercise the power it possesses to send cases to proof instead of to jury trial. The fact that it is not merely a case of damages, but that it involves inquiry into a question relating to the setting aside of an agreement as preliminary to the consideration of the question of fault and damages, appears to me to make it a case not appropriate for being tried upon issues before a jury. And although it is a case which may in the end involve a question of quantum of damages, that is a very simple matter. There has been complete restoration to health, and the only question could be, what is the diminution of capacity for labourer's work caused by the loss of a part of one hand. This is a very simple matter, dealt with every day by Judges in the Sheriff Court, and by this Court in review of Sheriff Court cases.

Mar. 14, 1913.
M'Fetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

My opinion, therefore, is that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, that the second and third pleas of the defenders should be repelled, and that a proof before answer should be allowed.

LORD DUNDAS.—Various questions were argued to us at the discussion. I shall content myself with stating briefly the conclusion I have reached in regard to each of them.

1. The defenders plead res judicata in respect that, on 13th November 1911, the arbitrator in an application at their instance under the Workmen's Compensation Act found, inter alia, that they agreed to pay, and the pursuer agreed to accept, compensation at the rate of 10s. 3d. per week. In a case stated to this Division a question was (among others) put to us: "Was the agreement binding on the appellant" (pursuer) "without the consent of his curator?" We declined to answer that question. We considered that the arbitrator had not decided that the agreement was valid; that it was not for us, in disposing of the stated case, to determine whether it was valid or invalid; and that that question would be open for decision in the action which we were then informed the pursuer was in course of raising against his employers for damages at common law. In these circumstances it seems to me plain that the defenders' plea of res judicata must be repelled.

2. The pursuer, a minor, avers that he is a domiciled Irishman, and that by the law of Ireland minors have not capacity to enter into binding contracts. The defenders say that, assuming the law of Ireland to be as stated, it is not applicable to the circumstances of this case. I think the defenders are right. The pursuer's domicile was in Ireland, but the contract was entered into and performed in Scotland. In these circumstances I think Scots and not Irish law must rule the case. Good sense and expediency point strongly to that conclusion; and cases to which Lord Salvesen has referred me—they were not cited at the bar—satisfy me that it is correct and sound in law.

3. The pursuer argued that, assuming Scots law to be applicable, the contract was null as being entered into by a minor without consent of his curator. The general rule of law to that effect was not disputed, but there are exceptions to it upon which the defenders founded. They relied (1) on the statement of Erskine,¹ supported by many decisions, that "a minor who betakes himself to any business or profession, as trade, manufacture, law, &c., cannot be restored against deeds granted by him in relation to that employment"; and (2) on the fact that the pursuer, at and prior to the date of this contract or agreement, was forisfamiliar, residing in a different part of the United Kingdom from his father, and earning his own livelihood. I am not satisfied that the receipts produced might not reasonably be regarded as

¹ Inst. i. 7, 38.

Mar. 14, 1913. deeds granted by the pursuer in relation to his employment ; but I find it unnecessary to decide that question, because I consider that the defenders' second point, based on forisfamiliaration, is well founded, and ought to be given effect to.

M'Festridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Dundas.

4. The defenders argued that the summons is radically defective and incompetent, because the pursuer does not ask for reduction of the receipts, but only of the decree or finding by the arbitrator. I do not think this objection can be sustained. It is, or was, certainly quite common for careful pleaders to crave reduction (if and in so far as necessary) of such documents as these receipts ; but I do not think it is strictly obligatory to do so.

5. The next question is whether or not the pursuer is entitled to prove enorm lesion. It is said with considerable force that though he has a plea in law based on lesion, he has no averments to support it. The pursuer should have made his condescendence specific on that head. But I am not prepared to throw the case out on this ground : there are, I think sufficient (barely sufficient) indications on the record of the pursuer's case of lesion, though it may be a very difficult one for him to establish. Assuming the relevancy of his averments, I see no sufficient reason why he should not be allowed an opportunity of endeavouring to establish it.

6. I think the Lord Ordinary has gone altogether too fast in practically deciding the case, so far as the grounds for reduction are concerned, upon the record. There must, in my judgment, be inquiry into the facts. Here we are confronted with a question of some difficulty in regard to procedure. It was, I think, admitted that the pursuer has stated a relevant case for damages, if he is entitled to go into that matter ; and the questions as to the defenders' liability, and the amount of damages if liability were established, would, in ordinary course, be referred to a jury. The preliminary questions raised by way of bar would, on the other hand, be ordinarily disposed of by a proof. But these cannot, so far as I see, be expiscated, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, without necessarily raising and determining the questions as to liability and (if liability be proved) damages. The pursuer's case of lesion would fail entirely if the defenders are not liable in any damages for fault or negligence at common law ; and it might equally fail, unless the damages were assessed at a pretty substantial figure. The whole parts of the case must therefore, I apprehend, be tried together. It would, I think, as a whole, be one obviously unsuited for jury trial. The alternative, and I consider in the circumstances the preferable, course is that the whole case should go to proof before the Lord Ordinary.

On these grounds I am for recalling the interlocutor reclaimed against, repelling the defenders' second and third pleas in law, and sustaining their fifth plea ; and quoad ultra, remitting to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof, before answer, of their respective averments in ordinary form.

LORD SALVESEN.—The most interesting question in this case is—By what law does the contract between the pursuer and defenders, under which they agreed that he should receive compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, fall to be governed ? The domicile of the pursuer is said to be Irish, but the contract was entered into in Scotland and fell to be performed there. According to the law of his domicile it would appear —and at all events it is averred—that the contract was a nullity. Accord—Mar. 14, 1913. ing to the law of Scotland, on the other hand, a minor has a certain capacity to contract, and his contract is not necessarily a nullity. There is an almost infinite divergence of opinion amongst the writers on international law on this subject. As I read them, however, there seems to be a general agreement between the tribunals of Scotland, England, and America that the law of the place where the contract was made must prevail. The considerations which support this view are mainly those of good sense and expediency. A foreigner who contracts in Scotland with a native of that country must prima facie be held to intend that the law of Scotland shall be held to apply to the transaction. The Scotch contracting party cannot be presumed to know the law which regulates the capacity of the foreigner with whom he contracts. Indeed he has no reason to know that the foreigner has not become domiciled in Scotland; for if he is resident there this is a matter which may be known only to himself. In the case of a minor the reasonable view seems to be that he should have such protection in respect of his minority as the country in which he contracts would extend to a native, but that he should have no higher or different rights. In an early case in England, Male v. Roberts,¹ the identical question which we have to consider here came under the notice of Lord Eldon. There the plaintiff and defendant were performers at the Royal Circus. While performing in Edinburgh the defendant had become indebted to a Scotch creditor for supplies. He was arrested in meditatione fugæ, and being unable to pay, induced the plaintiff to pay the account for him. An action was afterwards brought to recover the money so paid as money paid to his use. The defence relied on was that he was an infant when the money was so advanced. It was contended on his behalf that the contract fell to be governed by the law of England, but this view was set aside. Lord Eldon said:—"The law of the country where the contract arose, must govern the contract." This case was referred to with approval in *Sottomayor v. De Barros*² by Sir James Hannen. The same rule applies in America, or at least in certain of the states of that country (see Story's Conflict of Laws, 8th ed., chap. IV.), and while in Scotland it does not seem to have been laid down in such absolute terms, the general trend of the decisions is in the same direction (see Scoffier v. Read,³ where the minor son of an Englishman who contracted in Scotland was found entitled to restitution on the ground of minority and lesion). The case of *Cooper v. Cooper*⁴ affords little guidance, because there the law of the domicile and of the contract was one and the same; and it was held that the validity of the contract fell to be regulated by that law, especially as it could not be predicated that the contract (being one of marriage) was necessarily to be performed in another country. In modern times, when so many foreigners have taken up their residence in Scotland for the purpose of making their livelihood, although they may retain their original domicile for purposes of succession or the like, it would be highly inconvenient both for them and for Scotsmen with whom they contracted if contracts could not be made as freely with them

M'Feetridge
v. Stewart &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Salvesen.

¹ 3 Esp. 163, 6 Rev. Rep. 823.

³ M. 8936.

² 5 P. D. 94.

⁴ 15 R. (H. L.) 21.

Mar. 14, 1913. as with natives. I have accordingly reached the conclusion that the law of Scotland is the law which applies to the capacity of the pursuer in this case.

M'Feetridge v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited. The Lord Ordinary, proceeding on this assumption, has held that the contract which the pursuer made was null because it was made by a minor having a curator without that curator's consent. If the premises be sound the conclusion is not disputed; but the question remains, Had this Irish lad of sixteen a curator whose consent the defenders ought to have obtained to the transaction? It is true his father was resident in Ireland and would presumably have been his curator according to Scots law if he had been resident in this country; but I cannot hold that a minor who is resident in Scotland must be treated as a minor having a curator, because his father happens to be alive, though resident in some other part of the world. It is of no moment in this question of law whether he is or is not easily accessible. The principle must be the same whether he is resident in Poland or in Ireland, or whether his residence is not known at all. The reason why a minor who has curators cannot act without them is because he is under their protection or supervision, a fact which is presumably known to the person with whom he contracts; but curators who are absent from the country are not capable of giving any protection, nor has the person with whom the minor contracts any reason to know of their existence. The common case where the curator's consent is indispensable to validate the minor's actings is where the minor is living in family with his father; but the principle has also been applied where he was serving an apprenticeship in a town different from that in which his father lived but under a contract of apprenticeship entered into on his behalf by his father.¹ There is no case, so far as I know, where a minor's contract has been held to be null because it was entered into without the consent of a curator who was permanently absent from the country. In one case where the curators were abroad the Court appointed a curator ad litem to a minor, a step which would not have been competent if they had been resident within the country and not disqualified from acting. There is another ground upon which it may well be held that this minor, according to our law, had such capacity to contract as belongs to a minor who has no curators. He had left his father's house and country; he was earning his own livelihood in Scotland, and very probably a larger income than his father. He was thus forisfamiliated; and it is a principle of our law that the curatory of a father ceases after the minor has become forisfamiliated.

Assuming, then, that the pursuer is to be dealt with as a Scottish minor who had no curators, it is quite settled that the contract into which he entered with the defenders was as effectual as if he had had curators and had acted with their consent.² The contract is accordingly not null, although it may be reducible on the ground of enorm lesion. The same remedy is granted to a minor without curators as to one who has acted with the concurrence of his curators. It was strenuously maintained by the defenders that, while this is the general law, it does not apply to the case where a minor has betaken himself to business or trade. But the exception does not apply to deeds which are not incident to the employment or business which the minor has embarked upon.¹ Now it is true that the pursuer could have made no claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act unless there had existed between the defenders and him the relation of employers and employed; but I cannot hold that it is incident to the contract of employment that the workman should discharge a claim for personal injury due to the negligence of his employer, whether such discharge is express or results by operation of law from a contract which he has made. Accordingly I am of opinion that he is still entitled to set aside that contract if in fact he can show that it was to his enorm lesion. In Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited,² the contention, which the defenders also pressed, was rejected that "the whole question of minority and lesion was excluded by the Act of Parliament, because the Act of Parliament brings the employer and the injured workman necessarily into the position of bargaining with one another, and this implies that once that bargain is made it must be carried out and receive full effect."³ In that case the transaction sought to be set aside was one in which a lump sum had been accepted in full settlement of a weekly claim for compensation. But in the case of *Stephens*⁴ the material facts were the same as here; and the Court held that the Act, by including an apprentice under the general word "workman," did not alter the law in reference to contracts by infants. These two decisions seem to be conclusive on this point.

¹ Anderson v. Anderson, 11 S. 10.

² Erskine, i. 7, 33.

Although, therefore, I am of opinion that the pursuer is not barred from obtaining restitution on the ground of minority and lesion, I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the contract which he entered into can be set aside de plano. Enorm lesion may be inferred without proof, as, for instance, when a gratuitous discharge has been granted by a minor of valuable patrimonial rights or when he has entered into a cautionary obligation; but the transaction here was not of that nature. On the contrary, it may be that the minor acted with prudence and discretion in electing to take compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If, on the facts, it turns out that his claim at common law was not well founded, or if the advantages which he secured under the Act were comparable to the amount which might reasonably be awarded him as compensation at common law, enorm lesion would obviously not be established. Parties are not agreed that the defenders would have been liable at common law, nor as to the extent to which the pursuer's injuries have permanently unfitted him for his ordinary work. These are matters for inquiry, and are best disposed of by a legal as distinguished from a lay tribunal. I therefore agree that we should recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and remit to him to allow the pursuer a proof of his averments, excluding those relating to Irish law.

On the other matters noticed in Lord Dundas's opinion, and upon which I have not touched, I agree with the conclusions at which he has arrived.

LORD GUTHRIE.—The defenders plead res judicata. I agree with the

¹ Mackenzie v. Fairholm, (1666) M. 8959.

² Per Lord Kinnear, at p. 774.

³ 6 F. 770.

⁴ [1904] 2 K. B. 225.

Mar. 14, 1913.
M. Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.
Lord Salvesen.

Mar. 14, 1913.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Guthrie.

Lord Ordinary in thinking that this plea is not maintainable, either in respect of the proceedings before the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Airdrie mentioned in cond. 7, or in respect of what took place in the appeal by way of stated case to this Division of the Court. Even if the question of the effect of the pursuer's minority could have been competently determined by the Sheriff-substitute in an application under paragraph (16) of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which I do not think it could, the points now relied on by the pursuer, founded on Irish law and on minority and enorm lesion, were not maintained before the Sheriff. The only ground on which it was said that the alleged agreement was not binding was that the pursuer was in minority and his curator did not give his consent. In this Division the position taken up by the pursuer was the same. The second question in the stated case is thus expressed: "(2) Was the agreement binding on the appellant without the consent of his curator?" But it is enough to say that the Court refused to answer this question.

If the questions raised by the pursuer are open, he maintains that he is entitled either to decree that the agreement in question was ab initio null, or that it is reducible on the ground of minority and enorm lesion. He maintains that the agreement was ab initio null on two grounds. First, the case, he says, falls to be dealt with under Irish law, according to which minors have not capacity to enter into binding contracts; and, second, if Scots law applies the same result follows, because the pursuer was in minority, and his curator did not give his consent. I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a sound conclusion in rejecting the pursuer's contention founded on the applicability of Irish law, but that he has erred in affirming the second ground on which the pursuer maintains that the agreement was null.

In regard to the question of Irish law, it was maintained by the pursuer that, by the law of Scotland, the question of capacity on the part of a foreign minor to enter into contracts in Scotland must in all cases be determined by the law of the foreigner's domicile, even if the contract falls to be performed in Scotland; while the defenders argued that, in all cases of contracts entered into between Scotsmen and foreign minors in Scotland¹ to be performed there, the law applicable must be the law of Scotland. It does not seem to me necessary to decide this broad question. It may be that, in the case of contracts like marriage-contracts, affecting permanently the personal or domestic relations, the law of the domicile would be held to apply. Cooper v. Cooper,¹ in which an obiter dictum of Lord Macnaghten was expressed, on which the pursuer strongly relied, was a case of that kind. In such cases it might be held that it was the duty of the Scotch party to the contract, in view of the character and effect of the contract, to inquire into and have in view the law of the foreigner's domicile. But it does not seem to me that any such difficulties arise in the present case. I think the present case falls under the class discussed by Lord Fraser in Part VIII. of Parent and Child, in which, while conceding "deference in general to the lex domicilii on the whole questions relative to minority," he considers that the law which is applicable is not the law of the foreigner's domicile, but the law of Scotland. This view is in accordance with the opinions of many jurists. For instance, Froland is quoted by Story in his fourth chapter of the Conflict of Laws, section 55a, "If the question is purely as to the state of the person, abstracted from all consideration of property or subject-matter, in this case the law which first commenced to fix his condition (that is, the law of the domicile of his birth) will preserve its force and authority, and follow him wherever he may go. Thus, if, by the law of the domicile of his origin a person attains his majority at twenty years, and he goes to reside in another place where the age of majority is twenty-five years, he is held to be of the age of majority everywhere; and, notwithstanding he is under twenty-five years, he may in his new domicile sell, alien, hypothecate, and contract as he pleases, and vice versa. But when the question is as to the ability or disability of a person who has changed his domicile to do a certain thing (à faire une certaine chose), then that which had governed his power (that is, the law of his original domicile) falls, and fails entirely in this respect, and yields its authority to the law of his new domicile. Thus, if a married woman, by the law of the country of her birth, is not allowed to pass property by will without the consent of her husband, and she acquires a new domicile in another country where no such restriction exists, she has full liberty to dispose of her property in the latter country by will without the consent of her husband, and vice versa."

¹ 15 R. (H. L.) 21.

Mar. 14, 1913.
M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

Lord Guthrie.

But, if the Scots law applies, the pursuer says that the agreement in question is void, because entered into without consent of his curator. This contention implies that, at the date of the agreement, the pursuer had a curator, namely, his father. But this is a mistake in fact, because, on the admitted facts, the pursuer was forisfamiliar, and the agreement must therefore be dealt with as if it had been entered into by the pursuer with consent of his curator—that is to say, not as a null agreement, but as voidable on proof of minority and enorm lesion. If so, the defenders say that the pursuer is not entitled to inquiry, under the head of minority and enorm lesion, because no such case is made on record. I think there is considerable force in the defenders' contention. It is evident that the record was originally framed on the footing of getting rid of the agreement as null on the ground that it was entered into by the pursuer, a minor, without his curator. The question of Irish law has been properly raised by amendment both in the condescendence and pleas in law, while the only direct reference to enorm lesion is in plea 3. But I am prepared to concur in the view taken by Lord Dundas that, in the absence of any prejudice to the defenders, the pursuer's pleadings on the question of enorm lesion, although not satisfactory, may be allowed to pass, to the effect of entitling him to inquiry.

On the mode of inquiry, I concur that this is a case peculiarly unfitted for jury trial, and one in which special cause has been shown why the whole matter should be remitted to probation before a Judge.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, repelled the second and third pleas in law for the defenders, sustained

Mar. 14, 1913.

M'Feetridge
v. Stewarts &
Lloyds,
Limited.

their fifth plea in law, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof before answer of their respective averments, and to proceed therein as accords.

ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—R. & R. DENHOLM & KERR, Solicitors—Agents.

No. 108. THE HIGHLAND DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF THE COUNTY OF PERTH, Pursuers (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—Lippe.
Mar. 18, 1913. WILLIAM RATTRAY, Defender (Appellant).—Macmillan, K.C.—
J. G. Jameson.

Highland
District
Committee of Perth County
Council v.
Rattray.

Road—Extraordinary expenses—Recovery by road authority—Requisites of surveyor's certificate—Road of less than statutory width—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 57.

Sec. 57 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, provides that "where by the certificate of their surveyor or district surveyor it appears to" the road authority "that, having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, extraordinary expenses have been incurred" in repairing damage caused by extraordinary traffic, the road authority may recover the amount of the expense from the person responsible for the traffic.

In an action to recover the expense of repairing damage done to a road by extraordinary traffic, held that it was not essential that the surveyor's certificate should bear to have been framed, or should in fact have been framed, with regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood; but observed that it was the duty of the road authority, before bringing the action, to have regard to such average expense.

Opinion (per Lord Salvesen) that a road authority is not barred from recovering damage done to a road by extraordinary traffic merely because the road is of less than the width prescribed by statute.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perth.

ON 26th October 1911 the Highland District Committee of the County Council of the County of Perth brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Perth against William Rattray, wood merchant, there, for payment of £1010, 10s.

The pursuers averred that they were the road authority for the Highland District of the county of Perth, and as such were vested with the management of (1) the road from Tay Bridge by Coshieville to Tummel Bridge; and (2) the road from Logierait by Clunie Bridge to Daloist. That the defender was a wood merchant, who, between April 1910 and June 1911, transported heavy loads of timber by means of traction engines from Foss to Aberfeldy over the roads above mentioned, and thereby severely damaged them. (Cond. 9) ". . . The total extraordinary expenses incurred by the pursuers in repairing the said roads in consequence of defender's operations has amounted to £965, 10s. The total distance of roads damaged is 7 miles and 945 yards or thereby. The average annual cost for the past five years, dealing with all the roads within the pursuers' district, of maintaining the said roads in repair sufficient for the purposes of the ordinary traffic resorting thereto has been (1) road—Foss to Daloist, £8, 13s. 4d. per mile; and (2) road—Daloist to Coshieville, £11, 17s. 1d. per mile. The said extra sums of expenditure incurred by pursuers in respect of the repair of said roads are extraordinary expenses within the meaning of the section of the statute quoted in article 2 of the condescendence,* and they were incurred by reason of the damage arising from the excessive weight and extraordinary nature of the traffic of the defender during said period. In dealing with the expenses of repairing said damage to said roads and in estimating the amount of said extraordinary expenses the pursuers have had regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood. None of said highways are entirely comparable with the roads in question, but the following roads are the most similar, viz.:—Aberfeldy and Amulree Road; Glenbrerachan Road, Moulin to Dirnanean; Ardrannoch Burn by Dumfallowlandy to Logierait; Tenandry, Strathgarry, and Inverack Road; Lochtay South Road. Looking to the nature of said highways as well as to the other highways in the neighbourhood, and the traffic which they carry and the average expense of their maintenance, the sums now sued for are fair and just estimates of the amounts which the pursuers are entitled to recover as extraordinary expenses within the meaning of said section incurred in respect of the roads in question. The surveyor's reports for the past five years are produced and referred to."† They averred further that other damage to bridges and a culvert was done by the extraordinary traffic conducted by the defender, amounting to £45, which, together with the above-mentioned sum of £965, 10s., made up the sum of £1010, 10s. sued for.

Mar. 18, 1913.
Highland
District
Committee of Perth County
Council v.
Rattray.

Together with the initial writ the pursuers produced a certificate from the road surveyor of their district in these terms:—"I hereby certify that much damage has been done to the road and bridges from Coshieville to Foss sawmill through excessive weights passing along the road, or extraordinary traffic having been conducted thereon, in the haulage of timber to Aberfeldy by Mr William Rattray, and that extraordinary expenses amounting to One thousand and ten pounds ten shillings beyond the ordinary cost of maintenance has been expended in repairing the damage, being £965, 10s. in repairs on roads; £24 in repairs to Blair Rannoch Bridge; £15 in repairs on Whitebridge; and £6 in repairs on the culvert at the seventh milestone."

The defender averred that the second mentioned road from Logierait to Dalolst was formerly a statute labour road, that it was nowhere of the width of 20 feet, and that the average width of clear passable road was about 9 feet. The pursuers stated that the average width of the road was 11 feet.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers having incurred

* The statute referred to was the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), which, by sec. 57, enacts:—"Where by the certificate of their surveyor or district surveyor it appears to the authority which is liable to repair any highway that, having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, extraordinary expenses have been incurred by such authority in repairing such highway by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same or by extraordinary traffic thereon, such authority may recover in a summary manner before the Sheriff (whose decision shall be final), from any person by whose order the excessive weight has been passed, or the extraordinary traffic has been conducted, the amount of such extraordinary expenses as may be proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff to have been incurred by such authority by reason of the damage arising from such excessive weight or traffic as aforesaid."

† The averments printed in italics were added by amendment during the debate before the Second Division.

Mar. 18, 1913.

Highland
District
Committee of Perth County
Council v.
Rattray.

extraordinary expenses in repairing the highways, bridges, and culvert mentioned in the condescendence in consequence of the extraordinary traffic and excessive weight conducted thereon by the defender, are entitled to decree against the defender for payment thereof as craved. The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The certificates by the district surveyor being awanting in specification and disconform to the requirements of the statute, the action should be dismissed. (2) The pursuers' averments being irrelevant, the action should be dismissed. (3) The alleged damage not being "the consequence of any particular building contract or work extending over a long period," within the meaning of section 24, subsection (b), of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1908, the action cannot be maintained, except under the first part of that subsection in respect of the damage alleged to have been done within twelve months prior to the commencement of the action. (4) The road between Foss and Daloist being one which it was illegal for the pursuers to maintain, as it was short of the statutory width, they can have no cause of action in respect thereof.

On 16th July 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Repels the defender's first plea so far as excluding the action: As to the defender's fourth plea, finds that the fact—assuming it to be fact—that the pursuers have not a road 20 feet wide of passable width from Daloist to Foss does not exclude them from maintaining an action against one who is said to have caused wrongful damage to such road, and to that effect and extent repels the said fourth plea: Quoad ultra before further answer allows to the parties a proof of their respective averments on record. . . ."

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Johnston) who, on 3rd January 1913, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

The defender, having obtained leave, appealed to the Court of Session.

The case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 20th, 21st, and 22nd February and 11th and 12th March 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The action was incompetent because the surveyor's certificate did not state that the surveyor had considered the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, and also because in fact he had not taken that matter into consideration. The requisites of a surveyor's certificate were considered in the case of Billericay,¹ and the opinions there expressed supported the view maintained by the appellant. It was impossible for the surveyor to certify that the traffic had been extraordinary, and that extraordinary expenses had been incurred, unless he had had regard to the standard of traffic in the district² and the cost of repairing highways other than the one in question.³ The dicta in *Milne*⁴ should be reconsidered in the light of the more recent English decisions, in particular the case of Billericay.¹ The decision of Mr Justice Bigham sitting as a single Judge in *Epsom Urban District Council v. London County Council*⁵ was wrong, and should not be fol-

¹ Billericay Rural Council v. Poplar Union and Keeling, [1911] 2 K. B. 801, per Fletcher Moulton, L.J., at p. 812.

² Wallington v. Hoskins, (1880) 6 Q. B. D. 206.

³ Colchester Corporation v. Gepp, [1912] 1 K. B. 477.

⁴ Milne & Co. v. Aberdeen District Committee, (1899) 2 F. 230.

⁵ [1900] 2 Q. B. 751 at p. 757.

lowed. This flaw in the certificate was fatal to the pursuers' case. Mar. 18, 1913.
Prima facie the public were entitled to use the roads freely and according to their necessity. Any restriction was statutory, and the statutory formalities must be strictly observed. (2) The average width of the Dalroist Road was conceded to be under 20 feet, contrary to the provisions of the Highway (Scotland) Act, 1771,¹ under which the pursuers were bound to keep it 20 feet wide.² The defenders being in breach of their statutory obligations, could not enforce their statutory rights. The two matters were closely connected, for if the road had been of the proper width, the traffic would have been spread over a greater area, and the extraordinary damage would not have been done.

Highland
District
Committee of Perth County
Council v.
Battray.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The object of the certificate was "to inform the highway board of the fact that extraordinary expenses had been incurred upon certain highways within their jurisdiction."³ But it was nowhere laid down that it was the duty of the surveyor to "have regard" to the average cost of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, or to state in his certificate that he had done so. If anyone was bound to do that, it was the road authority.⁴ The contrary construction would imply that the surveyor was final as to the choice of comparable roads and that the road authority had no duty except to take the figures which he gave them. The surveyor was entitled to issue his certificate on any grounds which seemed to him sufficient. (2) There was no necessary connection between the width of the road and the damage so as to prevent the pursuers recovering on the ground of extraordinary traffic. It was absurd to suggest that, merely because the road was not of statutory width, the defender was entitled to damage it to any extent he pleased.

At advising on 18th March 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—A good many questions of general interest and importance were fully and ably argued at our bar; but I have come to the conclusion that it is neither necessary nor desirable to decide all of them at this stage of the case.

1. The defender's first plea in law seems to be directed in some measure against the relevancy of the action, but also largely against its competency. The latter aspect of the plea we ought to deal with here and now; and I think the learned Sheriff-substitute, whose interlocutor was affirmed by the Sheriff, is right in repelling it "so far as excluding the action." The point involved is whether the surveyor's certificates are disconform to the statute, so as to be no certificates at all, in respect that they do not bear ex facie to have been framed by him "having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood." I do not think that upon a just construction of section 57 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, in which the words quoted occur, it is a necessary qualification of a

¹ 11 Geo. III. cap. 53, sec. 1.

² Gray v. St Andrews and Cupar District Committees of Fifeshire County Council, 1911 S. C. 266; Walkinshaw v. Orr, (1860) 22 D. 627, 23 D. 80.

³ Wirral Highway Board v. Newall, [1895] 1 Q. B. 827, per Lawrence, J., at p. 831.

⁴ Epsom Urban District Council v. London County Council, [1900] 2 Q. B. 751, at p. 757; Milne & Co. v. Aberdeen District Committee, 2 F. 220.

Mar. 18, 1913. surveyor's certificate that it should include these words. I do not see what good their mere inclusion would do to the defender or to anybody concerned. I shall say something presently as to what I conceive to be the place and function of the certificate in a statutory proceeding of this nature. But so far as authority goes, it appears that, though it is usual for the certificate to bear that regard has been had to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, it is not essential that it should do so. This was directly decided in a considered judgment by Lord Mersey (then Bigham, J.) in Epsom Urban District Council.¹ It was there argued that "the surveyor's certificate is not in proper form, because it does not show that the average expenses of repairing all the roads in the district have been taken into account, and not those merely of repairing the roads along the line of traffic." The report shows that the certificate expressly bore that the surveyor had had "regard to the average expenses of repairing highways along the line of traffic." His Lordship said: "I think nothing of this point. I am quite satisfied that the certificate did make it appear to the plaintiffs" (the road authority) "that extraordinary expenses within the meaning of the section had been incurred; and if it did that, it was a certificate which complied with the requirements of the law." This point was discussed in the Scots case of *Milne & Company*²; and also the further point—which I think we ought now to decide—whether or not it is necessary that the surveyor should, in fact, have regard in framing his certificate to the neighbouring highways. The certificates there did ex facie bear that regard had been had to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, but the pursuers sought reduction of the certificates, and of the Sheriff's decree (which at that time was not subject to appeal), in respect that the former were false and fraudulent to the knowledge of the road authority, and were granted without any such "regard" being had in fact. The pursuers argued, inter alia, that the certificates were an essential preliminary to the action; and if they were not truly in terms of the statute, the whole proceedings were bad. But their action failed; and I think the opinions of the learned Judges, which I shall presently refer to in some detail, were clearly to the effect that it is not an essential preliminary to the action—a condition sine qua non of its competency—that the surveyor in granting his certificate should have had regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood. I should myself have reached the conclusion, upon a construction of the statute and apart from authority, (1) that it is not essential that the certificate should bear on its face that the surveyor had had regard in framing it to neighbouring highways, or that he should in fact have had such regard, and (2) that it is sufficient that the road authority should, with the certificate before them, and before raising action, have regard to the average expenses of repairing highways in the neighbourhood. The production of a certificate by the surveyor is certainly an essential condition precedent to an action like the present. It is, as Mr Macmillan put it during the discussion, the pursuers' ticket of admission to the law Court. But it is not easy to define precisely the place and function of the certificate in the matter, or to realise the exact object of the Legislature in making it a condition precedent of legal proceedings, and in introducing the words already quoted with reference to neighbouring highways. It is not necessary at present to commit oneself to a concluded opinion as to the object of the Legislature, or what amount of safeguard, and to whom, it designed to provide by referring to highways in the neighbourhood. But I agree with the learned Judges in Milne's case¹ in holding, upon a construction of section 57 of the Act of 1878, that it is not essential that the surveyor in framing his certificate should in fact have had regard to the expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, although the road authority themselves, before commencing action, must have regard to it, whatever the precise nature and limits of such regard may be. The Lord Ordinary (Low) thought that one object of the words already quoted from the statute "was to secure that the only basis for determining whether there had or had not been extraordinary expenditure should not be the cost of repairing the road upon which extraordinary traffic had arisen." His Lordship considered that the words used were "designedly very general words, so as not to lay down any hard and fast rule, but to give considerable latitude so as to meet the varying circumstances of different cases." The Lord President (Kinross) thought that the direction in section 57, to have regard to the average expense in the neighbourhood, "is addressed, in the first instance at all events, to the road authority, and they are not enjoined to accept it as a final standard, but only to consider it—possibly along with other evidence bearing upon the question whether the expenses incurred by them in repairing the highway in question are or are not extraordinary." Lord M'Laren attached no importance to the argument relating to the certificate, which, he observed, "is not a formal legal document at all." Lord Kinnear was of opinion that "the surveyor's certificate is only necessary to set the local authority in motion." I am aware, however, that the views I have quoted are not in harmony with opinions expressed by some learned Judges in England, particularly with some obiter dicta by Lord Moulton (then L.J.) in the Billerica case.² For present purposes it is sufficient to decide that the action is not incompetent although the certificate does not bear on its face to have been framed, and may not in fact have been framed, "having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood"; and to indicate the opinion that it is the duty of the road authority, before commencing an action like this, to "have regard" to the matter indicated. As to the extent and quality of such "regard" which it is necessary for them to have, or to what highways in the neighbourhood regard must be had, or in what fashion, I express no opinion. These questions may arise for decision if the case comes before us again on an appeal after the evidence has been taken. I think the Sheriff-substitute dealt rightly with the defender's first plea in law.

¹ [1900] 2 Q. B. 751.

² 2 F. 220.

2. The defender's second plea is that "the pursuers' averments being irrelevant, the action should be dismissed." The argument on this head was in two branches. Mr Macmillan contended, in the first place, with great force, that the pursuers' own record made it quite clear that neither

¹ 2 F. 220.² [1911] 2 K. B., at p. 812.

Mar. 18, 1913. the surveyor, in framing his certificate, nor the pursuers themselves, before bringing the action, had in fact had any regard at all to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood. In the second place, he maintained that the record did not contain sufficient specification—equivalent to the “particulars” in an English suit—in regard to the two different roads with which the action is specially concerned. Mr Horne has now relieved the situation by making amendments on his record which go far, at all events, towards meeting both objections. The pursuers now aver that they have had regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, and they state a number of particulars. The proof allowed is “before further answer,” and the plea to relevancy will be neither sustained nor repelled in hoc statu. If the defender should consider himself entitled to any further particulars, the Sheriff-substitute can deal with the matter before the proof.

Highland
District
Committee of Perth County
Council v.
Rattray.

Lord Dundas.

3. The defender's third plea in law raises a question as to the time limit applicable to the action in respect of section 24 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1908. The argument at our bar indicated that the state of judicial decision (at least, of judicial opinion) in England—there seems to be no Scots authority—is somewhat unsettled and uncertain, and that questions of considerable difficulty may arise in this case upon a construction of the statute. But for myself I decline to decide ab ante an abstract question of construction without accurate knowledge of the facts, and I agree with the learned Sheriffs that these must be inquired into before a decision in law on this head of the case can be satisfactorily arrived at.

4. The defender's fourth plea in law is a somewhat singular one. It would, if sustained de plano, exclude the action so far as it relates to the road between Foss and Dalquist. The theory is that that road, inasmuch as it does not afford a clear passable space at all parts of at least 20 feet, does not comply with the statutory obligation imposed on road authorities in Scotland, and therefore the pursuers are not in a position to recover from the defender any pecuniary loss they may have sustained from his use of it by way of excessive weight or extraordinary traffic. Prima facie this argument appears to involve something of a non sequitur, and the learned Sheriff indicates an opinion that the defence is irrelevant. But expiscation of the facts, as to which the parties do not seem to be agreed, may throw light upon the matter, and as there is to be a proof, I am content to let this point be included in its scope for what it is worth.

For the reasons stated, I think we should affirm the interlocutors appealed against, and remit the case to the Sheriff Court for proof.

LORD SALVESEN.—This action raises questions as to the construction of section 57 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, the language of which has been borrowed from an English statute, and which has already been the subject of much judicial comment in England, and at least on one occasion in Scotland. There is a general consensus of opinion with regard to one point, viz., that the certificate of the surveyor or district surveyor is a condition precedent to an action being raised by a Local Authority for recovery of extraordinary expenses incurred in repairing a highway. The important question is whether the surveyor in granting it must have had

"regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood," and must so state in his certificate. It was said with much apparent force, and the view has the support of so eminent a Judge as Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton, that it cannot appear to the Local Authority which has to consider the matter that extraordinary expenses have been incurred, having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, unless that can be gathered from the certificate itself. If this is a statutory solemnity and the certificate is a nullity in consequence of its omission, then it would seem to follow that the whole proceedings must be commenced de novo; with the necessary consequence that the time limit would operate very much to the defender's advantage.

Mar. 18, 1913.
Highland District
Committee of Perth County
Council v.
Rattray.
Lord Salvesen.

I do not stop to consider what the object of the Legislature was in providing that the certificate of the surveyor should be a condition precedent to the Local Authority raising any action. Various suggestions have been made, more or less conjectural. None of them seem to me to indicate that the certificate performs any really useful function. It may be assumed that a Local Authority would not embark upon litigation unless, at least, they were backed up by the official whom they appoint to supervise the roads within their jurisdiction. Perhaps the draughtsman may have thought the surveyor was some independent official whose views might act as a check upon the rashness of the Local Authority. If so, he undoubtedly proceeded on a misapprehension. This much may be said, that if the surveyor in his certificate is to perform the functions that the defenders say the statute has laid upon him, he has an extremely difficult task. He has in the first place to consider what is the meaning of "average expense." Over what period is the average to be taken? Is it the average of the period in respect of which the claim is made, which may be a broken period of a few months; or is it to be an average extending over a period of years, and if so, how many? He has next to consider what is meant by the term "highways." Are all the roads to be included, or is it only similar or comparable roads to which he is to have regard, as the Court of Appeal held in the Billerica case¹? And what if there be no similar or comparable highways, as may well happen in a thinly populated district where there is only one main road and the rest are side roads differing entirely in width, formation, and solidity? Lastly, what is meant by the phrase "in the neighbourhood"? Does it extend to highways under a different jurisdiction with which the surveyor has no acquaintance, as where the road injured is very near the limit of his jurisdiction? And what area is to be covered by the phrase? All these matters the surveyor must apparently consider if the defender's argument is sound, and must come to a right legal result with regard to them if his certificate is not in the end to be treated as a nullity. I do not think that it was the intention of the Legislature that such a burden should be cast upon the surveyor. The object of inserting the clause that I have referred to seems rather to be by way of warning to the Local Authority before taking action and to the Judge who has ultimately to decide the case, that it is not to be rashly concluded, because there has been more expense incurred in repairing a particular highway in

¹ [1911] 2 K. B. 801.

Mar. 18, 1913. one year than another, that therefore that highway must have been injured by extraordinary traffic or excessive weights. Regard must be had to all the circumstances that may have affected similar highways in the district and that in a given year may have increased the amount expended on repairs. In short, the words "having regard to" might, I think, be translated "in view of," in which case it is the Authority which must consider the figures stated in the certificate, and compare them with the general charges for maintenance incurred on comparable roads in the vicinity.

Highland
District
Committee of Perth County
Council v.
Rattray.

Lord Salvesen.

This construction is supported by the fact that the amount recoverable against the person by whose extraordinary traffic the road has been damaged is not measured by the difference between the actual cost of repairing the road in controversy and the average expense of repairing similar roads in the neighbourhood for the same mileage. It is also, in my judgment, settled by authority both in England and Scotland. The exact point was decided by Bigham, J., in Epsom Urban District Council,¹ and also, I think, impliedly in the case of *Milne*² (a decision which is binding on this Court), and the Colchester Corporation.³ In the last two cases the certificate granted by the surveyor contained the formal words of the statute; but in each of them it was admitted that the surveyor had done no more than he certified in the present case—that is to say, that he had only ascertained what had been the average expense of repairing the highways in respect of which the claim was made, and had not applied his mind to the average expense of repairing similar highways in the neighbourhood. Now, I cannot conceive that the formal statement that compliance has been made with the statutory provision, when in fact it is admitted that that statement is untrue, can make a certificate, which would otherwise ex hypothesi be a nullity, a good and valid certificate; or that a certificate should be any the worse because it did not contain an admittedly false statement. When a surveyor has accurately ascertained over a period of years the average expense of repairing the roads affected by the alleged extraordinary traffic, I think both he and the Local Authority may well draw the conclusion that this will fairly represent the average expense of maintaining similar roads; for they cannot be similar if their annual upkeep is not approximately the same. Further, it may be assumed that the local authority as well as the surveyor will have a general knowledge of what it has cost them to repair similar roads per mile; and if it is found that the expense of repairing a particular road has been out of all proportion to the ordinary expense of its maintenance, I think it may well appear to the Local Authority, "by the certificate," to use the statutory language, that they have a prima facie cause of action. It is not to be left out of view that the surveyor in this case did certify that extraordinary expenses had been incurred; and the figure at which he stated these expenses might well justify the Local Authority in thinking that they were in duty bound to the ratepayers in the district to take proceedings for their recovery. On these grounds I have reached the opinion that even if the matter were open, as I conceive it is not, the certificate of the surveyor is not a nullity because it does not contain a statement that he has had regard to the expense of repairing similar highways in the

¹ [1900] 2 Q. B. 751.

² 2 F. 220.

³ [1912] 1 K. B. 477.

neighbourhood, or because he has not in fact applied his mind directly to Mar. 18, 1913. the question at all.

The only other matter which it is necessary to decide at this stage is that which is raised by the defender's fourth plea in law. It was decided by this Court in *Gray*¹ that road trustees are in breach of their statutory duty if they have failed to provide in the case of a statute-labour road a clear passable road of not less than 20 feet in width. I see no grounds for doubting the soundness of that decision; although it may be that road trustees have in many cases not strictly conformed to their statutory duty. But it is one thing to say that they may be liable as for negligence where an accident arises through their failure to provide a road of the statutory width; it is a totally different thing, and does not by any means follow, that they cannot recover for damage caused to a road of less than the statutory width by reason of extraordinary traffic. The statute does not impose any obligation upon them to have the road metalled so as to carry heavy traction-engines for any particular width. If it had, I could have seen some plausibility in the argument maintained. As matters stand I am prepared to hold—agreeing on this point with the Sheriff—that it is irrelevant for the defender to plead that the road was not of the statutory width. It is admitted that logically the argument would be precisely the same although the road was 19½ feet at only a single point throughout its course and for the rest complied with the statutory conditions. The argument for the defender seems to have been drawn from the domain of the law of contracts, and to have no application to a case such as the present. I am content, however, as the facts are in dispute, that this point and the others to which Lord Dundas has more fully referred should meantime be included in the inquiry, and should not be made the subject of formal decision.

Lord Dundas intimated that the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, who was absent when the case was advised, concurred in the judgment proposed.

LORD GUTHRIE was present when the case was advised.

THE COURT affirmed the interlocutors appealed against, remitted the cause to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the proof allowed by him, including the averments of the pursuers added by amendment, and found no expenses due to or by either party since the date of the Sheriff's interlocutor.

ERSKINE DODS & RHIND, S.S.C.—CARMICHAEL & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 1911 S. C. 266.

No. 109. WILLIAM LAWSON THOMS, Pursuer.—Morison, K.C.—W. T. Watson.
 Mar. 12, 1913. THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Macmillan, K.C.—Wark.

Thoms v.
 Caledonian
 Railway Co.

Reparation—Damages—Excess of damages—Damages for personal injury—Process—Proof—Jury trial—Motion for new trial.

Circumstances in which the Court refused to set aside, on the ground of excess of damages, the verdict of a jury awarding £4000 to a farmer (the profit of whose farm amounted to about £350 a year) in respect of personal injuries sustained by him in a railway accident.

1st Division.
 Ld. President
 and a Jury.

ON 20th May 1912 William Lawson Thoms, the tenant of an agricultural and dairy farm in the neighbourhood of Dundee, brought an action against the Caledonian Railway Company in which he concluded for the sum of £5000 as damages for personal injuries sustained by him owing to the fault of the defenders.

The cause was tried before the Lord President and a jury on 30th December 1912, and the jury unanimously found for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £4000.

On 28th January 1913 the Court granted a rule on the pursuer to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted, on the ground that the damages were excessive.

The effect of the evidence, so far as material to the question of damages, was thus set forth in the opinion of Lord Johnston:—

“The pursuer in this case met with an accident, due to careless shunting at Invergowrie Station of a couple of horse-boxes, in one of which he was seated in attendance on valuable horses belonging to him, which were being conveyed to a show at Perth. The pursuer is a man of thirty-six, and when a boy he suffered from tuberculous disease of the spine, which occasioned curvature of the spine in the lower dorsal region, and the consequent ossification of three of the vertebræ, but from which he had completely recovered and become an exceptionally athletic, active, and hard-working man in his vocation of farming. Unfortunately the blow which he received by being thrown back in his seat involved the spot in the spine where the stiffening from the old ailment existed, and re-started the tubercular condition, and in the course of a very few days it became manifest that his condition was serious. The Railway Company candidly admit liability, and the only question in dispute is the measure of damages. A jury has brought in a verdict for £4000 damages, and we are asked to set aside this verdict and order a new trial, solely on the ground of excess of damages.

“The case presents features which are too seldom met with in questions of compensation. On the unanimous and unqualified testimony of the very eminent surgeons examined on both sides, the pursuer has presented his case without exaggeration in regard to his injuries, his suffering, or his present condition. It must be added that, as was to be expected from the character and position of the professional witnesses, there is no trace of exaggeration in the scientific evidence on either side. If I may respectfully say so, the perusal of the medical evidence leaves one with the satisfaction of feeling that the aim of the medical witnesses was not to advocate a cause, but genuinely to assist the Court with the best opinion they could individually give. Moreover, in the matter of pecuniary loss sustained, the evidence of the pursuer himself and of the accountants engaged on Mar. 12, 1913. both sides is conspicuously fair and honest. But while it is eminently satisfactory to have a case so presented, it does not make it any the easier for the Court to determine whether a jury has been swayed beyond reason by their natural sympathies.

Thoms v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

"The date of the accident was 5th August 1911. From 12th August 1911 to January 1912 the pursuer was kept in a recumbent position, and did not leave his bed. From January to March 1912, as there was apparent improvement, he was allowed to be up for a time each day, and from March to May 1912 he was sent to Crieff Hydropathic for change. He was under the charge of Dr Dalgetty of Liff, his family doctor, in consultation with Professor McEwan of Dundee. But the apparent improvement of the early part of 1912 did not continue. He was accordingly, in June 1912, on the advice of Professor McEwan and of Dr Chalmers Watson of Edinburgh, again obliged to resume the recumbent position. In November, satisfactory progress not being made, he was brought over to Edinburgh and placed in a nursing home, to be more immediately under Dr Chalmers Watson. The trial took place on 30th December 1912, and I need hardly say that the pursuer was not present. There is a consensus of opinion among the doctors on both sides that he must, on returning home after a couple of months under Dr Chalmers Watson in Edinburgh, remain on his back for the whole of the current year 1913 if he is to be restored to health. The crucial question is, What are the prospects of such restoration?

"[His Lordship then examined the medical testimony for both the parties, and summarised its effect as follows]:—The points of agreement between the doctors examined were that the pursuer was an excellent subject and an excellent patient—a man in good general health, which was well maintained throughout the long confinement to bed, and of equable temper, who bore that confinement with exemplary patience; that there was no symptom of the spinal cord being affected; that what was affected was the bony matter of the vertebræ and the adjoining tissues, in which there was inflammation, causing pressure on, or otherwise affecting, the sensory and not the motor nerves; and that absolute quiescence and open-air treatment for a long continuance, not less than a year, were essential to recovery. The points of difference between the doctors were that the pursuer's advisers found marked extension of the pain both downward and upward from the seat of the old affection, and from this and other symptoms deduced the conclusion that more vertebræ had been attacked, and consequently, though taking a hopeful, took a more doubtful, view of ultimate recovery; while the doctors examined by the defenders were of opinion that the tubercular disease had not spread, and, accounting for the wide area of the pain in other ways, they took a decidedly hopeful view of recovery.

"I have read the medical evidence with great care, and I am glad to say that it has left on my mind the impression that the pursuer's prospect of recovery is very hopeful. But its certainty no one can predict. And that is, I think, the situation which the jury had to regard. [After further citations from the medical evidence his Lordship continued]—The state of the evidence therefore leaves to the jury, recovery to a satisfactory extent, hopeful, but not assured, and the degree of recovery unlikely in the best event to amount to restoration.

Mar. 12, 1913.

Thoms v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

"In performing the duty of assessing damages the jury had these further data before them. The pursuer was tenant of the farm of Benvie on the estate of Gray, with the small additional farm in the neighbourhood called Graystones. The area was 300 acres, and the rent, under a lease having still twelve years to run, £565. The land was good, and less than six miles from the centre of the town of Dundee. It was worked mainly as a dairy farm of forty cows, but otherwise for general cropping. This farm the pursuer personally carried on, superintending everything, and doing most of the important work himself. He was also a successful breeder and skilful breaker of Clydesdales. His average profit on this farm was put at £300, or even £350, a year, and, though we may not accept either figure, it must, in any view, be admitted to be substantial. There was, then, in the first place, an accepted expenditure in connection with medical treatment, from the date of the accident to the end of 1913, when that treatment was assumed to cease, of £420. There was also a realised loss during the same period, arising from the necessity of employing others to carry on the farm, which was reckoned at £597. I think that I should myself have estimated it at probably £100 less. But there was evidence, which it was quite open to the jury to accept, for the larger figure. These two sums together make £1017."

Counsel were heard upon the rule before the First Division (without Lord Mackenzie) on 7th March 1913.

Argued for the pursuer;—In order to be justified in setting aside the verdict of the jury on the ground of excess of damages the Court must be satisfied not merely that the damages awarded are in excess of the sum which they themselves would have considered sufficient, but that they "exceeded that latitude which any reasonable men could be permitted to indulge,"¹ that the verdict was perverse,² or that the award was so extravagant that no jury could be expected to repeat it.³ Looking at the nature of the evidence in this case it could not be said that the award was so excessive as to satisfy the tests laid down in these cases. It was shown that medical expenses incurred and to be incurred amounted to £420, and a realised loss upon the working of the farm of £600 had been proved, these two sums amounting to £1020. The jury were entitled to take from the evidence the view that the pursuer's injuries would result in disablement for life; £1500 was a reasonable sum as compensation under this head. Allowing £1000 as compensation for suffering, past and future, there remained a balance of between £400 and £500, which was not an unreasonable sum to award as solatium. In any case, these sums were not so grossly excessive as to justify the Court in disturbing the verdict. Nor was the sum awarded larger in proportion to the pursuer's income than sums which had been allowed in previous cases.⁴

¹ Landell v. Landell, (1841) 3 D. 819, per Lord Fullerton, Lord Mackenzie, Lord Jeffrey, and Lord Murray, at p. 825.

² Reid v. Morton, (1902) 4 F. 438, per Lord Kinnear, at p. 441.

³ Shields v. North British Railway, (1874) 2 R. 126, per Lord Deas and Lord President Inglis, at p. 128; Young v. Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Co., (1882) 10 R. 242, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 245; Casey v. United Collieries Co., Limited, 1907 S. C. 690, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 692, and Lord Pearson, at p. 694.

⁴ M'Kechnie v. Henderson & Son, (1858) 20 D. 551; Duthie v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1898) 25 R. 934.

The evidence showed a net profit of £350 on the working of the farm, Mar. 12, 1913. and the jury were entitled to add to this sum not only the amount expended by the pursuer on premiums of life insurance, but also the upkeep of his house; and thus to fix his income at about £600. The award hardly exceeded six times this sum, whereas in the cases last cited, fifteen times and ten times the incomes of the respective pursuers were held to be proper compensation for disablement for life.

Thoms v.
Oaledonian
Railway Co.

Argued for the defenders;—It was not the province of the jury in awarding damages, or of the Court in exercising their power of restraining that award, to put the pursuer in the financial position which he might have occupied but for the accident. What the Court was bound to see was that a reasonable proportion existed between the amount awarded and the loss sustained.¹ Deducting from the award the £420 which was admitted as due for medical treatment, there remained a balance of £3580 awarded in respect of the pursuer's sufferings and of his prospective loss of income. This sum was altogether an excessive award to one whose income was only £350. The cases of *M'Kechie*² and Duthie,³ cited for the pursuer, concerned workmen earning only a few shillings a week, and could be no guide to what was reasonable compensation for a person in the position of the pursuer. In Wallace v. West Calder Co-operative Society, Limited,⁴ the Court held that £800 was about twice as much as should have been awarded to the widow of a builder whose income was £150.

At advising on 12th March 1913,—

LORD KINNEAR.—I see no reason for disturbing the verdict of the jury in this case. The ground upon which it is challenged is that the damages are excessive, and I think we must keep in view what is the true position of the Court upon an application of that kind. I think that is established by the judgment of the Whole Court in Landell v. Landell,⁵ and we must take it that the law laid down by the majority of the consulted Judges there is sound. What Lord Fullerton, Lord Mackenzie, Lord Jeffrey, and other Judges say is this (at p. 825): it is not enough "to bring the damages within the description of excessive, that they are more, and even a great deal more, than the amount at which the injury sustained might have been estimated, in the opinion of the individual members of the Court to whom the application is made. Indeed, if that were enough, the Court would just be called upon to review the verdict of the jury, in a matter peculiarly within their province, and that upon a comparatively imperfect view of the evidence. It is clear that, in order to warrant the application of the term 'excessive,' the damages must be held to exceed, not what the Court might think enough, but even that latitude which, in a question of amount so very vague, any set of reasonable men could be permitted to indulge. The excess must be such as to raise on the part of the Court, the moral conviction that the jury, whether from wrong intention, or incapacity, or some mistake, have committed gross injustice, and have given higher damages than any jury of ordinary men, fairly and without gross mistake exercising

¹ Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Jenkins, [1913] A. C. 1, per Lord Atkinson, at p. 7.

² 20 D. 551.

³ 25 R. 934.

⁴ (1888) 15 R. 307.

⁵ 3 D. 819.

Mar. 12, 1913. their functions, could have awarded." Now, if that be the rule upon which we are to proceed, I must say I come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the award of the jury in this case so excessive as to justify its being said that they have gone beyond what any reasonable men, fairly exercising their functions, would have done.

Thoms v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Lord Kinnear.

It is not the province of this Court to estimate damages, and therefore, when I come to be of opinion that the award of the jury is not excessive in the sense explained in Landell v. Landell,¹ I do not, for myself, consider it to be within my province to estimate what the true amount of damage might be if the jury's amount were wrong. I accept their award. But then, I think it is nevertheless quite reasonable to consider what were the elements upon which the award of damage was properly to be estimated, because one can hardly say that a particular sum is not excessive without having some idea of what a reasonable award would be.

Now, I do not think it at all desirable to examine the evidence in any detail so as to enable one to fix the precise sum which should be due for each particular item of injury and then arrive at the conclusion by summing up the whole. I think it is enough for the present purpose to see generally what the elements were upon which damage should be awarded. In the first place, there was a certain amount of pecuniary loss which the jury necessarily took into account; and then, in the second place, there was the prospect of the pursuer being unable to carry on his business as he had hitherto done and to earn the amount of income, or anything like the amount of income, which he had earned when in sound health. These are items of damage or injury which the jury might reasonably find proper matter for more or less accurate calculation in money. But then I think, in this case, there was an element of much greater difficulty to deal with—I mean the probable effects upon the man's future life of the injury he has sustained. That is a question of some difficulty in itself, but it is also a matter upon which there can be no precise data for estimating damages. In addition to that, I think there is a still more troublesome element, and that is the damage, which the pursuer is entitled to have taken into account, for personal pain and suffering and loss of health which he has endured.

Now, it is impossible to read the account of this man's history and his present position without seeing that no amount of damages could ever be considered as real compensation for the personal injury he has suffered. It is obvious that that is not a consideration which can be pressed to any logical conclusion, because the result of it would be that the defender, in a case of personal injury, might be ruined, and yet the pursuer not compensated. And therefore that cannot be treated as a ground for any exact or logical estimate of damage, but I think it is a consideration which may fairly lead us to think that, upon a question of this kind, a larger latitude, within the bounds of reason, is to be allowed to a jury than upon matters which are capable of anything like exact calculation.

In this particular case I think the jury had all the advantage which the skill and the experience of medical men could give them for arriving at a reasonable and just view of the extent of the bodily injuries of the pursuer and his prospects of total recovery, because not only is the pursuer's own evidence altogether moderate and reasonable, but the evidence of the medical witnesses on both sides is entirely free from anything like a taint of partisanship or excess of opinion one way or another. The question could not be presented to the jury in a more moderate or in a clearer or more lucid form.

¹ 3 D. 819.

Mar. 12, 1913.
Thoms v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
Lord Kinnear.

I am therefore of opinion that there is no ground for saying that this jury has gone beyond a figure which any jury of reasonable men, properly informed, as to the question which they were to decide, could have reached. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that there is no ground for disturbing the verdict.

LORD JOHNSTON.—[After the narrative quoted supra, in which he stated that the loss incurred by the pursuer up to the date of the action might be taken at £1017]—Of the sum which the jury found as damages there is left to be accounted for £3000. This is an exceptionally large sum. I do not think that I should have myself given so much by £1000. But I cannot say that it is so extravagant that no reasonable jury would repeat it, or that the Court cannot find any reasonable proportion between the amount awarded and the loss sustained. I think that the jury had a very difficult task to perform. They had to consider what would be due in event of recovery, what in the event of non-recovery, and then to strike a mean between these two on weighing the probability of one or other of these events. I do not mean to say that they actually went through these three mental operations. But when the question is looked at as we have to look at it, it is really that mean which the jury had to fix. Now, their difficulty was threefold. First, there was a certainty that the pursuer had endured much, and there was the uncertainty whether he might not have to endure more and longer, and particularly to endure the hard fate to an active man of finding himself reduced from activity to decrepitude. Second, there was the problem of the pursuer's recovery, and of the degree of his recovery, both uncertain, however hopeful the most skilled opinions might be, and the bearing of this problem upon the pursuer's patrimonial interests; and, third, there was the peculiarity of the pursuer's occupation. He was involved in the lease of a farm, which he could not get rid of except by the grace of the proprietor, and which, if he had to get rid of it, would leave him without means of livelihood, for it was being carried on on borrowed capital. He was under obligation for a rent of £565 a year, which is no light matter even for a farmer in full vigour, and able to attend to everything himself. While there was evidence, already alluded to, which the jury might fairly accept, that the pursuer was making a fair return off his farm, the continuance of that rate of profit clearly depended upon his substantial recovery. Whereas, if he became entirely incapacitated, the loss would conceivably be more disastrous than can be measured by loss of profit. There is, then, in the present case so much of contingency in the question which the jury had to face, that, a substantial sum being justified, I do not think that it would be in accordance with the practice of the Court to disturb the award of the jury in a matter which is peculiarly their function, except on a very clear manifestation of extravagance, leading to the conclusion that they were guided not by consideration of facts but by sentiment. Such manifestation I cannot

Mar. 12, 1913. say that I have found here after the best consideration I can give to the evidence. I agree with the view expressed by Lord Shand in Young v. Thoms v. Caledonian Railway Co. Glasgow Tramway Company,¹ that the way in which compensation should be estimated is by the jury taking into their consideration the whole circumstances of the case. The circumstances which they had here to consider were complex, and although they have given as much as £1000 more than I would have given myself, I cannot confidently say that my verdict would meet precisely the justice of the case, and that theirs is therefore unreasonable, far less extravagant.

I therefore agree with your Lordship that the rule should be discharged.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I confess that when I heard the award at the trial the impression I formed at the time was that it was too large, and indeed was so excessive that it would have to be reviewed. So far as the inclination of my own mind was concerned, that impression was not removed by the speeches we heard upon the rule; but in view of the opinions that your Lordships, coming with fresh minds to the consideration of the whole circumstances, have both expressed, I do not feel justified in pressing my own inclination to a dissent. I only add one word—that my difficulties arise entirely upon the question of figures. I myself think not only that the jury was entitled to take the very gravest view of the ultimate results of this accident, but I can go further and say that, if I myself had been a jurymen, that is the view I would have taken. Upon the actual amount of money awarded, however, my own impression was that it was too large.

We shall discharge the rule and apply the verdict.

THE COURT discharged the rule.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 110. THE LOCHGELLY IRON AND COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—
Macmillan, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Mar. 18, 1913. WILLIAM CRAWFORD (Surveyor of Taxes), Respondent.—
Sol.-Gen. Anderson—J. A. T. Robertson.

Lochgelly
Iron and Coal
Co., Limited,
v. Inland
Revenue.

Revenue—Income-tax—Profits of trade—Deductions—Money wholly expended for purpose of trade—Levy paid to Coalowners' Association and expended by it in members' interests—Deduction of levy by individual member of association—Conciliation Board expenses—Subscription to Mining Association of Great Britain—Expense of experiments—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule (D), First Case, First Rule applying to First and Second Cases.

The funds of the Fife and Clackmannan Coalowners' Association were derived from voluntary subscriptions or "levies," collected by the association from its individual members, and were expended, inter alia, on the following objects, viz. :—(1) Expenses of the Conciliation Board, (2) Subscriptions to the Mining Association of Great Britain, and (3) Experiments on the explosive properties of coal dust made at the request of the Government.

Held that an individual member of the Association in stating the profits of his business for the purpose of income-tax, was entitled to Mar. 18, 1913. deduct that proportion of the levy paid by him to the association, which effected to the first of the above objects, but not the proportions thereof effecting to the second or third, in respect that a payment towards the first of these objects was, whereas a payment to either of the latter was not, one which, had it been made by the individual member directly, could have properly been deducted by him as money wholly expended for the purpose of his trade.

¹ 10 R., at p. 244.

ON 23rd July 1912 a case was stated by the Income-Tax Commissioners for the opinion of the Court on an appeal by the Lochgelly Iron and Coal Company, Limited, under the Taxes Management Act, 1880, against William Crawford, Surveyor of Taxes, Fife. 1st Division.
Exchequer
Cause.

The case stated that the appellants appealed against an assessment for the year 1912 made upon them under the statutory provisions noted below,* in respect of the profits of their concern, and proceeded :—

“The only point in dispute is as to the admissibility or non-admissibility of the deduction—for income-tax purposes—of the following sums which have been debited in the profit and loss accounts of the appellants in respect of their contributions in the form of levies to the Fife and Clackmannan Coalowners’ Association of which they are members :—

“Year ended 31st May 1906,	. . .	£22.
” ” 1907,	. . .	£74.
” ” 1908,	. . .	£59.
” ” 1909,	. . .	£74.
” ” 1910,	. . .	£720.

“ . . . The following facts were admitted or proved :—(1) The Fife and Clackmannan Coalowners’ Association (hereinafter called the association) consists of thirteen collieries in Fife and Clackmannan. (2) During the five years entering into the average on which the assessment under appeal was based, the association, which was formed many years ago with the object—inter alia—of discussing methods and arriving at conclusions tending to the more economical working of the whole of the collieries concerned, was purely mutual,

* Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 60, Schedule A, No. III., Rule 2, and sec. 100, Schedule D, as amended by Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), and the Revenue Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 8.

The Income-Tax Act, 1842, enacts :—Sec. 100. “The duties hereby granted contained in the following Schedule marked (D) shall be assessed and charged under the following rules . . .

“Schedule (D).

“First Case.—Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other Schedule to this Act . . .

“Second Case.—

“Rules applying to both the preceding cases :—First. In estimating the balance of profits or gains to be charged according to either of the first or second cases no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains for any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly or exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern. . . .”

Mar. 18, 1913.

Lochgelly
Iron and Coal
Co., Limited,
v. Inland
Revenue.

voluntary, and informal, possessing no rules, regulations, or constitution of any kind, and had no legal power to recover payment of any levy from its members. The appellants along with the other members of the association have now formally adopted certain rules and regulations. These are set forth in a deed of agreement which became operative as from 1st January 1912, and from which it appears that the objects of the association now are to provide mutual protection to its members in matters affecting their general interests, and to indemnify members for loss of output in cases of a strike or restriction of output on the part of the workmen. . . . (3) Meetings of the association have been held from time to time, at which all proposed levies from its members, and the manner in which such levies should be expended, were discussed and agreed to. (4) The appellants produced . . . abstracts of income and expenditure of the association covering the whole of the five years, on the average of which the assessment on the appellants was based, viz.":—from May 1905 to December 1910. These abstracts contained the items of expenditure referred to in article 5, infra. "During the above periods the income of the association consisted almost entirely of the proceeds of the levies made on its members, and the accounts show the precise manner in which the proceeds of the levies were expended. (5) The £59 debited in the appellants' accounts for the year ended 31st May 1908, already referred to, represented their share of a special levy calculated at the rate of £60 per million tons of output, for the purpose of experimenting at the request of His Majesty's Government in coal dust, with a view to preventing, so far as possible, explosions in mines. Of the levy of £720 debited in the accounts for the year ended 31st May 1910, £435 thereof related to a special levy of one-tenth of a penny per ton of 1908 output levied on the appellants in common with the whole of the collieries in Scotland . . . The total levy so raised was paid over to the treasurer of the Scottish Coal Trade Association (formed for this purpose only), and applied to fighting before the Railway and Canal Commission, on behalf of all the collieries concerned, the principal Scottish railways in connection with a dispute re demurrage and siding rents. A portion of the levies was expended in subscriptions to the Mining Association of Great Britain, in meeting Conciliation Board (Scotland) expenses, and in installing a central rescue station consequent on the passing of the Mines Accidents (Rescue and Aid) Act, 1910."

The case then proceeded to give a statement of the contentions which were made for the parties before the Income-tax Commissioners at a meeting on 16th January 1912. The question which was debated at this meeting was whether the whole of the contributions, in the form of levies, paid by the appellants to the Fife and Clackmannan Coalowners' Association, were sums laid out exclusively for the purposes of trade, and whether, as such, they were properly allowable as deductions in arriving at profits assessable under the Income-Tax Acts. The undernoted authorities were referred to.¹

The Commissioners, on consideration of the facts and arguments submitted to them, were of opinion that the contributions (i.e., levies)

¹ For the appellants.—Rhymney Iron Co., Limited, v. Fowler, [1896] 2 Q. B. 79; Inland Revenue v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited, (1906) 8 F. 1129; Guest, Keen, & Nettlefolds, Limited, v. Fowler, [1910] 1 K. B. 713. For the respondent.—Strong & Co. v. Woodfield, [1906] A. C. 448.

in question were not admissible deductions under the Income-Tax Acts in arriving at the profits liable to income-tax. Mar. 18, 1913.

Lochgelly
Iron and Coal
Co., Limited,
v. Inland
Revenue.

Counsel were first heard upon the appeal before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Cullen) on 30th October 1912, when it was argued for the appellants;—The test to be applied in order to discover whether an item of expenditure did or did not form a proper subject for deduction was whether the expenditure was an outlay made in order to earn profits or was an application of profits already earned.¹ Where, as here, a member of an association sought to deduct the amount of contributions levied upon him by the association for the purpose of meeting its expenditure, the question was whether the expenditure of the association was of such a character that, if it had been incurred by an individual, it would have formed, in his case, a proper deduction, judged by the above test. If the expenditure of the association satisfied this test, then the proportion of the association's expenditure levied upon the individual member formed a good deduction in his individual case.² It might be that part only of the association's expenditure satisfied the test, in which case a proportionate part of the levy paid by the member would be a proper deduction.

Counsel for the appellants was proceeding to analyse the accounts of the association with a view to showing that, on the above principles, the levies made by the association on the appellants formed good deductions in arriving at the appellants' income for the purpose of income-tax, when the Court, having expressed their agreement with these principles, and having ascertained that they were not to be disputed by counsel for the respondent, suggested that the case should be continued in order that the parties might ascertain to what extent they could agree as to which of the items of expenditure of the Coalowners' Association were such as would have formed proper deductions in the case of an individual trader.

The parties thereafter lodged a statement showing:—(1) Items in the accounts of the Coalowners' Association which, they had agreed, formed admissible deductions; (2) items which the appellants had waived their claim to deduct; (3) an item to which the respondent waived his objection to the appellants' claim to deduct; and (4) items which the respondent held to be non-admissible deductions. The latter items were described as (a) "Conciliation Board expenses," and (b) "Subscriptions to the Mining Association of Great Britain." Appended to the statement was a note to the effect that "respondent also holds that the levy of £59, debited in appellants' accounts for the year ended May 1908, for the purpose of experimenting in coal dust at the request of the Government, is not an admissible deduction."

Counsel were heard upon the appeal and statement on 18th March 1913 before the same Court.

Argued for the appellants;—The sums expended by the Association on the items still in dispute were outlays made in order that the individual members might earn additional profits according to the test laid down in Inland Revenue v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited.³ The

¹ Inland Revenue v. Stewarts & Lloyds, Limited, 8 F. 1129, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 1134.

² Guest, Keen, & Nettlefolds, Limited, v. Fowler, [1910] 1 K. B. 713, per Bray, J., at p. 723.

³ 8 F. 1129.

Mar. 18, 1913. Conciliation Board was designed to prevent the losses which would arise from trade disputes. The Mining Association of Great Britain was an association of business men and was designed to further the interests of coalowners in the conduct of their business. The experiments with coal dust were made with a view to increasing the safety with which the business of mining might be conducted, and were therefore made with a view to perfecting the profit-earning machine.

Lochgelly
Iron and Coal
Co., Limited,
v. Inland
Revenue.

Counsel for the respondent was called upon to reply only upon the item of Conciliation Board expenses, and argued that the effect of the operations of the Board upon the earning of profits by individual members of the association was too remote to justify a deduction of the appellants' levy effeiring to this item of expenditure.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—This special case raises the question of certain deductions claimed by the Lochgelly Iron Company which were not allowed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. These were deductions of levies made by and paid to the Fife and Clackmannan Coalowners' Association. When the case was before your Lordships on the last occasion it became evident that it did not really contain the materials for the proper determination of the questions raised, because the levy of the Coalowners' Association was made in the form of a slump sum, and that sum was, with other sums received by the Coalowners' Association, applied to several separate purposes, and it became apparent that some of these purposes might involve amounts which, if charged in the account of the individual member, would be proper deductions, as being expenses undertaken with a view to earning profits, whereas others might not. Accordingly the case was continued. The parties have met together and arranged the matter in obviously the most reasonable spirit. The result is that your Lordships really have only three very small questions to determine; upon the others the parties have agreed. The first of these questions is whether payments to the Conciliation Board expenses are a good deduction. I am of opinion that they are. The Conciliation Board is a piece of machinery by which disputes between the workmen and the employer may be settled, and by that means expenses kept down and more profits earned, and although in any one particular year there may be no work for the Conciliation Board to do, yet it is a piece of machinery which the coalowners are entitled to keep up—just as one who was entitled to employ a legal secretary might properly charge the expenses of this employment even in a year in which he was fortunate enough to have no litigation or other legal expenses.

The next question concerns a subscription to the Mining Association of Great Britain. That, I think, is an expense which cannot be deducted, because the Mining Association is an association which keeps a watchful eye on mining affairs all over the country, no doubt to the benefit of mining interests generally, but without that character of particular service which I think is prominent in a Conciliation Board.

The third question concerns an item of £59 which was expended in experiments in coal dust. It is explained that the experiments were made on the explosive properties of coal dust at the instigation of the Home

¹ Reference was made to Strong & Co., Limited, v. Woodfield, [1906] A. C. 448.

Secretary, who wished certain experiments made before embarking on new legislation. It was a voluntary and very proper act of the Company to help him in the matter, but not an expense they undertook for the purpose of earning more profit in that or in any other year. It was paid out of profits, and not with a view of earning profits.

That is my view on these three items. The precise way in which the matter will be carried out in the answer we give in the case will depend on the proportions which the admitted items bear to the admitted expenditure, and no doubt will be worked out by the parties, who have shown themselves so reasonable in the matter.

Lochgelly
Iron and Coal
Co., Limited,
v. Inland
Revenue.
Ld. President.

LORD JOHNSTON and LORD CULLEN concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Allowed as a deduction in ascertaining the appellants' profits, in addition to the proportions of the appellants' contributions to the Fife and Clackmannan Coalowners' Association which effeired to the items admitted in the said print of documents to be admissible as deductions, that proportion of the appellants' contributions to the said Association which effeired to the Conciliation Board expenses: Refused the appellants' claim to deduct the proportion of their contributions to the said Association effeiring to the subscriptions to the Mining Association of Great Britain and to the expenses connected with experimenting in coal dust."

WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—SIR PHILIP J. HAMILTON GRIERSON, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Agents.

- | | |
|--|----------------------------|
| MRS MATILDA FERGUSON STIVEN OR JACKS AND OTHERS (William Jacks's Trustees), First Parties.— Hon. W. Watson. | No. 111. |
| MRS MATILDA FERGUSON STIVEN OR JACKS, Second Party.— C. H. Brown. | Mar. 18, 1913. |
| MRS ELIZABETH JONES OR JACKS AND OTHERS, Third Parties.— C. H. Brown. | Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks. |
| THE UNIVERSITY COURT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW, Fourth Parties.— Ramsay. | |
| WILLIAM WRIGHT AND OTHERS, Fifth Parties.— D. P. Fleming. | |
| RICHARD JACKS AND OTHERS, Sixth Parties.— D. Anderson. | |

Succession—Election—Equitable compensation—Provision "in full of" jus relictae—Claim for jus relictae—Right of widow to revert to testamentary provisions on amount of jus relictae being restored to estate.

By a general settlement a husband made certain provisions for his wife which he declared should be "in full of all her claims of terce, jus relictae, and others legally competent to her" against his estate, but there was no declaration that the provisions should be forfeited if she claimed her legal rights.

Question whether her election not to accept the provisions of the settlement in her favour, but to claim her legal rights, resulted in her forfeiting her testamentary provisions finally, or merely gave rise to a claim of equitable compensation to the estate.

Macfarlane's Trustees v. Oliver, (1882) 9 R. 1138, and Gray's Trustees v. Gray, 1907 S. C. 54 discussed, and the latter doubted.

Mar. 18, 1913. Succession—Election—Effect of election—Approbate and Reprobate—Provision of liferent to widow, with power to accelerate payment of legacies—Jus relictæ claimed and liferent surrendered—Right thereafter to exercise power of accelerating.

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

Succession—Vesting—Legacy—Legacies conditional and unconditional payable on death of liferentrix—Surrender of liferent—Acceleration of payment.

A testator in his settlement directed his trustees to pay to his widow the income of the residue of his estate in full of her legal rights, but with power to her "to consent to payment of all or one or more of the legacies" thereafter bequeathed, ". . . so as to admit of payment thereof during her life." He then directed the payment of a number of legacies "upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her liferent over any part thereof so as to admit of payment, then for payment of such part on such surrender." Some of the legacies were unconditional, others were bequeathed subject to a clause of survivorship and conditions in favour of the issue of the legatees. He also directed that any surplus of residue after payment of legacies should be at the disposal of the trustees to apply in augmenting all or any of the legacies, or in helping institutions akin to those to which legacies had been given.

After the husband's death the widow elected not to accept the provisions of the settlement in her favour, and claimed her legal rights, and thereafter executed a formal deed in which she confirmed this election and surrendered her whole rights under the settlement, and consented, so far as she competently could in exercise of the power conferred upon her in the settlement, to the immediate payment of the whole of the legacies.

Held (1) that the widow, having surrendered the whole of the provisions of the settlement in her favour, was debarred from exercising the power of consent; (2) that the unconditional legacies having vested indefeasibly at the death of the testator, were, owing to the surrender of the liferent, payable immediately, provided the trustees had sufficient funds to pay all the other legacies; (3) that the contingent legacies, in which vesting was postponed until the death of the widow, were not payable until that event, the period of vesting being in no way accelerated by the surrender of the liferent; diss. Lord Johnston, who was of opinion that the whole of the legacies were immediately payable, vesting having taken place in all simultaneously either at the death of the testator, or, at latest, on the surrender of the liferent by the widow.

Succession—Legacy—Condition—Purification—Undertaking to satisfy condition.

A testator bequeathed the liferent of the residue of his estate to his widow, and directed the payment of certain legacies on his death. He further provided that his widow might consent to the payment of any or all of the legacies during her life, and that, should she surrender her liferent, his trustees might make payment of the legacies, in whole or in part, on such surrender. One of the legacies was to the University of Glasgow, for the endowment of a chair, and was made subject to the declaration that "should either I or my wife endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University before the death of the survivor, then this bequest shall fall." The testator's widow surrendered the liferent and other provisions of the settlement, elected to take her legal rights, and executed a formal deed in which she confirmed this election and surrender, and consented, so far as she competently could, to the immediate payment of the whole legacies, and further bound herself "not to endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University now or at any time hereafter." Held that the condition attached to the legacy had not been satisfied, and that payment thereof could not be made until after the death of the widow.

Mar. 18, 1913.
Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

ON 31st January 1913 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court as to the effect of certain testamentary provisions of the late William Jacks. 1st DIVISION.

Mr Jacks died on 9th August 1907, survived by his widow, Mrs Matilda Ferguson Stiven or Jacks, the second party to the case. There were no children of the marriage. Mr Jacks left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 18th December 1905, with certain addenda and codicils thereto, by which he directed his trustees, in the first place, to pay debts, fulfil any unimplemented marriage-contract provisions, and pay trust expenses. In the second place, to pay to his wife (1) £1500, free of duty, for mournings for herself and servants, and for household purposes; and (2) £1000 free of duty for purchasing mournings for relations. In the third place, to pay to his wife a legacy of £10,000, free of duty, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas following his death. In the fourth place, to pay, free of duty, to his testamentary trustees who should accept and act, £1000 equally among them. In the fifth place, to give, free of duty, small mementoes to personal friends therein named, or to be afterwards named in any memorandum he might leave.

The settlement proceeded:—" In the sixth place, for payment to my said wife of the free annual interest or income of the residue of my estate, payable said income half-yearly or in the option of my trustees, as received; but with power nevertheless to her to consent to payment of all or one or more of the legacies hereinafter bequeathed, or part of all or one or more of them, so as to admit of payment thereof during her life, and subject to or free of duty; and, in the last place, for payment of the several following bequests upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her liferent over any part thereof to admit of payment, then for payment of such part upon such surrender, viz.:—(first) to Elizabeth Jones or Jacks, widow of my brother, Thomas Jacks, if she has not married again, a legacy of Seven hundred and fifty pounds; (second) to the children of my brother, the late Richard Jacks, the following legacies, viz.:—[here followed a list of these legacies]; (third) to the children of my sister Isabella the following legacies, viz.:—[here followed a list of these legacies]; Declaring that in the event of any of my said nephews and nieces, children of my brother Richard and sister Isabella, dying before the date of vesting leaving issue then surviving, such issue shall be entitled to the legacy which their parent would have taken on survivorship; . . . (sixteenth) to the University Court of the University of Glasgow, to endow a Chair of Modern Languages, to be called the 'Chair of William Jacks,' principally for commercial education as distinguished from classic, a legacy of twenty thousand pounds, as also such portions of my library (foreign and other books) as my trustees may consider appropriate and likely to prove useful in connection with that endowment: Declaring that should either I or my wife endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University before the death of the survivor, then this bequest shall fall. . . . Declaring that while all bequests in favour of my said wife and my trustees shall, in any event, be free of duty as aforesaid, the duty on the other bequests (except any duty paid on a surrender by my wife as aforesaid) shall be paid by my trustees out of residue, only if the residue be sufficient to pay the whole duty thereon: Declaring further that should the residue be insufficient to pay in full the legacies unpaid at the death of my wife, all such legacies shall be rateably reduced; as also that should there be a surplus of residue, such surplus shall be at the absolute disposal of my trustees, original and assumed, who may apply it as they think fit in augmenting all or any of the bequests herein to persons, institutions, or associations, or in helping kindred institutions or associations in Glasgow or elsewhere just as I myself might have done if in life; which provisions in favour of my said wife shall be in full to her of all claims of terce, jus relictæ, and others legally competent to her against my estate upon my decease. . . ."

Mar. 18, 1913.

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

Under the remaining heads of the last purpose the testator directed the payment of a large number of legacies to individuals and to public or charitable associations or institutions, for the most part unconditionally or subject to conditions which had been purified before his death, and without any substitution or destination-over in the case of failure of the legatees named.*

The case stated:—

"4. By the testator's marriage-contract with the second party,

* The following legacies are referred to more particularly in the opinions of the Judges, infra:—" (Fifth) to my niece, Thomasina Jacks Armstrong or Wilson, wife of the said Henry Arnold Wilson, whom failing her issue a legacy of Eighteen thousand five hundred pounds; (sixth) to the said Henry Arnold Wilson a legacy of One thousand pounds; (seventh) to my sister-in-law, Mrs Emily Stiven or Barrie, wife of the said Andrew David Barrie (first) a legacy of One thousand pounds, and (second) an amount equivalent to any estate, heritable or moveable, which may be bequeathed to me by my said wife, should she predecease me; (eighth) to the children of the said Emily Stiven or Barrie the following legacies, viz.:—[Here followed a list of these legacies]; . . . (tenth) to Mrs Margaret Anderson or Lee, residing in Edinburgh, in liferent till her son William Jacks Lee attains the age of twenty-one years, and then to him absolutely a legacy of Three hundred pounds, which legacy shall be held by my trustees for said purpose, but providing that if the said William Jacks Lee should die before attaining said age survived by his mother she shall at his death become absolutely entitled to said legacy, but should he be the survivor and not reach said age, the capital at his death shall revert into residue, the income being in the interim applied for his benefit; (eleventh) to Cecilia Jameson, my wife's maid, a legacy of One thousand five hundred pounds; . . . (fifteenth) to each of my domestic servants at the date of my death (except the said Cecilia Jameson), including outdoor servants, and to each of the clerks of my firm at the date of my death for every complete year they have been employed by me or my firm, Twenty pounds, but not more than Two hundred and fifty pounds to any one, and declaring that the total of these legacies is restricted to Five thousand pounds, and that if at the above rate of Twenty pounds for each year with said maximum that sum be exceeded all shall be rateably reduced; . . . (seventeenth) to the following Institutions, viz.:—The Royal Hospital for Sick Children, Glasgow, a legacy of One thousand five hundred pounds . . . (twenty-first) to the minister of the Established Church of Scotland, Callander, if I am a member of his Church at the date of my death, or to the minister of such other Church as I am a member of at the time of my death, a legacy of Two hundred and fifty pounds, and to J. Wilson Crawford, Pastor of the Congregational Church, Dumbarton, a legacy of Two hundred and fifty pounds . . ."

which is dated 19th October, and registered in the Books of Council and Session 7th November, both in the year 1878, an immediate life-rent of a dwelling-house (7 Fitzroy Place, Glasgow), and of the furniture therein was conferred on the second party, and it was provided that in the event of her surviving her husband, the furniture was to become her absolute property. The second party did not, by the marriage-contract, expressly discharge any of her legal rights, but by accepting the said life-rent of house and furniture, her claim for terce was excluded by virtue of the Act 1681, c. 10.

Mar. 18, 1913.
Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

"5. By the trust-disposition and settlement the provisions in favour of the second party were declared to be in full to her of all claims of terce, jus relictæ, and others legally competent to her against the testator's estate upon his decease. By letter dated 16th December 1907, addressed to the first parties, the second party claimed her legal rights other than terce, and large payments have been made by them to her to account of these claims.

"6. By deed of ratification, surrender, and consent, dated the 27th day of January 1913, which is printed in the appendix hereto, and held to form part of this case, the second party has ratified her election of her legal rights and irrevocably surrendered the whole life-rent and other provisions conferred upon her by the said trust-disposition and settlement. Said deed further provides:—'And I consent (so far as I competently can) in exercise of the power of anticipation conferred on me in the sixth place in said trust-disposition and settlement, and every other power enabling me, to payment being forthwith made (free of or subject to duty as the trust funds permit) by said trustees of the whole legacies bequeathed in the last place under the purposes of said trust-disposition and settlement as amended by said codicils: Further and as regards said legacy to the University Court of the University of Glasgow, I hereby undertake, irrevocably and absolutely, not to endow any Chair in the Glasgow or other University now or at any time hereafter.'

"7. The first parties have paid the trustor's debts and paid or distributed the legacies bequeathed under the fourth and fifth purposes of the trust-disposition and settlement, and are now in a position to pay the balance of the second party's claims. They have moreover sufficient trust funds now available to pay, with or without duty, the legacies bequeathed in the last place, which amount in all to the sum of £76,250, but questions have arisen as to whether they can competently pay all or any of said legacies now or during the lifetime of the second party, and, if so, what interest, if any, falls to be paid thereon.

After the hearing the parties lodged a minute, in which it was stated:—"(1) That the whole trust fund held by the first parties as at 13th March 1913 was of the value of £79,276, 11s. 8d. or thereby, the same being subject to the expenses of the trust and of realisation and any increase or diminution of value on realisation; (2) that the amount of the legacy-duty still unpaid may be taken at £5000; (3) that the total amount of the whole legacies bequeathed in the last purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement is £76,250, and that interest thereon at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum from 27th January 1913 (the date of the deed of ratification, surrender, and consent by the second party) up to 15th March 1913 amounts to £343, 13s."

The parties to the case were—(first) Mr Jacks's testamentary

Mar. 18, 1913.
Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

trustees ; (second) Mrs Jacks, the testator's widow ; (third) the legatees named in the first, second, third, and fifth heads of the last purpose, being Mrs Elizabeth Jones or Jacks, whose legacy was subject to a condition which had not been purified at the death of the testator, and the children of his brother Robert and sister Isabella, to whose issue there was a destination-over in the case of failure of the parent before the date of vesting ; (fourth) the University of Glasgow ; (fifth) the whole remaining or unconditional legatees ; and (sixth) the issue of the children of the testator's brother Robert and sister Isabella.

The first parties contended :—"That by electing to take her legal rights, the second party is not in a position to exercise the power conferred on her by the sixth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement to consent to payment during her lifetime of any of the legacies thereafter bequeathed ; that, in the absence of such power, all said legacies are payable rateably and contemporaneously, and the second party's election to take her legal rights cannot accelerate the date of payment of any of said legacies, in particular as regards the legacies bequeathed in the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 5th, and 16th places of the last purpose, these legacies being subject to conditions which fall to be determined at the date of the second party's death, the deed of ratification, surrender, and consent by the second party being invalid and ineffective in so far as the second party purports to debar herself from endowing a university chair. In the event of its being held that any of the legacies are now payable, the first parties maintain that no interest is due thereon, or, in any event, that such interest should not exceed the rate earned by the general trust-estate."

The second party and the third parties contended :—"That, the second party having surrendered her right to any part of the liferent of the estate, the legacies bequeathed to the third parties by the last purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement fall to be paid now, with interest from the date of said deed of ratification, surrender, and consent. Alternatively, the second and third parties maintain that by electing to take her jus relictæ the second party has not forfeited her right to exercise the power conferred on her by the sixth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement to consent to payment during her life of any of the legacies thereafter bequeathed, and, the second party having exercised her said right, the legacies bequeathed to the third parties by the last purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement fall to be paid immediately, with interest as aforesaid. They further maintain that, apart from the exercise of said power, the legacies to the third parties are in the circumstances payable now, with interest as aforesaid."

The fourth and fifth parties' contentions were similar to those of the second and third parties, the fourth party further contending :—"That the second party has, by the said deed of ratification, surrender, and consent, validly and irrevocably debarred herself from endowing now or at any time hereafter any chair in the Glasgow or other university."

At the hearing it was stated that the age of the second party was about 70.

The questions of law were :—" (1) Do all or any of the legacies bequeathed in the last purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement as amended by said codicils fall to be paid now by the first parties, and if so, which of them ? or (2) Is payment of all or any of said legacies postponed until the death of the second party, and if so, which of them? (3) In the event of the first question being answered Mar. 18, 1913. in the affirmative, (a) does interest on said legacies fall to be paid out of the estate from the date of the deed of ratification, surrender, and consent, and if so, (b) at what rate?" Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

The case was heard before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 13th March 1913.

Argued for the second and third parties;—The first parties were now entitled and bound to pay to the third parties the legacies bequeathed to them. The last purpose of the settlement expressly provided that this should be done in the event which had happened, viz., the surrender of her liferent by the widow. This was purely a question of construction of the settlement; it was clearly the intention of the testator that payment should be made on the surrender of the liferent, and this intention should receive effect unless there was anything in the settlement that necessitated further postponement.¹ The sole purpose of postponing the period of payment was to protect the liferent; that purpose having now lapsed there was no obstacle to immediate division of the estate in terms of the testator's directions.² This argument was quite consistent with the decisions in the cases of *Elder's Trustees*³ and Hughes v. Edwardes,⁴ for the intention that payment should be postponed was inferred, in the former case from the express direction to the trustees to hold until the death of the liferenter, and in the latter from the fact that there still remained another alimentary life interest to protect. Further, the widow had not forfeited the right to exercise the power conferred upon her in the sixth purpose, and had validly exercised that power. There was no declaration that she should forfeit her rights under the settlement if she elected to claim her legal rights. The only provision in this respect was that the conventional provisions should be in full of her legal rights. In these circumstances the effect of the widow's election was not to forfeit all her rights under the settlement, but only to bar her from enjoying the conventional provisions until equitable compensation was made to the estate for the funds of which it had been depleted.⁵ The widow had therefore not become a stranger to the trust to the effect of barring her from exercising this power. As to the rate of interest payable on the legacies, *Inglis's Trustees v. Breen*⁶ was referred to.

Argued for the fourth parties;—These parties adopted the argument for the third parties, and further argued that the declaration attached to the legacy bequeathed to the University of Glasgow must be read out of the settlement as being inconsistent with its general scheme, viz., that the whole of the legacies might be paid during the life of the widow, if the trustees obtained the necessary funds for that purpose through the surrender of the liferent. In any case the

¹ Muirhead v. Muirhead, (1890) 17 R. (H. L.) 45, per Lord Watson, at p. 50.

² Alexander's Trustees, (1870) 8 Macph. 414; Lucas's Trustees v. Trustees and Patrons of Lucas Trust, (1881) 8 R. 502.

³ Elder's Trustees v. Treasurer of the Free Church of Scotland, (1881) 8 R. 593.

⁴ (1892) 19 R. (H. L.) 33.

⁵ Macfarlane's Trustees v. Oliver, (1882) 9 R. 1138; Gray's Trustees v. Gray, 1907 S. C. 54.

⁶ (1891) 18 R. 487.

Mar. 18, 1913. undertaking not to endow any other chair granted by the widow in the deed of surrender must be taken to purify the condition attached to this legacy.

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

Argued for the fifth parties;—These parties had that vested indefeasible interest in their legacies which entitled them to immediate payment.

Argued for the sixth parties;—Granted that the period had arrived at which the unconditional legacies had vested and were payable, this was not the case with regard to those bequeathed to the children of Richard and Isabella. It was clearly the intention that the period of vesting of these legacies should not be until the death of the widow. There were no words of gift beyond the direction to pay at that date, and the conditional institution of the contingent legatees must be referred thereto.¹ The widow had no power to accelerate the date of vesting; to allow her to do so would be to allow her to reform the settlement. The only power conferred upon her was, in certain circumstances, to accelerate payment, and this power could only be exercised with regard to legacies which had already vested and in which the beneficiaries had an indefeasible interest.² The opportunity for equitable compensation could not arise if the argument for the third parties were sound, for in that case the estate would fall to be immediately wound up. In any case this was not a practical consideration in the present case, for it was impossible, in view of the age of the widow, that the trust could remain in being long enough to allow the estate to be fully compensated.

Counsel for the first parties referred to the undernoted authority³ upon the question whether they were bound or entitled to pay any of the legacies until they had in their hands sufficient funds to pay the whole legacies in full.

At advising on 18th March 1913,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case arises from the action of the widow, who has declined to accept certain testamentary provisions made for her by her husband in full of all her claims for terce, jus relicte, and others legally competent to her against his estate, and it regards the legal consequence of her rejection of the conditions of the will, and of her successful claim to have her legal rights.

The terms of the settlement are, so far as regards this question, to be found in the sixth purpose of the trust-deed, by which the trustees are directed to hold in trust "for payment to my said wife of the free annual interest or income of the residue of my estate, payable said income half-yearly or, in the option of my trustees, as received; but with power nevertheless to her to consent to payment of all or one or more of the legacies hereinafter bequeathed, or part of all or one or more of them, so as to admit of payment thereof during her life and subject to or free of duty; and, in the last place, for payment of the several following bequests upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her liferent over any part thereof to admit of payment, then for payment of such part upon such surrender." And then there follow a number of special legacies in favour of different persons, of which, without examining them in detail in the meantime, I shall only say that some of them are plainly absolute legacies to the legatees named, without any substitution or destination-over of any kind; and others are legacies to a certain class of persons subject to a clause of survivorship and to conditions in favour of the issue of such persons.

¹ Bryson's Trustees v. Clark, (1880) 8 R. 142.

² Muirhead's Trustees v. Muirhead, 17 R. (H. L.) 45, per Lord Watson, at p. 50.

³ Haldane's Trustees v. Haldane, (1895) 23 R. 276.

Upon the widow, Mrs Jacks, claiming her jus relictæ, she executed a certain deed of ratification, surrender, and consent by which she ratified her election of her legal rights and irrevocably surrendered the whole life-rent and other provisions conferred upon her by the trust-disposition and settlement, and further purported to consent, so far as she competently could, "in the exercise of the power of anticipation conferred on me in the sixth place in said trust-disposition and settlement and every other power enabling me, to payment being made forthwith (free of or subject to duty as the trust funds permit) by said trustees of the whole legacies bequeathed in the last place under the purposes of said trust-disposition and settlement."

The question is whether, by reason of the lady's surrender of her life-rent, with or without the special consent which she has given in making that surrender to the anticipation of payment, the legatees are entitled to immediate payment during her life, notwithstanding that, in terms of the will, the legacies are to be paid only on her death.

It appears to me that that depends entirely upon the legal effect of the lady's claim to take her legal rights and to reject the settlement. The bequests in her favour are given under the express condition that they are to be taken in full of her jus relictæ and all other legal rights. She has rejected the condition, and therefore she has rejected the bequest. She cannot claim under the deed to take a benefit given to her under an express condition so long as she refuses to comply with the condition upon which it was given. It would follow that we are to consider the question of payment solely with reference to the other conditions of the will which regulate vesting and the period of payment, on the footing that the life-rent provided for this lady was as completely and absolutely out of the way as if she had died.

But then it is said that that is not exactly the position, because she has not only surrendered her life-rent in the meantime but she has exercised a power given to her by the will to consent, if she should think fit, to the anticipation of payment of all or any of the legacies. I am of opinion—and I must say without doubt—that the exercise or the existence of that power makes no difference whatever to the question. She is still in the position of having rejected the condition upon which she took benefit under the will. She cannot approbate and reprobate the will, and she cannot say, "I will not take my life-rent myself, but I will authorise you to pay the accruing income, which would have gone to me, for the benefit of any particular persons, or to make over to them the capital upon which such income would have accrued for my benefit if I had chosen to take it." I think she is completely outside the will, and can no more exercise this power than claim payment of the life-rent.

It is said that she is not finally excluded from the benefits of the will,

Mar. 18, 1913. because the only effect of her rejection of the conditions is that the liferent given to her must go to compensate for the amount of money which she has taken away in name of her jus relictæ and that, as soon as that compensation has been completely effected, she may come back again and claim under the will. I do not think it necessary for the purposes of this case to express any definite opinion as to whether she could, in any circumstances, come back and claim benefit under the will upon that ground; and, if it is not necessary, I do not think it is desirable to do so, because the question has not yet arisen, and it will be time enough to decide it when it does arise. But since it has been raised, I venture to express my opinion that, whatever the ultimate decision of it may be, the claim put forward for the widow can find no support whatever in the case which was cited to support it, namely, Macfarlane's Trustees v. Oliver,¹ because the vital point in Macfarlane's Trustees v. Oliver,¹ which was held by the majority of the Court to distinguish the case from that of a forfeiture of a legacy in favour of persons, like a wife or children, who took their legal rights in place of the legacy was this: that there was no express condition in the will that the provision given to a child should be taken in full of legitim or under a condition of any declaration of forfeiture. It was on that ground, and, as I think, on that ground alone, that the majority of the Court held that, in that particular case, a child who had claimed legitim might nevertheless come back and take benefit from the bequests in his favour as soon as the whole legitim which he had taken away had been recouped in the course of the administration of the trust. That is stated, with the greatest clearness, by Lord President Inglis in his opinion, where he says this²: "If a provision is given by will in lieu of legitim or on condition of the legatee renouncing his claim of legitim, of course the condition must receive effect, and the provision cannot be claimed either in whole or in part without a complete surrender of the legitim. But the provision is not affected in the present case by any express condition or any declaration of forfeiture. There is an implied condition arising from the legitim fund being embraced in the settlement, and disposed of to the effect that no one can claim both the provision and the legitim, because that would be to take double payment at the expense of the other legatees." Then his Lordship goes on to say: "The important question is, What is the nature and extent of this implied condition? When a condition is implied in a will, though not expressed, it must be because, without such implication, the will cannot be carried into practical effect according to the mind of the testator. This is the reason why the law implies the condition. But the implication must not be extended beyond the reason for it. The two must be commensurate." And then he goes on to say that that is the foundation of the doctrine of equitable compensation (a doctrine now established in the law of Scotland), which is not merely something short of forfeiture but something entirely different in principle. That was the ground of judgment in Macfarlane's Trustees v. Oliver,¹ and I think it is the ground plainly implied in the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges and expressed in Lord M'Laren's opinion, although it is nowhere expressed so explicitly and so clearly as by the Lord President. I have no doubt that Mar. 18, 1913. the majority of the Judges consulted proceeded upon that ground, that they were not dealing with any expressed condition that a legatee should not take ^{Jacks's Trusts} Jacks's Trusts, legitim, but only with the implied condition which arose from the mere fact ^{Lord Kinneir} Lord Kinneir. of the testator having included his whole estate in his will.

¹ 9 R. 1138.² At p. 1166.

Now, if that were conclusive, I should not see so much difficulty in disposing of the question which I have said has been raised. But then a difference of opinion has certainly been expressed and made the ground of judgment in the case of Gray v. Gray.¹ I do not think the present Court is in a position to overrule or reconsider the unanimous judgment of the Second Division; and therefore I should have thought, if it was necessary to decide the question now, it should be decided by a larger Court. But in the meantime I do not think it is necessary, because assuming, contrary to my own opinion, that this lady has the right to come back, although she has already announced that she has completely surrendered the whole benefits under the will, she has not come back yet; and until the condition upon which it is said she may claim some benefit under the will is purified, she is plainly not in a position to exercise any right or any power given by the will. If, at this moment, she were professing to exercise the power of anticipation given to her, she would, in my opinion, be plainly approbating and reprobating the deed, which I think she cannot do. And I think it is perfectly obvious that she could not claim a right to regulate in any way the disposal of the income which she has refused to accept without contradicting her explicit rejection of the will.

It is admitted for her that she cannot have the income now accrued upon the funds in the hands of the trustees, because she refuses to take her life-rent, preferring to take her legal rights. Well, then, if she cannot take it herself, how is it to be said that she can dispose of it in favour of somebody else? The whole force and effect of this peculiar power given to her by the testator to authorise anticipation arises from the fact that the prejudice which will be caused by anticipation of any payment is a prejudice to the life-renter. It is because it is her money that is in question that she is allowed to consent to payment which releases the whole or part of the capital to other people. If she is entitled, as the argument supposes, to stand by in the meantime until the income of the estate, which would have gone to her if she had taken the life-rent, is accumulated so as to make up for the money she has taken away, she cannot at the same time say, "But, while that money is being accumulated, so as to enable me to plead equitable compensation, you are to hand over the capital so as to prevent any income accruing at all." She cannot reject the life-rent and exercise a power over it which, in effect, is a power to dispose of it for the benefit of other people.

Therefore, it appears to me to be quite clear that, the life-rent being out of the way, the only question is what is the effect of the testator's other directions as to payment of legacies. Now, I think that the general principles upon which that question has to be decided are very clearly settled. What remains of the deed when the life-rent is taken out of the way is a direction to pay upon the death of the life-renter, and it is quite clearly settled in law

¹ 1907 S. C. 54.

Mar. 18, 1913. that, if there be nothing to postpone the direct and absolute payment of a legacy, except a necessity for meeting a life rent or an annuity, there is nothing in that necessity to prevent immediate vesting in the legatee. The effect, therefore, of the bequests, subject to this life rent, in favour of individuals, without any additional institution or destination-over, is to give an absolute right to these individual legatees.

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.
Lord Kinnear.

But then, on the other hand, it is settled equally clearly that, where the vesting of a legacy is dependent on the death of a life renter, the mere surrender of the life rent, so as to withdraw the life renter's claim, will not accelerate vesting, and therefore cannot accelerate payment. The law is very clearly expressed by Lord President Inglis in the case of Bryson's Trustees v. Clark,¹ where he says: "When nothing is expressed in favour of a beneficiary except a direction to trustees to pay to him on the occurrence of a certain event, and not sooner, and failing him, to pay to certain other persons as substitutes or conditional institutes to him, then, if he does not survive the period, he takes no right under the settlement." I have substituted the word "pay" for "convey" in making that citation, because the particular case was concerned with heritable estate and not with money; but that makes no difference in the expression of the principle so far as regards vesting.

Now the result, to my mind, is that, where there is an absolute and indefeasible right vested in a legatee, the disappearance of the life renter will entitle him to claim payment, even although payment is, in words, directed to be made at the life renter's death, because there is no testamentary interest to interfere with his immediate payment; but, on the other hand, where vesting and not mere payment is dependent upon the death of the life renter, nothing that the life renter does in the way of abandoning his or her right can accelerate the period of vesting, because the testator has fixed it finally, and it is not for anybody else to make a new will for him.

I have referred to the case of Bryson,² but then I think the law is just as clearly laid down in the House of Lords by Lord Watson, for he says, in Muirhead v. Muirhead:³ "I see no reason to doubt that, in cases where the final distribution of a trust-estate is directed to be made on the death of an annuitant and it clearly appears that in postponing the time of the division the testator had no other object in view than to secure payment of the annuity, it may be within the power of the Court, on the discharge or renunciation of the annuitant's right to ordain the immediate division. But in order to the due exercise of that power it is, in my opinion, essential that the beneficiaries to whom the trustees are directed to pay or convey shall have a vested indefeasible interest in the provisions." So far, therefore, he described one of the cases which, I think, arises here—the claims of legatees who have an indefeasible vested interest.

But then he goes on to say that, in the particular case under consideration, if the testator's widow had not repudiated the provisions made for her in his settlement, he thought it not doubtful that the vesting of the fee would have been suspended until her decease. And then he says: "There are three considerations the concurrence of which, in my opinion, necessarily leads to Mar. 18, 1913. that conclusion—(1) the bequests to children and their issue are not conceived in the form of a separate gift with a subsequent direction as to the time of payment, but are, for the first time, implied in the direction to pay on their mother's death." I do not think that that, of itself, would be conclusive. It is one of the circumstances that has to be taken into account, and the other two are what are more important to consider; "(2) there is a gift over to the respective issue in the event of any of the testator's children predeceasing that date; and (3) there is a clause of survivorship, which, in the event of any child and his or her issue failing before the widow's death, gives their provisions to the surviving children. . . ." The conditional gift to issue in the event of children dying before payment, and a conditional institution of survivors in the event of some members of a favoured class failing before payment, are, according to this opinion of Lord Watson, conclusive against the notion of immediate vesting during the lifetime of a life-renter or annuitant.

¹ 8 R. 142, at p. 145.

² 8 R. 142.

³ 17 R. (H. L.) 45, at p. 48.

Now I think that in this will we find both classes of legacy as I have already said. I think it is plain enough that those legatees who have an absolute right given to them, without a condition in favour of anybody else, have, in terms of law, an indefeasible interest in their legacies; but then, on the other hand, a gift in such terms as, for example, the gift to his nephews and nieces under this declaration: "That in the event of any of my said nephews and nieces dying before the date of vesting leaving issue then surviving, such issue shall be entitled to the legacy which their parent would have taken upon survivance," appears to me to satisfy exactly the condition laid down by Lord Watson for a suspension of vesting notwithstanding the abandonment or surrender of the life-renter's claim.

It is said that you cannot impute to the testator the intention of making two different periods of vesting, but that he must be supposed to have conceived one uniform scheme of vesting according to which all legacies would vest at the same time and under the same condition. I cannot say that I see any reason in law or in ordinary notions of the purpose and effect of a testament to support that argument. There is no reason why a testator should wish all his legacies to vest at the same time; and accordingly it is perfectly familiar, in very many cases, that testators give some legacies which are to be paid immediately, notwithstanding the subsistence of life-rents, and others, which are not to be paid and not to vest until the life-rents expire, and that for perfectly clear and natural reasons. A testator may give legacies to a class of persons, and that will naturally suggest questions of predecease and survivorship; he may give legacies to his own near relations and his interest in them will extend to their children, and therefore he may think it reasonable and natural to make provisions for the issue of his legatees as well as for the legatees themselves. But there are other cases in which his interest is confined to the particular legatee whom he desires to benefit. In this case, besides bequests to relations, there are bequests to the testator's servants. Well, he wishes to regulate the interests of his near relations; but he takes no concern in the person who may take an interest through the legacy to his servant—his only concern is in the servant himself. I can see no reason why the Court should interpose an artificial period of vest-

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.
Lord Kinnear.

Mar. 18, 1913. ing if we find a clear direction in the will which implies the vesting of one legacy at the death of the testator himself and another at the death of an annuitant or liferenter who should survive. I think that that disposes of the question of immediate payment; but in the answers which we give to the present case it will be necessary to define more particularly than I have done, the particular legacies which fall within the one class, and those which fall within the other.

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.
Lord Kinnear.

But then there is another question, suggested by the third question which is put to us, arising out of a claim for interest from the date of the liferenter's deed of surrender and consent. I do not think it is seriously disputed, I rather understood it was not disputed at all, that if there were money enough and if there were legacies payable now—that is vesting a morte testatoris, and payable as soon as it appeared that the liferent was not to be maintained as the obstacle to immediate payment—then such legacies would be payable with interest from the date specified. But then that raises a question whether such payment can be made without prejudice to other interests, and the trustees have put in a minute which shows that there may be some risk of prejudice to the legatees whose legacies are not to be paid immediately if those who are entitled to immediate payment get both capital and interest now. But there is a different question which suggests itself upon the consideration that no payment can be made before the date of payment specified in the will that will prejudice any interest for which the testator intended to provide, because such payment is not in direct obedience to the testator's directions. An obstacle to payment has been removed, but it still remains to see that his will is carried out as the funds will enable the trustees to carry it out in the interest of all the legatees.

Now if the liferent which the widow has rejected were to be accumulated from this moment, of course it would go to any other legatees whose legacies would be held to cover it; it would go to payment of the special legacies, and in so far as there was anything beyond what was necessary for them, it would go to residuary legatees. And if there were here a bequest of residue to definite persons who had an interest in the whole estate which was not expressly bequeathed by special legacies, we should have to consider whether they were or were not entitled to object to immediate payment to the effect of preventing an accumulation which might ultimately have been for their benefit. But then there are no such legatees in this case. There is a gift of residue to the trustees, by which the testator says that the surplus residue shall be at their absolute disposal, and "that they may apply it as they think fit in augmenting all or any of the bequests herein to persons, institutions, or associations, or in helping kindred institutions or associations in Glasgow," as he might himself have done if in life. There is no definite person who can claim under that, unless and until the trustees have given him or her an interest to make the claim. In the meantime, therefore, the residuary legatees are the trustees; and it is for them to consider whether there is anything in the claim of the legatees who, I think, should be held entitled to immediate payment that will prejudice that, or any other interest which they are bound to protect. I am therefore of opinion that any answer which we may give, which will sustain a right to immediate payment, must be made subject to the right or duty of the trustees to retain such funds as may be necessary to carry out the whole of the other provisions of the will. Mar. 18, 1913.

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

There is another question, of a different kind, which is not put specifically but is covered by the second part of the general question, "whether payment of all legacies is postponed until the death of the second party, and, if so, which of them," and that is the question as to a bequest in favour of the University Court of the University of Glasgow, "to endow a Chair of Modern Languages, to be called the 'Chair of William Jacks' . . . Declaring that should either I or my wife endow any chair in the Glasgow or other University before the death of the survivor, then this bequest shall fall." Now the question is whether it is possible to get rid of the plain words of that bequest. The bequest is given conditionally upon no other chair being endowed during the lifetime of the survivor of the spouses. It is quite true that this lady has said, and it was right and proper for her to say it in the position in which she is, that she did not mean to endow any other chair. But that cannot be taken as a complete satisfaction of the testator's condition that this bequest is to fall in an event which may or may not happen during the lifetime of his widow. Lord Kinnear.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The testator, Mr Jacks, by his settlement declared the sixth purpose of the trust thereby created to be "for payment to my said wife of the free annual interest or income of the residue of my estate, payable said income half-yearly or in the option of my trustees as received," and the last purpose to be "for payment of the several following bequests upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her liferent over any part thereof to admit of payment, then for payment of such part upon such surrender." This alternative date of payment depends upon a clause which was added to the gift of the residuary income immediately after the words which I have quoted, viz., "but with power nevertheless to her (his said wife) to consent to payment of all or one or more of the legacies hereinafter bequeathed, or part of all or one or more of them, so as to admit of payment thereof during her life, and subject to or free of duty."

The legacies under the last purpose of the settlement, which were as many as twenty-one in number, for Mr Jacks left a large estate and no issue, were not by any means uniform in their conception. They fall into classes of which the following are samples—[His Lordship here quoted the terms of the legacies bequeathed under the first, second, fifth, sixth, eleventh, fifteenth, seventeenth, and twenty-first heads of the last purpose of the settlement]. There are two legacies of an exceptional character, Nos. 10 and 16 in the list contained in the settlement, which it would only cumber the general question to refer to at present, but which I will deal with separately later.

The residue of his estate Mr Jacks left to the absolute disposal of his trustees, either for the augmentation of any of the legacies to persons or institutions named by him or for the help of kindred institutions. Mrs Jacks, the testator's widow, survived him, and claimed her jus relictae, which was not excluded by marriage-contract. And I think it right to say, in justice to her, that I interpret her action and what has followed on it as

Mar. 18, 1913. dictated by no antagonism to her husband's settlement, but by a wish to allow all his legatees to come into immediate enjoyment of their legacies, consistently with justice to herself. Mr Jacks's residuary estate is sufficient to pay out his widow her jus relictae, to pay the whole legacies in full, and to leave a small resulting residue. Had Mrs Jacks surrendered her liferent in part, in precise terms of the will, she would, in the circumstances, have reduced her income by one-half, without any compensation in capital. By the course she took she surrendered her whole income (at any rate for the time) and took compensation in capital, but equally she allowed her husband's will to take full effect at once quoad the legacies, which amount to the large sum of £76,250. But it must here be noticed that the settlement of Mr Jacks contained this declaration, "which provisions in favour of my said wife shall be in full to her of all her claims of terce, jus relictae, and others legally competent to her against my estate upon my decease."

After Mrs Jacks's election to take her jus relictae, she executed a deed of ratification, &c., by which, on a narrative of her husband's settlement, of her having claimed and taken her legal rights, of the trustees being in a position after settling with her to pay his whole legacies, and of her personal desire that such payments should be made forthwith, she ratified her election, surrendered irrevocably her liferent and whole other provisions (the latter, though unnecessary to mention in detail were of very considerable value), and concluded thus: "And I consent (so far as I competently can) in exercise of the power of anticipation conferred upon me in the sixth place in said trust-disposition and settlement and every other power enabling me, to payment being forthwith made" of the whole legacies bequeathed, &c.

The main question in the case is whether all or any and which of the legacies above referred to fall to be paid now or to be postponed till the death of Mrs Jacks the testator's widow. I have carefully examined the whole of Mr Jacks's settlement in the above detail, because I do not think it is possible to come to a sound conclusion on the above question without considering its whole scope and bearing.

The first point to which I shall advert is Mrs Jacks's claim to jus relictae and its effect. I have always understood that where a provision or bequest by settlement is declared to be in full, in satisfaction, or in full satisfaction (for they all come to the same thing) of legitim or of jus relictae, a claim by a beneficiary to such legal rights involved absolute renunciation or forfeiture, from whichever side the claim is looked at, of the testamentary provision. It appears to me that the very terms of such a provision involve that the bequest is conditional, and I cannot myself understand a right being satisfied by a provision, and at the same time the right being exigible and the provision merely suspended or postponed. The law is thus emphatically stated by the late Lord President (Inglis) and Lord Mure in Macfarlane's case.¹ In that case Lord Mure says: "The law is, I apprehend, quite settled, to the effect that the beneficiary electing to take his legal rights as against the will is held to have forfeited everything the will gave him beyond the amount of those rights," and the Lord President in different words regards the declaration of satisfaction as a condition to receive effect as matter "of course." The point, however, was not alluded to by the other Judges, and Mar. 18, 1913. it is maintained that the above observations were not necessary for the deter- Jacks's Trus- mination of the case, and do not enter into the grounds of judgment, and tees v. Jacks. must therefore be taken as having no further weight than other obiter dicta. Ld. Johnston. Your Lordship has spoken regarding the judgment in *Macfarlane's case*¹ as one of the Court which was concerned in its decision; I find that I occupied to the case a humbler, but to the law and to the profession a responsible, position, viz., that of the reporter, and, as it happens, I have an exceptionally distinct recollection of the case. In it for the first time the doctrine of equitable compensation, which although it had been long established in England, and although it may be said to have been adumbrated in Scotland, had never, so far as I am aware, eo nomine been accepted here, was adopted as part of the law of Scotland. The case was one which aroused much interest, and was the subject of much discussion in the Parliament House as well as before the Court, and was the subject of an exhaustive argument in this Division, and afterwards of written papers laid before the whole Court, and I can say with perfect distinctness of recollection that the doctrine laid down by the two Judges whom I have quoted was the basis of their judgment and of those who concurred with them, but who did not think it necessary to repeat it. Much in a case of such importance passes in the discussion before the Court, which cannot appear in the report, and I can have no doubt that it was made quite clear that the judgment of the Court upon the question at issue justified the general, which is found to preface the special, rubric. But the matter does not enter the actual judgment, and we were referred to the case of Gray,² where the doctrine referred to was repudiated by a direct decision to the contrary. While I do not regard the reasoning, whereby the expressed opinion of Lord President Inglis and Lord Mure is avoided by the only Judge who makes reference to it, as satisfactory, and while I think the question deserving and requiring reconsideration, I must accept the case as settling the law for the purpose of this case. In fact from my point of view, though I should have come to the same conclusion in the present case on an opposite view of the law, if the law be as determined in Gray's case,² it only makes this case the more easily decided.

¹ 9 R., at pp. 1166-7 and 1176.

I accept therefore that Mrs Jacks's claiming and receiving her jus relictæ did not involve total surrender or forfeiture of her testamentary provision, but left it open to her yet to claim and receive the latter, on equitable compensation having been made to all others affected by her taking the former. It may be that, humanly speaking, at Mrs Jacks's age equitable compensation cannot be looked for, but legally it must be regarded as possible, and her claim to her provision of a liferent as capable of again emerging. In fact ex hypothesi the radical right to it remains with her. And this legal fact affects materially her deed of ratification and surrender. From being a document having no avail whatever, it becomes one having an important bearing upon the present case.

What, then, is the date of vesting of Mr Jacks's legacies? This question must be first considered on the footing that the settlement took effect

¹ 9 R. 1138.

² 1907 S. C. 54.

Mar. 18, 1913. in terms, and was in no way interfered with by the action of the widow.
Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks. It was maintained on the authority of *Bryson's case*¹ that, as there was no gift apart from a direction to pay, there could be no vesting until payment, and that, as there can be no vesting till a contingency is purified, there could be no payment in this case till the contingency is purified, where the legacies are coupled with a contingency or destination-over. But then those who maintain this position find themselves in this dilemma, that, if the will takes its normal course, there can be no payment until the widow's death; that the legacies are roughly of two classes—those personal and without contingency or destination-over, and those coupled with a contingency or a destination-over—and that they have to maintain a different scheme of vesting for those two classes in order to determine the result of the widow's surrender of her life interest with a view to anticipate payment. The conclusion to which they would have us come is that the personal legacies vest at the date of payment, whether that is the date of the widow's death or of her consent to anticipation of payment, but that the contingent legacies and legacies with a destination-over cannot vest in any case until the widow's death, because these contingencies and destination-over are assumed to depend upon that date. For a different date of vesting of the different classes of legacies, I hold that there is no ground in this case. It is against the whole indication of the testator's intention, as deduced from the terms of this purpose of his settlement. It is hardly conceivable that the testator intended that a legacy to his wife's maid or to his minister should vest on acceleration of payment, irrespective of his widow's death, and one to his brother's widow remain contingent with the risk of lapsing, or one to his brother's son remain contingent and either go over to his issue or lapse on failure of issue, should his brother's widow or his nephew predecease his own widow. Moreover, the contention takes no regard of the terms of the widow's power of anticipation. She may consent to the payment "of all or one or more" of the legacies. There is no distinction whatever between the different classes of legacies, whereas the contention above referred to would introduce a very marked distinction.

I can conceive it possible in this case to hold that vesting of the legacies took place a morte testatoris. I can also conceive it possible to hold that they vested at the date of payment, whether normal or anticipated. But I cannot understand its being maintained that some vested at such anticipated date of payment, and that vesting of some was postponed till the widow's death, notwithstanding that she consented to payment being anticipated. Between the two dates of vesting, which I conceive to be possible, opinions, I concede, may differ. My own opinion is that in this case vesting is not dependent on the date of payment, whether normal or anticipated. I think it took place at the testator's death, and that no other conclusion can harmonise the whole of the sixth and seventh provisions of the settlement. Moreover, I find no difficulty in the case of Bryson's Trustees v. Clark,¹ or in the opinion of the late Lord President Inglis. In the first place, the settlement there was one of heritage, and the destination was one in accord with the subject; in the second place, the Lord President expressed his opinion Mar. 18, 1913. thus: "It is in vain to review the authorities in a question of this kind, Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks. but I think they amount to this, that when nothing is expressed in favour of a beneficiary except a direction to trustees to convey to him on the occurrence of a certain event, and not sooner, and, failing him, to certain other persons as substitutes or conditional institutes to him, then, if he does not survive the period he takes no right under the settlement. I think that is settled law, and applicable to this case." I accept it as settled law. But is it applicable to this case? I think not. I think there is virtue in the words I have underlined, and that something is both implied and expressed in this case which makes the general doctrine inapplicable—implied in the general scope of this wide range of different legacies, and expressed in gremio of the power and condition of anticipation. Ld. Johnston.

¹ 8 R. 142.

To revert more particularly to the different classes of legacies enumerated at the outset:

The 1st to a widow, if she has not married again, vested, I think, a morte, subject to defeasance on remarriage before the date of payment, and was not held up, it might be for the whole of the widow's life, until Mrs Jacks's death, and in that case possibly to lapse. As to the 2nd and 3rd, where the testator speaks of the date of vesting, he gives no aid to determine the date of vesting, nor does he indicate that he had any personal conception of what the date of vesting would be. He leaves it as simply the date of vesting, whatever that may be. Had he said the date of payment, he would probably have fixed the date of vesting. But that would not suit the construction which I am venturing to dispute, for it would have then fluctuated according as payment was accelerated or not. I can then find no grounds in this particular case for postponing vesting in the nephews and nieces beyond the date of the testator's death, or for postponing payment of these legacies during the whole of the widow's life, in any and every event, for behoof of their possibly unborn issue. And such was not, I think, when the whole provision in question is looked at, the testator's intention. Nor did he intend so to hold up the legacies of the class 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, but meant them, I think, to vest a morte, the postponement of payment being intended not to suspend vesting in any case, but being necessary merely for protection of the widow's liferent.

I have so far dealt with the case as if things had taken their normal course under the settlement, and Mrs Jacks had either died or surrendered in part her liferent, to admit of payment being made, which might have happened not immediately at her husband's death, but at any time between that date and her own death. In the normal case, as I think, neither Mrs Jacks's surrender of her liferent nor her death would have had any effect on the vesting of the legacies. Predecease of either of these events would not have cut off a legatee to whom there was a gift over any more than a personal legatee to whom there was none. It would merely have accelerated the date of payment. Such, as I have said, I believe to be the result of a consideration of the general scope of this fasciculus of legacies.

But things have not taken their normal course. Mrs Jacks has claimed her jus relictae, and has executed a surrender valeat quantum of her liferent.

Mar. 18, 1913. If the law is as determined by Gray's case,¹ Mrs Jacks was in a position to surrender in terms of the will, to admit of immediate payment, for legally Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks. her liferent was still radically hers, though now dormant to admit of equitable compensation being made, and was not either renounced or forfeited. Ld. Johnston. Again, if Gray's case¹ does not fix the law applicable to this case, then it appears to me that the forfeiture of Mrs Jacks's liferent, by reason of her claim to jus relictæ, which must then have ensued, inasmuch as it involves the same result as her voluntary surrender of her liferent, has by implication the same effect as her voluntary surrender. To hold otherwise would be, I think, to thwart the obvious intention of the testator. The case is entirely distinguishable in its circumstances and the nature of the interests involved from Edwardes's case² and *Haldane's Trustees*³ to which we were referred.

But assuming that I am wrong in preferring the death of the testator as the general date of vesting, the alternative view of vesting which I have suggested commends itself to me with almost equal force, and it is one which is equally effectual to dispose of the case, in the circumstances as they have turned out. Assume that vesting did not take place at the death of the testator, it can, I think, hardly be disputed that it took place at the date of payment, else how could payment be made of a legacy not vested? And payment is to be made if the widow chooses to surrender her liferent not of a limited class or classes of the legacies, but of "all or one or more" of them. This would lead, it is said, to the result that vesting would be made to depend on the act of a third party. And the case of *Muirhead*⁴ was referred to as a conclusive authority in favour of the impossibility of Mrs Jacks's surrender resulting in the immediate vesting of the contingent legacies or those with a destination-over. I read it as an authority for a diametrically opposite conclusion. This case is just the exception which proves the rule of Muirhead's case.⁴ As Lord Watson (at p. 50) puts it, "It is impossible to hold as matter of principle that the act of any person outside of and hostile to the trust can per se effect an alteration of the truster's dispositions with regard to the vesting of interests in his estate. Such an act may be of material importance if the testator has either expressly or by implication signified his intention that upon its occurrence the period of vesting shall shift." I cannot ignore the guarded manner in which his Lordship's statement of the general principle is made. The widow's act is not here founded on per se, but in relation to an indication of the testator's intention of what should flow from that act, expressed, if the authority of Gray's case¹ is accepted, implied, if the law be as stated by the Lord President and Lord Mure in Macfarlane's case.⁵ I can have no doubt, therefore, that, whatever view may be taken of vesting a morte, vesting did take place at latest at the date to which the act of the widow shifted the payment, and vesting not of certain of the legacies merely, but of the whole. For I cannot draw any distinction in their effect, according to the intention of the testator, between the widow's voluntary surrender and her forfeiture of her annuity.

¹ 1907 S. C. 54.² 19 R. (H. L.) 33.³ 23 R. 276.⁴ 17 R. (H. L.) 45.⁵ 9 R. 1138.

I noted in passing that there were two legacies in a special position, viz., Mar. 18, 1913. the 10th and the 16th. The 10th is in favour of Mrs Margaret Anderson ^{Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.} or Lee and her son, William Jacks Lee. Whenever payment can be made Mrs Lee's liferent of this legacy commences, but for some reason the fee ^{Ld. Johnston.} intended for her son is to go to his mother if he does not attain twenty-one, and failing her is to revert to residue. The fact that the testator here provides exceptionally for a reversion to residue is, I think, the most important confirmation of the view that he regarded all the other legacies where a lapse is contemplated as vesting at his death. The 16th presents more difficulty. It is a bequest to the University of Glasgow for the endowment of a Chair of Modern Languages, and it is subject to a declaration that should either "I or my wife endow any chair in the Glasgow or other university before the death of the survivor, then this bequest shall fall." Like the reversion of William Jacks Lee's legacy, this provision is exceptional. But the declaration that it shall lapse in a certain event, distinguishing it from the remaining legacies, cannot affect them, except by way of confirming the conclusion already reached regarding them. The peculiarity of this legacy must be met by either retaining it at interest, or taking security for its repetition in the event conditioned.

I am therefore for answering the first query in the affirmative as regards all the legacies, with the exception of that to Glasgow University, and making a special arrangement regarding it, and the third query (a) in the affirmative, and (b) at 3 per cent per annum. It is, in my view, unnecessary to answer the second query.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The testator's widow elected to take her legal rights, with the result that she is not, at all events at present, entitled to draw the free annual interest or income of the residue of the truster's estate bequeathed to her under the settlement. It is being applied on the principles of equitable compensation to make up the capital sum paid to her in full of her legal rights. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to consider or decide what the right of the widow will be after compensation has been made. I take the case on the assumption that if and when the capital sum paid to the widow is replaced during her lifetime, her right to the liferent would, under the terms of the settlement, revive. She has, however, executed a deed of ratification, surrender, and consent, by which she has surrendered irrevocably the whole liferent and other provisions conferred upon her by the settlement.

The question is whether payment of all or any of the legacies bequeathed in the last purpose of the settlement can now be made by the trustees. There is a power under the settlement given to the widow to consent to payment to all or one or more of the legatees in question during her life, and the direction in the last place is as follows:—"For payment of the several following bequests upon the death of my said wife, or should she surrender her liferent over any part thereof to admit of payment, then for payment of such part upon such surrender." The widow, under the deed of ratification, surrender, and consent, consents so far as she competently can to payment being forthwith made of the whole of the legacies, but I think it plain that the trustees cannot proceed upon this as a warrant to

Mar. 18, 1913. them to make payment to the legatees. The widow cannot approbate and reprobate the settlement. Having claimed against the settlement, she cannot exercise a power conferred by it. The operative direction therefore is to the trustees to pay the bequests in question upon the death of the widow. On the authority of Muirhead v. Muirhead,¹ the widow's repudiation of her liferent has no effect on the vesting of the legacies, although it has an effect as regards the payment of those legacies which have already vested. As Lord Watson says, "it is impossible to hold as matter of principle that the act of any person outside of and hostile to the trust can per se effect an alteration of the truster's dispositions with regard to the vesting of interests in his estate." The testator here had no other object in view in postponing the time of payment than to secure the liferent to the widow. That liferent being now at an end, partly through the compulsory application of the doctrine of equitable compensation, and ultimately, if the occasion arises, through the surrender of her liferent right by the widow, there is no reason why the trustees should not make an immediate division (always provided the state of the funds permits it). This division, however, must be limited to those who have a vested and indefeasible interest in their legacies. In the case of those whose legacies are contingent, where there is a clause of survivorship, or destination-over, the rule laid down in many cases, of which *Bryson's Trustees v. Clark*² is probably the most often quoted example, is that the beneficiary who does not survive the period for payment prescribed by the testator takes no right under the settlement. All the elements indicative of suspended vesting mentioned by Lord Watson in *Muirhead*¹ are present here.

The third parties are the contingent legatees. In my opinion they are not entitled to immediate payment. In the case of one of the third parties, Mrs Elizabeth Jones or Jacks, the contingency is created not by a destination-over, but by a condition in regard to remarriage. This, in my opinion, continues during the lifetime of the testator's widow. The fifth parties are the legatees in whose case there is no gift over or contingency. These, in my opinion, are entitled to immediate payment, if and when the trustees have in hand sufficient funds to make full payment, with interest, of the whole legacies whether vested or contingent. Until then the trustees are neither bound nor entitled to make payment to any of the legatees. Interest on the legacies will be at the rate the money has earned, and runs on the legacies which are vested from the date of the deed of ratification. On the legacies which have not vested it will not begin to run until the period of payment has arrived.

This leaves only the question in regard to the bequest of £20,000 to the University of Glasgow to endow a Chair of Modern Languages. The settlement contains the declaration that should either the testator or his wife endow any chair in Glasgow or other university before the death of the survivor, then that bequest should fall. This condition is independent altogether of the question whether the widow has taken her legal or conventional provisions. It cannot be seen until her death whether she has endowed any chair in Glasgow or any other university. Therefore it cannot be seen during her lifetime whether the testator's bequest is to fall or Mar. 18, 1918. not. It is no doubt true that by the deed of ratification, surrender, and consent Mrs Jacks irrevocably and absolutely undertakes not to endow any ^{Jacks's Trusts v. Jacks.} chair in Glasgow or any other university now or at any time hereafter. If, however, the trustees pay the £20,000 to Glasgow University upon this ^{Lord Mac-} undertaking, it is impossible they could ever get the money back. They have paid to Mrs Jacks the full amount of her legal provisions. If therefore after payment to Glasgow University by the trustees Mrs Jacks chose to endow a chair in that or any other university, I am unable to see by what means the trustees could carry into effect the express declaration of the testator. I do not mean for a moment to suggest that Mrs Jacks would do anything in violation of the undertaking she has given. The Court is, however, bound to treat the matter on a strictly legal basis, and so regarding it, I am unable to hold that the Court would be warranted in sanctioning immediate payment of this bequest. ^{kenzie.}

¹ 17 R. (H. L.) 45.

² 8 R. 142.

LORD KINNEAR.—I should like to add two observations which I omitted to make, but of which I have been reminded by Lord Johnston. The first is this, that where legacies have been given upon contingencies which have been already purified, they are, in my opinion, exactly in the same position as legacies which have been given absolutely independent of any contingency at all. The case of the legacy to William Lee is an illustration. That was to be given to him if he attained the age of twenty-one; but if he did not attain the age of twenty-one it was to go to his mother, whom failing, it was to fall into residue. Now we are told that in point of fact he has attained that age, and therefore his right has become absolute. There is no difficulty, to my mind, in the application of that view arising from the interim gift of liferent to the mother, because the testator says distinctly that the income in the interim is to be applied for his benefit, and therefore it was really a legacy, the income of which was to go to the legatee while in minority and the capital when he came of age. There are, I think, other legacies in which the contingencies have been purified.

Then the other observation I wish to make is this, that although I think that the power of the liferenter to authorise the anticipation of payment is completely out of the case as an operative power, in respect of her having rejected the will, still I should quite agree with Lord Johnston that the power remains as part of the will which we must read in order to ascertain the intention of the testator. I do not think that the rejection of a bequest strikes anything out of the will itself but only the benefit of the refractory legatee. But then, in that view, what the testator really provides is that, if his wife shall exercise a certain power, then payment is to be accelerated, and the question of what is to happen if she does not exercise it must be decided according to the plain meaning and expression of the testator's will providing for that event. I agree that if there had been in fact an exercise of that power by the liferenter in terms of the will, the legacies which were paid in consequence must have vested, because they were paid.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Find in answer to the first and second questions of law in the case

Mar. 18, 1913.

Jacks's Trustees v. Jacks.

that (1) the trustees are not entitled to pay any of the legacies before they have funds in their hands sufficient to make payment with interest and duty of the whole legacies; if and when they have funds sufficient, the fifth parties will be entitled to receive immediate payment of their legacies; (2) payment of the legacies and bequests to the third and fourth parties is postponed until the death of the second party, reserving any question that may arise if the liferent of the second party should at any future time be held to revive: Answer branch (a) of the third question in the affirmative, and find in answer to branch (b) of said third question that interest falls to be paid at the rate the money earns in the hands of the trustees. . . ."

WEBSTER, WILL, & Co., W.S.—HAMILTON, KINNAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—
MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 112.

KATHLEEN M'ENANEY (Ernest Leigh's Executrix), Pursuer (Reclaimers).—Moncrieff, K.C.—A. M. Mackay.

Mar. 19, 1913.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
Clyde, K.C.—Blackburn, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Reparation—Damages for personal injury—Title to sue—Executor.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Hunter) that the executor of a party who had, prior to his death, intimated a claim for damages for personal injury, had a title to sue for such damages.

Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum, (1893) 20 R. 859, and Boyce's Executor v. M'Dougal, (1903) 5 F. 452, distinguished.

Observations on the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona, and on the use of the phrase actio injuriarum as a nomen juris in Scots law.

1ST DIVISION. ON 13th July 1912 Kathleen M'Enaney, executrix-nominate of the late Ernest Leigh, brought an action against the Caledonian Railway Company to recover damages from the defenders in respect of personal injuries sustained by the deceased owing to the fault of the defenders or their servants.

The pursuer averred that, on 25th December 1911, the said Ernest Leigh, while standing in a street in Glasgow, was knocked down and run over by a van belonging to the defenders through the fault of their servant; that he was removed to the Royal Infirmary where he lay in great suffering till 6th January 1912, when he died as a result of the accident.

She further averred:—(Cond. 7) "While in the infirmary, on or about 28th December 1911, the said Ernest Leigh instructed his solicitors in Glasgow to take proceedings to recover a sum in name of damages for his said injuries and sufferings from the defenders. Accordingly, on or about 28th December 1911, a letter in the following terms was sent on his behalf to the defenders, viz.:—
'Messrs The Caledonian Railway Co.,
302 Buchanan Street.

'Dear Sirs,—We have been consulted on behalf of Mr Ernest Leigh, 122 Charing Cross Road, London, who, on the morning of Christmas Day, was knocked down in West Nile Street by a van belonging to you, the horses of which had run away through, we understand, having been left unattended in the street. We have made full inquiries into the whole circumstances connected with the matter, and are quite satisfied that you are liable. Our client was removed to the Royal Infirmary immediately, where he still is and will be for some considerable time. We understand that both his knees have been fractured, and that he has sustained serious internal injuries. We shall be glad to hear from you at your earliest convenience, and after you have made inquiries, whether or not liability is admitted.—Yours faithfully, ANGUS CAMPBELL & COCHRAN.

 The defenders refused or delayed either to admit or deny liability, and a reminder was sent on Leigh's behalf in the following terms:—
 'Messrs The Caledonian Railway Co.,

302 Buchanan Street, Glasgow.

'Ernest Leigh.

'Dear Sirs,—We refer you to our letter of 28th ult., and shall now be glad to hear from you.—Yours truly,

'ANGUS CAMPBELL & COCHRAN.'

The defenders declined to admit liability 'in the meantime,' and intimated that they were having inquiries made. For some time longer they unreasonably delayed or refused to admit liability, and in the meantime the said Ernest Leigh died of his injuries as aforesaid." (Cond. 8) "By will, dated 5th January 1912, and executed as accords of law, the said Ernest Leigh appointed the pursuer (who was otherwise known among her friends and acquaintances, and in particular to the said Ernest Leigh, under the name of Mrs Kathleen McEnaney Denton or Baird) his executrix and universal legatory, and left, bequeathed, and made over to her his whole means and estate as her absolute property. A copy of the said will, whereof the pursuer has taken out probate in England, is produced herewith and held as repeated herein. Inter alia, the testator made the following declaration, viz.:—'I also declare that she [the pursuer] is to be entitled to, and to get, any sum of money which may be paid in name of damages or otherwise by the Caledonian Railway Company in respect of the accident I have sustained.' Accordingly, the pursuer has a good and undoubted right and title to sue the present action." (Cond. 9) "The pursuer has called on the defenders to make payment to her of a sum of money adequate as damages and reparation for the injuries, loss, damage, and sufferings of the said Ernest Leigh, but they refuse to do so, or to admit any liability, and the present action is therefore necessary."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer having good and undoubted right to sue the present action, as executor duly nominated to the said Ernest Leigh, decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the action. (3) The pursuer, as universal legatory and assignee of the said Ernest Leigh, having good and undoubted right to sue the present action, decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the action.

The defenders, who, for the purposes of the action, admitted responsibility for the accident, pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Any right to make the present claim having ceased on the death of the said Ernest Leigh, the pursuer has no title to sue, and the action is irrelevant.

On 13th November 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the circumstances]—For the purposes of this action the defenders admit that they are responsible for the accident,

Mar. 19, 1913.

Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 20th, 27th, and 28th February 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer;—In the case of *Darling v. Gray & Sons*¹ Lord Watson found it unnecessary to determine the question whether a claim in respect of personal injuries was transmissible on the death of the party injured to his representatives, and an affirmative answer to that question in certain circumstances was not excluded either by the decision or the grounds of judgment in the cases of *Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum*² and Boyce's Executor v. M'Dougal,³ upon which the Lord Ordinary had proceeded. There was a clear distinction between the circumstances of these cases and those of the present case, for here there had been intimation of a claim, and a clearly expressed intention of the deceased to treat it as an asset to pass with the rest of his estate to the pursuer.⁴ An action at the instance of a party suing upon an assignation of a good ground of action was not within the categories adversely commented upon by Lord Watson in the case of Darling v. Gray & Sons.⁵ The pursuer here had a good but they maintain that, as no action was raised against them by the deceased in his lifetime, the pursuer has no title to sue the present action.

"In the case of Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum, 20 R. 859, it was held by a majority of a Court of seven Judges that an executor has no title to institute an action of damages for personal injuries to the deceased person whom he represents. It is true that the deceased in that case had not only not raised an action, but he had not by any public act indicated his intention of making a claim. Lord M'Laren's opinion does not, however, appear to me to proceed upon this distinction but upon general grounds. He treats the case of executors following out and insisting in an action raised by the injured party as a recognised exception to the rule against the transmissibility of an action for personal injuries where no patrimonial loss has been sustained. (Neilson v. Rodger, 16 D. 325, and Darling v. Gray & Sons, 19 R. (H. L.) 31.)

"Mr Mackay, in a learned argument submitted to me, asked me to treat Bern's case as only excluding the action where the injured party had given no public indication of his intention to prosecute the claim. He referred me to the opinion of Lord Shaw in the case of Hendry v. United Collieries, 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 19, at p. 24, and to the opinion of Lord Kinnear in Traill & Son, 6 F. 798. Neither of these learned Judges express disapproval of the decision in Bern's Executor; and in neither case was it necessary for the decision of the case to consider to what extent Bern's case excluded a claim like the present.

"In the case of Boyce's Executor, 5 F. 452, the executor who raised the action stated that, as curator bonis of the injured party, he had given instructions to raise an action for damages on account of the injuries, but that the ward had died before the action was raised. The action was dismissed. In giving judgment in that case Lord Moncreiff said, 'I have read the whole opinions in Bern's case over again, and I think, having regard to the grounds of judgment on the part of the majority of the Court, they involve this—that an action of this kind will not transmit to an executor unless the action has been actually raised during the lifetime of the party injured. On these grounds I think the Lord Ordinary had no alternative but to give effect to the case of Bern and dismiss the action.'

"The cases of Bern and Boyce are binding upon me, and I therefore sustain the first plea in law for the defenders and dismiss the action."

¹ (1892) 19 R. (H. L.) 31.

² (1893) 20 R. 859.

³ (1903) 5 F. 452.

⁴ Milne v. Gauld's Trustees, (1841) 3 D. 345.

⁵ 19 R. (H. L.), at p. 32.

title to sue for recovery of damages for injury to the deceased during his life and for personal loss, because the deceased had assigned the benefits recoverable.¹ The intimation of the deceased's claim and the assignation thereof had the same effect as if he had brought an action in his own name.² The right to sue in such an action once vested transmitted to personal representatives or assignees.³ If any relatives of the deceased had sued for damages the present pursuer could have shown a better title to sue than theirs. If the Lord Ordinary's judgment were sound, then, after intimation of a claim for damages, any defenders might escape liability by dilatory methods. The present defenders were not entitled to take any benefit from their delay in admitting liability. The maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona was not the law of Scotland, and in Auld v. Shairp,⁴ which was apparently the earliest case in the Scotch books in which reference was made to that maxim, a title to sue was held to have transmitted. Lord M'Laren's dictum in the case of Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum,⁵ which suggested that the law of Scotland was unique in not accepting a limitation of transmissibility of such actions, was hardly borne out by his Lordship's reference to the case of Neilson v. Rodger.⁶ The maxim actio personalis was never found in Roman law or in the Commentators thereon, and it was contradictory of the principles underlying that law. In Roman law a right to sue was transmissible actively, if not passively, in all actions for delict, except actiones injuriarum,⁷ and the actio injuriarum was always founded not upon personal loss but upon contumelia.⁸ The origin of the maxim actio personalis was to be found in the history of English law alone, where its source was obscure.⁹ Even in England its scope had been largely limited both by statute, as, for instance, where executors had been given a right by statute to sue for damage to the estate of a deceased party, and by decision.¹⁰ This was not an actio injuriarum in the sense of the Roman law, for the pursuer sought to recover damages for loss to the estate of the deceased by his death, and the present action was therefore distinguishable from such as involved purely penal consequences.¹¹

Argued for the respondents;—A right to recover damages for per-

¹ Neilson v. Rodger, (1853) 16 D. 325, Lord Cockburn, at p. 329, Lord Wood, at pp. 329-30.

² Traill & Sons v. Actieselskabet Dalbeattie, Limited, (1904) 6 F. 798, Lord Kinnear, at p. 807; Riley v. Ellis, 1910 S. C. 934, Lord President, at p. 942.

³ Hendry v. United Collieries, Limited, 1908 S. C. 1215, Lord Kinnear, at p. 1218, Lord M'Laren, at p. 1223, 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 19.

⁴ (1874) 2 R. 191, Lord Neaves, at pp. 198-200.

⁵ 20 R., at p. 862.

⁶ 16 D. 325.

⁷ Justinian Institutes, IV. xii. 1, Sandars, (9th ed.) p. 476; Pothier des Obligations, sec. 637, 638.

⁸ Justinian Institutes, IV. iv. 1, Sandars, (9th ed.) p. 418.

⁹ Per Bowen, L.J., in Finlay v. Chirney and Another, (1888) 20 Q. B. D. 494, at p. 502.

¹⁰ 4 Edw. III. cap. 7; Broom's Legal Maxims, (8th ed.) 702; Chamberlain v. Williams, (1814) 2 M. & S. 408. The Lord President referred to Hambly et al. v. Trott, (1776) 1 Cowper, 371, and Eisten v. North British Railway Co., (1870) 8 Macph. 980, Lord President Inglis, at p. 984.

¹¹ Williamson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., (1884) 11 R. 596; Black v. North British Railway Co., 1908 S. C. 444; Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steamship Co., Limited, (1894) 21 R. (H. L.) 39.

Mar. 19, 1913.
Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Mar. 19, 1913.

Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

sonal injury did not transmit to the executor of the injured party unless an action for recovery of damages had actually been brought by the deceased.¹ That the deceased had given instructions to raise an action did not suffice to give his executor a title to sue.² If death resulted from the injuries the dependants of the deceased would have a title to sue; and, if his executor also had a title to sue such an action as the present, the right to recover damages would be duplicated. But it was settled law that there could not be two actions arising out of the same wrong.³ Independently of the decision in the case of Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum,⁴ if the practice of the Roman law could be appealed to it would be necessary for the pursuer to show—which he had failed to do—that an action for personal injury was not an actio injuriarum of the class excepted as not transmissible to heirs.⁵ The decision in *Bern's Executor*⁴ was consistent with the law, not only of Rome, but of England⁶ and of America.⁷ The present case differed from that of a party suing upon an intimated assignation of a good ground of action, because the present pursuer's title to sue was founded upon a bequest which operated no intimation to the defenders of an intention to sue. Election to bring an action would be ineffectual to transmit to an executor a title to sue unless an action had been brought and the election had thus been intimated to the parties liable. The question here at issue was not affected by the decision in the case of Hendry v. United Collieries,⁸ which dealt with a totally different matter, viz., the transmissibility of a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The case of Trail & Sons v. Actieselskabet Dalbeattie, Limited,⁹ (in which the soundness of *Bern's Executor*⁴ was not doubted) was distinguishable, because in that case the right of action was assigned for value, and the action was brought in the lifetime of the cedents. The practice of the Court did not support the dictum of Lord Kinnear in that case,¹⁰ which was relied upon by the pursuer, as to assignation of a right of action. The present action was not really a claim for patrimonial loss. The pursuer made no averments of such loss; and the damages which might have been recovered by the deceased for the personal suffering condescended on could not be broken up theoretically into a sum representing solatium to himself and a sum representing patrimonial loss to his estate.

At advising on 19th March 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action brought by the executor-nominate of the late Mr Leigh to recover damages from the Caledonian Railway Com-

¹ Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum, 20 R. 859; Darling v. Gray & Sons, 19 R. (H. L.) 31.

² Boyce's Executor v. M'Dougal, 5 F. 452.

³ Neilson v. Rodger, 16 D. 325; Darling v. Gray & Sons, (1891) 18 R. 1164, 19 R. (H. L.) 31.

⁴ 20 R. 859.

⁵ Just. Inst. IV. xii. 1, Sanders, 476; Broom's Legal Maxims, (8th ed.) 704.

⁶ Broom's Legal Maxims, (8th ed.) 697-704.

⁷ Finlay v. Chirney and Another, 20 Q. B. D. 494, Lord Esher, M.R., at p. 497, Bowen, L.J., at p. 505.

⁸ 1909 S. C. (H. L.) 19, Lord Macnaghten, at p. 21.

⁹ 6 F. 798.

¹⁰ 6 F., at p. 807.

pany in respect of personal injury sustained by Mr Leigh owing to the fault of the defenders or their servants. Mr Leigh was knocked down by a van which was the property of, and being driven by, the servants of the Caledonian Railway Company. Mar. 19, 1913.
Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
Ld. President.

After the accident had happened, and while he was ill, Mr Leigh executed a will in which he made the present pursuer his executrix and universal legatory, and in the will he inserted the following declaration:—"I also declare that she"—the pursuer—"is to be entitled to, and to get, any sum of money which may be paid in name of damages or otherwise by the Caledonian Railway Company in respect of the accident I have sustained." While he was still alive, he instructed his solicitors to take proceedings to recover a sum of money as damages from the defenders, and a letter was written on his behalf, in general terms, asking what the defenders would do. The defenders declined to admit any liability in the meantime, and before anything further was done in that matter Mr Leigh died. This action having been raised, the defenders admit that the accident was caused by the fault of a servant for whom they were responsible; but they plead that "Any right to make the present claim having ceased on the death of the said Ernest Leigh, the pursuer has no title to sue, and the action is irrelevant." That plea was sustained by the Lord Ordinary, upon the ground that the case is covered by the case of Bern's Executor v. Montrose Asylum.¹

We had a very elaborate argument from the learned counsel for the pursuer, which was chiefly taken up with a discussion of the brocard actio personalis moritur cum persona, and especially with the question what the actio injuriarum really was in the Roman law, and a distinction was sought to be drawn between this case and the case of *Bern's Executor*¹ upon that matter. The latter case was a case where the husband of a deceased wife sued the proprietors of an asylum for injury, and, as the pursuer's counsel put it, indignity offered to his wife while she was an inmate of the asylum, and the action was dismissed as incompetent. Speaking for myself, I am not inclined to follow the learned counsel for the pursuer in his discussion upon this matter. I doubt whether we can get any great assistance from the Roman law in such a matter, and I very gravely doubt whether the term actio injuriarum, as used in Scots law, can be taken to be limited by a strict view of what actio injuriarum was in the Roman law.

Upon the merits of the case I have found the matter attended with great difficulty; because no recorded instance of such an action being allowed to go on has been found in the books. That is to say, there is no instance where an executor has raised, for the first time, an action in respect of personal injuries to a dead man. But so far as I am concerned, I am really concluded by what I said in Riley v. Ellis,² and, with great deference to my learned brethren who did not agree with me in that case, I may say that a repeated consideration of *Riley v. Ellis*² has only confirmed me in my opinion. What was actually decided in *Riley v. Ellis*² has not any application here, but the topics discussed have a great deal to do with this matter. In that case I was speaking of claims arising out of delicts and of

¹ 20 R. 859.² 1910 S. C. 934.

Mar. 19, 1913. the question of arrestment, and I said that actions in respect of slander might be added to actions that would not transmit, and though not so obviously, yet I thought equally safely, claims of damages for personal injuries. Then I continued,—“Now, why is this? It will not do to say because the claim arises out of delict; because admittedly if action was raised for seduction or slander, or damages for personal injury, an arrestment in the hands of the defenders to such an action would be good and the quality of the claim, i.e., as arising out of delict and not out of contract, is obviously not affected by the fact that action is raised.” I think, if I may say so, that I did two things in Riley.¹ I disposed of the idea that the matter was decided by the judgment in the case of Auld v. Shairp,² but I equally clearly said that the opinion of some of the Judges who took part in *Auld v. Shairp*² was adverse to the judgment in the case of Bern's Executor.³

Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
Ld. President.

The extreme case is undoubtedly the opinion of Lord Neaves in Auld v. Shairp.² He holds that the moment that a delict has taken place a civil right is at once vested in the person who is the sufferer by the delict, and that that is part of his patrimony, and transmits just as any other part of his property transmits. I am of opinion that that is unsound law, and I think it is quite clear that that law, in its extreme form, cannot live with the law of Bern's Executor.³ But, then, while I do not go that length, I did in *Riley*¹ go the length of saying that in the case of a delict there is a transmissible right when a claim is made or an action is raised. That there is a transmissible right after the action is raised is admitted by everyone, because there is no question that, if an action has been raised by a man and he dies before the termination of that action, his executors can be assisted as parties. I personally think, for the reasons that I gave in Riley,¹ that the same thing happens when a claim is made. The injured man has then elected to say that he means to enforce a claim for damages. Now, that being my view, it follows that *Bern's Executor*³ does not cover this case. In *Bern's Executor*³ there had been no action by the lady which treated her injuries as giving rise to a claim of damages. She had died without saying anything upon the subject; and therefore the decision in that case is quite consistent with my opinion in Riley.¹ I said in *Riley*¹ that I thought the case of *Bern's Executor*³ was rightly decided, and all the considerations of good sense, I think, point very strongly the same way. Whenever you come to a liability which depends upon reparation which is to be made for personal suffering—whether the suffering is of the purely bodily class, as in the case of injury by accident, or of the mental class, which is represented by slander, or of that still more delicate and still more mixed class which may be represented by seduction—it is, I think, very evident that, if the persons themselves affected do not choose to make a claim, it is very right that nobody else should make it. But if the person has elected to make a claim, then I see no reason why that claim should not transmit like any other estate of the injured person. Accordingly I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was wrong in dismissing the action.

I think there is a very delicate inquiry in front of us here, especially considering the possible application of what was laid down by the House Mar. 19, 1913. of Lords in the case of Darling v. Gray & Sons,¹ and accordingly I think Leigh's it would be inexpedient to go into that matter ab ante. I think the proper Executrix v. Caledonian course will be to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remit to his Railway Co Lordship with instructions to allow a proof.

¹ 1910 S. C. 934.

² 2 R. 191.

³ 20 R. 859.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship. I had occasion to consider this question in the case of Trasill & Sons v. Aktieselskabet Dalbeattie, Limited,² and, as I adhere to what I said on that occasion, I do not think it is necessary, or at all proper, to repeat it. I only wish to add one or two observations for the purpose of considering a point which perhaps did not so directly arise in that case as in the present.

I am still disposed to attach the greatest weight to the very high authority of Lord Wood in Neilson v. Rodger,³ and also of Lord Neaves in *Auld v. Shairp*⁴ in their statement of the general law, but I think that probably Lord Wood's statement must be taken, since the case of Bern's Executor,⁵ with some qualification, which was not necessary for the purpose for which he was applying the law in the actual case, and which may or may not have been at the time present to his mind. The fundamental proposition which Lord Wood lays down, and which I hold to be not only sound in law but obvious, is that a claim for damages or solatium for injury to the person or feelings vests ipso jure in the injured person. So far as he is concerned, I apprehend there can be no doubt; if it did not so vest he could have no action at all, for an action is brought for the purpose of constituting and enforcing rights already vested in the pursuer. If he has no right he has no action. Well, then, his Lordship goes on to say that the right vests prior to any proceedings for decree for its constitution. And then he says that it is a moveable claim and assignable either by positive evidence or implied legal assignation, and passes to personal representatives. Now, if Lord Wood meant only that the action once instituted may pass to the representative of the pursuer on his death, that proposition is abundantly supported by the authority of decisions of this Court and by the authority of the House of Lords in Darling v. Gray & Sons,¹ because in that case the House of Lords expressed no doubt whatever that the deceased pursuer's mother was entitled to be sisted in his room as executrix and to carry on the action instituted by him. And he says the law has long been settled that, when the deceased has instituted an action to enforce his claim, his executor can take up and insist in the process to the effect of recovering damages to which the deceased was entitled. So far, I think, Lord Wood's proposition is beyond doubt. He then goes on to say that it is also assignable, and I must say that I remain of opinion that, if a right is transmissible to executors by law, it is, according to our well-settled legal principles, of necessity assignable by the person from whom it may be legally transmitted. Our law on this subject divides claims into two categories—transmissible, and personal and intransmissible—but there is not to be found in our books the trace of a suggestion that there is a third category—transmissible but not

¹ 19 R. (H. L.) 31.² 6 F. 798.³ 16 D., at p. 329.⁴ 2 R., at pp. 199-200.⁵ 20 R. 859.

Mar. 19, 1913. assignable. According to our system, rights of action are assignable; and if a man's right of action will pass to his executors if he does not deal with it himself, it seems to me to follow that he may deal with it himself during his life, or the law would be that the legal executors of a man have the absolute right to take through him against his will, and excluding his assignees or legatees. So far, therefore, I think there is really no question.

Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Lord Kinnear.

But then there does arise the difficulty to which the Lord President has referred. If the injured person has said nothing about his injury, and intimated no intention of raising an action of damages for it, it is very reasonable to say that his executors and personal representatives have not had an action transmitted to them, because they cannot assume that he treated, or intended to treat, the act of which they complain as a cause of action at all. I think the assumption which may reasonably arise from the possibility of a man having a claim for personal injury ex delicto or quasi ex delicto is totally different from that which arises from his having a claim for an ordinary civil debt. On the death of a creditor it must be assumed that he intended to enforce payment of his debts, unless he has done something to waive his right, and the person who affirms waiver has to prove it. But then I think there may be a very reasonable assumption the other way when an executor proposes to sue for an injury to the personal feelings of the deceased, which the latter has indicated no intention of complaining about at all, because it may very well be the case that a man may have suffered a legal injury, in respect of which he would never think of bringing an action. If he did not choose to complain, why should his executor be entitled to do so? Therefore, if Lord Wood meant that a right of action transmits absolutely without reference to anything that may have been done by the injured person to establish his own intention to constitute his claim, I think the case of *Bern*¹ would be an authority the other way. On the other hand, his doctrine that the right vests, although it may not be actually constituted, is borne out by Darling v. Gray,² because a claim is not constituted by raising an action, but by obtaining a decree. The question therefore comes to be whether the only way in which the injured person can intimate his intention to enforce his right to recover damages is by raising an action. For the reasons which I ventured to give in the case of *Trasill*³ I think the true principle is as put by his Lordship in the chair in the case of Riley,⁴ when he asks, Why is it that the institution of an action is necessary? and answers that question by saying, Because that determines the intention of the injured person to claim the damages due to him.

I think with his Lordship that the argument is not much affected one way or the other by Mr Mackay's very interesting excursus on the Roman law. I cannot say that I entertain any doubt that when the words actio injuriarum are found in the judgments of this Court—and it is a phrase that has been used by a great many of our predecessors, including Lord President Inglis, who was a great civilian—they are used with reference to the law of Scotland, and not with reference to the law of Rome, from which, no doubt, the law of Scotland has borrowed a great deal in matters of prin-

¹ 20 R. 859.

² 19 R. (H. L.) 31.

³ 6 F. 798.

⁴ 1910 S. C. 934.

ciple, but little in the matter of remedy. I think the words are used simply as a convenient Latin term for expressing a class of actions known to our own law. The Judges who began to class them together borrowed a phrase from the Roman jurisprudence, and used it with reference to their own classification of actions, without considering whether in classical usage it was restricted to claims arising out of insult or outrage, to the exclusion of claims founded on negligence, and in so doing I think they followed a common practice both of law language and ordinary language by which Latin terms are employed to express ideas which never were Latin, and so acquire by usage an English or Scottish signification which may be far from identical with their meaning in the original language. Therefore I cannot doubt that the phrase actio injuriarum, used in the cases cited, referred to the actions which Lord Wood describes as actions for bodily suffering and injury to the feelings from wrong by another person.

Mar. 19, 1913.
 Leigh's
 Executrix v.
 Caledonian
 Railway Co.
 Lord Kinnear.

On the remaining matter to be considered I agree entirely with your Lordship that this is a kind of case which, when it proceeds, will involve very delicate questions as to the amount or measure of damages. I think that was foreseen, and is thoroughly discussed by Lord Wood in the case of Neilson.¹ I think they are all questions which can be more satisfactorily decided by a Judge than by a jury. They can be brought under the consideration of a Court of appeal in the former case when they could not be in the latter case, because the jury would have to decide them without giving the reasons, whereas we shall have the reasons of the Judge who tries the case for whatever course he takes.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The Lord Ordinary has dismissed this action on the authority of the cases of *Bern's Executor*² and Boyce.³ There is a specialty in this case which was not present in either of those. The deceased, Ernest Leigh, met with the accident in question on the 25th December 1911. He was knocked down by a van belonging to the defenders, the Caledonian Railway Company. He was removed to the Royal Infirmary, Glasgow, where he died, in consequence of the accident, on 6th January 1912. While in the infirmary, on 28th December 1911, it is averred that he instructed his solicitors to take proceedings to recover from the defenders a sum in name of damages for his injuries and sufferings. His agents accordingly wrote to the Caledonian Railway Company on the same day the letter quoted in cond. 7. In it they said they had been consulted, that they had made inquiries, and were satisfied that the Railway Company were liable, and that they would be glad to hear from the Company at their earliest convenience, and after they had made inquiries, whether or not liability was admitted. It is averred that, on 5th January 1912, the deceased executed a will appointing the pursuer his executrix and universal legatory. It contained this declaration: "I also declare that she is to be entitled to, and to get, any sum of money which may be paid in name of damages or otherwise by the Caledonian Railway Company in respect of the accident I have sustained." No action was raised by the deceased. The present action was raised after his death by the pursuer as his executrix-nominate.

¹ 16 D., at p. 329.

² 20 R. 859.

³ 5 F. 452.

Mar. 19, 1913.

Leigh's
Executrix v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

Now the principle upon which the rule laid down in the case of *Bern's Executor*¹ rests is that an injured person may have excellent reasons for refraining from bringing an action for reparation for bodily injuries. As Lord M'Laren points out,² "the injured party often refrains from pressing his claim, or accepts an inadequate sum of compensation because of his unwillingness to set his face to an inquiry involving the disclosure of facts connected with infirmity of health, losses in business, and the like, disclosures which may be very painful even when not discreditable." The reason therefore why it was held that the executor in *Bern's Executor*¹ had no right, title, or interest to sue for the personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by his wife, is absent here. If an injured person has himself begun the action, the ground of objection to the executor's title as explained in the passage quoted above to a large extent disappears. That is because the injured person has indicated in the clearest way possible, viz., by raising an action, that he intends to make the claim. He may, however, indicate in a perfectly clear manner his intention to insist in the claim, short of the actual signing or service of a summons. I refer to what Lord Kinnear says in the case of *Traill*³: "All that was decided in *Bern's case*¹ is that if a person who has sustained bodily injury through the fault of another dies without taking any step to vindicate a right to reparation, his executor cannot make a claim which during his life he abstained from making. This makes the title of a representative to sue depend upon the intention of the injured person himself to vindicate his right. But the institution of an action is not the only means of manifesting that intention." The question raised in *Traill's case*³ was as to the right of an assignee of a claim by a widow and children for damages for the death of the husband and father arising ex delicto to bring an action in his own name. His title to do so was sustained. The ground of judgment was that the assignation by the injured persons was just as plain an assertion of their right to demand reparation as if they had brought an action in their own name. So in the present case I think that the letter written by the agent, and received by the Railway Company, was a plain assertion by the deceased of his right to demand reparation.

The case of *Boyes*⁴ is distinguishable from the present. There the averment was that the executor-dative, who brought the action, had, as curator bonis of the deceased, given instructions before the death that an action of damages on account of the injuries should be raised. So far as the averment goes, this might have been a mere verbal statement by the curator bonis. No claim was ever made upon the defender in that case before the death. Here it was. In the present case it is not the fact of the injury which creates the civil debt, but the election by the deceased to treat the injury caused him as an actionable wrong, as evidenced by the claim which he made through his agents. I do not think the judgment in the case of *Riley v. Ellis*⁵ adverse to the view I take, and what is there said by the Lord President confirms it. Nor is the decision in *Darling v. Gray & Sons*⁶ in point for the purposes of the present discussion. No doubt that judgment creates a difficulty in the case where dependants desire to make

¹ 20 R. 859.

² 20 R., at p. 863.

³ 6 F. 798, at p. 806.

⁴ 5 F. 452.

⁵ 1910 S. C. 934.

⁶ 19 R. (H. L.) 31.

their claim, when a claim has already been made by the executor. That Mar. 19, 1913. difficulty however would necessarily arise if a summons had been served at Leigh's the instance of the deceased before his death. All that we are here deciding Executrix v. Caledonian Railway Co. is that what the injured person did was equivalent to the serving of a summons.

I therefore think the executrix has a title to sue, and that the first plea Lord Mac-kenzie. in law for the defender should be repelled. In coming to this conclusion, I express no opinion as to the items of damage the pursuer is entitled to recover. Points for argument may arise when the evidence is being taken.

The case does not appear to me to be one suitable for trial by jury.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof of their averments.

HILL MURRAY & BRYDON, S.S.C.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

EDWARD CHARLES ELLICE AND OTHERS, Complainers (Respondents).— No. 113.
Macmillan, K.C.—D. Anderson.

THE INVERGARRY AND FORT AUGUSTUS RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Morison, K.C.—Gentles.

Railway—Powers of Railway Company—Sale of whole permanent way material—Ultra vires.

Mar. 19, 1913.

Ellice v. Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Co.

Held that a railway company which had constructed its line under statutory powers, was not entitled to sell the rails, bridges, and other materials forming its whole permanent way, although it was financially impossible for it to continue to work the undertaking; and interdict granted at the instance of a holder of shares and debenture stock of the company against such a sale.

Observed that different considerations would arise in the case of a company which proposed only to sell the materials of an unremunerative branch line which was no longer in use.

On 8th January 1913 an action of suspension and interdict was brought by the Lochaber District Committee and the Aird District Committee of the County Council of Inverness; Edward Charles Ellice and others, the trustees of the deceased Edward Ellice of Glengarry; Major George James Bailey of Invergloyle; and Edward Charles Ellice, as an individual, against the Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Company. 1st Division. Lord Hunter.

The complainers sought to have the respondents interdicted "from selling or otherwise disposing of the steel rails, cast-iron chairs, fish plates, fish bolts and nuts, spikes, points and crossings, sleepers and keys, comprising the material of the permanent way of the railway belonging to the respondents, and constructed and maintained by them under and in virtue of the Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Act, 1896, 59 and 60 Vict. cap. ccxi., and the Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Act, 1897, 61 and 62 Vict. cap. ccxvii., situated between Spean Bridge and Fort Augustus in the county of Inverness, together with steel bridge work, turntables, water tanks, water columns, signal cabins, signals and signalling apparatus, and station platform buildings, including stores sheds, goods sheds, and engine sheds, or from otherwise taking any steps to dismantle the said railway, or from

Mar. 19, 1913. doing anything which will prevent the respondents from carrying out the provisions of the said Acts or fulfilling their obligations thereunder."

Ellice v.
Invergarry
and Fort
Augustus
Railway Co.

The circumstances in which the note was presented were thus narrated by the Lord President in his opinion:—

"The history of the matter is this. The respondents, the Railway Company, are incorporated under the Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Act, 1896, which provided for the making of a railway and pier in the county of Inverness to be called the Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway, and for other purposes. The works authorised by the Act consisted of, besides the pier, a railway 24 miles roughly in length, which began by a junction with the West Highland Railway near Spean Bridge and terminated near the centre bridge carrying the public road from Invermoriston to Fort Augustus over the River Oich. The railway was constructed, and was for some time worked by the Highland Railway Company under an agreement. At the expiry of the agreement the Highland Railway Company refused to renew it, and the railway was then worked by the North British Railway Company under another agreement up till 31st October 1911. Since that agreement terminated the respondents have been entirely unable to work the railway. They cannot get any of the Scottish railway companies to work it. They have no money to work it themselves, and having come to the conclusion that it was hopeless to suppose that the railway could be worked, they resolved to sell off the whole of the railway plant, and accordingly they inserted an advertisement in the papers on 16th December 1912 to the following effect:—'Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway. Permanent way material, steel girders, and station equipment for sale.' And they then say that they are prepared to sell the rails, chairs, &c., &c., comprising the material of the permanent way of the railway situated between Spean Bridge and Fort Augustus, together with the steel bridge work, turntables, &c., &c., the length of the single line, exclusive of loops and sidings, being about 24 miles."

In their averments the complainers quoted sections of the Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Act, which empowered the Company to divert certain roads, and imposed on the Company an obligation to construct and to maintain permanently certain bridges, cattle creeps, level-crossings, &c. They also quoted a section which imposed on the Company an obligation, in favour of the trustees of the late Edward Ellice of Glengarry, to erect and maintain a station at Loch Oich, and to stop all ordinary trains there. They averred that the proposed sale would disable the Company from fulfilling these various obligations, and also their public duties, and would thus be greatly to the prejudice of the interests of the complainers. They also averred that such a dismantling and abandonment of the railway was only competent with the sanction of Parliament, which the Company had not obtained.

When the case was in the Inner House certain amendments to the note were allowed, by which Edward Charles Ellice was added as a complainer "as an individual," and averments were added in which he stated that he was a holder of ordinary shares and debenture stock of the Company; that the permanent way was part of the security of the debenture stockholders; that neither the shareholders nor the debenture stockholders had been consulted about the proposed sale; and that the Company had no power to carry through the sale, which would be greatly to the prejudice of the shareholders and debenture stockholders. Mar. 19, 1913.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The actings of the respondents as condescended on being illegal and ultra vires, the complainers are entitled to interdict, as craved. (2) The proceedings complained of being illegal and contrary to the provisions of the statutes under which the respondents are incorporated, interdict should be granted as craved. (3) The respondents not having any right to discontinue the said railway or to dissolve the said Railway Company, et separatim the same being contrary to their said statutes, the complainers are entitled to interdict as craved. (4) The respondents having no right to dismantle the said railway or to abandon their said undertaking without making provision for the maintenance of the works constructed under the said Acts, interdict should be granted, as craved. (5) The actings of the respondents being in breach of their statutory obligations to the complainers, interdict should be granted as craved. The following plea was added by amendment:—(5A) The undertaking of the respondents being subject to a statutory charge in favour of the debenture stockholders, the respondents are not entitled at their own hand to carry out the proposed sale.

Ellice v.
Invergarry
and Fort
Augustus
Railway Co.

The respondents pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The complainers' material averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the prayer of the note. (3) The actings of the respondents being legal and intra vires, the prayer of the note should be refused. (4) The proceedings complained of being legal and within the respondents' statutory rights as a Railway Company, the prayer of the note should be refused.

On 5th February 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) passed the note and granted interim interdict.

The respondents reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 28th February and 1st March 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—It was not maintained that the Company could be abandoned or wound up without parliamentary powers. But the proposed sale was not an abandonment; it was merely a prudent administrative step taken with a view to the price obtained being added to the other assets of the Company, and applied to lawful purposes—if necessary with the authority of Parliament. It might eventually be applied—if more favourable circumstances should arise—towards the expense of relaying the line. Moreover, it was a step not uncommon with railway companies to discontinue a branch line, such as the line here in question. No one could compel the Company to run trains, and, when circumstances made such running impossible, the only alternative to taking advantage of a favourable market and realising the value of the permanent way material was to allow the material to deteriorate. It was suggested that the whole undertaking might be taken over and worked by another company, but the only offer of that kind received was one at a price less than the break-up value of the permanent way materials. There was no proposal to interfere with any of the roads or bridges, but without the money to be obtained from the proposed sale the Company could not continue to implement their obligations as to these. With reference to these obligations, and the liabilities of the Company generally, the conversion of deteriorating subjects into cash was to the advantage of the

Mar. 19, 1913. Ellice v. Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Co. complainers and the general body of creditors; and the complainers were not entitled to interdict such conversion unless they could show that the dismantling of the line was to the prejudice not of one complainer only, but of the general body of those interested. Interdict was not the appropriate remedy for debenture-holders or shareholders, their remedy being to have the policy of the directors reviewed at a meeting of the shareholders. The reclaimers' Act was not obligatory, but permissive, with reference to the construction of their line,¹ and it imposed no obligation to maintain the line, or to restore it if in disrepair.²

Argued for the respondents;—The sale would make it impossible for the Company to carry out the purposes for which it had obtained statutory powers, and the abandonment of these purposes was ultra vires of the Company. The case of *York and North Midland Railway Company v. The Queen*³ was distinguishable, because in that case the line in question had not been made. That the line of the Company was only a branch line did not affect the present question, because it was their whole system, and the case was exactly the same as if any great railway company proposed to dismantle its whole permanent way. Demolition was not an act of administration of a trust-estate; and the directors of a railway company were really trustees for the public, because Parliament only granted powers for the construction of a railway where it was for the public interest. Railways were originally formed as public highways, on which members of the public might use their own engines and wagons. Even as they now existed the parties interested in them were represented by the shareholders, heritable proprietors, and the public. That Parliament did not intend to confer upon railway companies any power to abandon their undertakings and sell their materials was clear from the express exclusion of the closing of railways from the purposes for which a company was authorised to make regulations.⁴ The provisions of the Companies Acts for the winding-up of companies did not apply to the determination of railway undertakings, and these could not be abandoned without parliamentary sanction.⁵ It was because Parliament intended public interests to be paramount, and the existence of the line to be maintained, that railway companies were protected from diligence. Further, the special obligation undertaken by the Company in favour of the trustees of Edward Ellice of Glengarry to

¹ York and North Midland Railway Co. v. The Queen, (1853) 1 E. & B. 858, Jervis, C.J., at pp. 860 and 863-4, 22 L. J., Q. B. 225.

² The Queen v. Great Western Railway Co., (1893) 62 L. J., Q. B. 572, 69 L. T. 443, 572; Darlaston Local Board v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1894] 2 Q. B. 694.

³ 1 E. & B. 858.

⁴ Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 101.

⁵ Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 105; Renfield v. Corporation of Wickham, (1888) 13 App. Cas. 467, Lord Watson, at p. 474; Dundee Union Bank v. Dundee and Newtyle Railway Co., (1844) 6 D. 521, Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, at pp. 525 and 527, Lord Cockburn, at p. 529; Potts v. Warwick and Birmingham Canal Navigation Co., (1853) Kay, 142; In re Barton-upon-Humber and District Water Co., (1889) 42 Ch. D. 585, North, J., at pp. 587-8; Furness v. The Caterham Railway Co., (1859) 27 Beav. 358; Sale of Railways Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 96); Lindley on Companies, (6th ed.) p. 216.

maintain a station could not be fulfilled without an effective line¹; Mar. 19, 1913. and the Company's undertaking, upon which the debenture-holders had a charge,² could not be converted to the purposes of an investment company, nor could it be dismantled and wound up, without parliamentary powers.³ Therefore the complainers were entitled to interdict in order to prevent the Company taking steps which would involve the abandonment of their undertaking at their own hand. If the Company applied to Parliament for powers to abandon their undertaking their present averments would then be relevant, and the complainers would have an opportunity of defending their own rights.

Ellice v.
Invergarry
and Fort
Augustus
Railway Co.

At advising on 19th March 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After narrating the circumstances, and the nature of the proposed sale]—Now it is admitted that this proposal means dismantling the whole railway, and that, if the sale is carried through, the railway as a railway in the ordinary sense of the word will cease to exist, though no doubt there will still be the strip of ground on which the railway once was. That the Lord Ordinary was right in passing the note and in granting interim interdict cannot be doubted, and, if this had been an ordinary case, we should simply have adhered to his interlocutor; but when parties came to be heard it became quite obvious that it would be very expedient that they should be allowed to get a final judgment upon the matter at once. It also became equally obvious that we really had the whole facts before us and that nothing would be truly gained by making up a record in the ordinary way in the Court of Session. While that was so, your Lordships thought that there was considerable doubt as to the title of some of the parties to the case, and as we were informed that Captain Ellice was not only, as he appeared in the original note, a trustee of the late Edward Ellice, but also that he as an individual was a shareholder, we invited him to put in a minute of amendment. A minute of sist and amendment was accordingly put in by which Captain Ellice was sisted to the action as an individual, and the statement is also added that he is the holder of 222 shares of £10 each and £606, 5s. debenture stock of the Company. The Company admitted those facts and made no objection to the minute of sist and amendment.

Your Lordships are therefore now in a position to deal with the case as effectively as if it were here upon a record made up in the Court of Session, and it is eminently expedient that we should so deal with it. The Company in this matter are perfectly frank. The justification for what they are doing is, according to them, this—and the truth of what I am now going to state is really not controverted by the other side—they say: "Experience has shown us that we have not got the slightest chance at present of

¹ In re Ruthin and Cerrig-y-Druidion Railway Act, (1886) 32 Ch. D. 438, Cotton, L.J., at p. 443; In re Southport and Lytham Tramroad Act, 1900, [1911] 1 Ch. 120, Buckley, L.J., at p. 134.

² Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 118), secs. 22 and 23.

³ Haldane v. Rushton, &c., (1881) 9 R. 253, Lord President Inglis, at p. 256; Muir v. Forman's Trustees, (1903) 5 F. 546, Lord Kinnear, at p. 571; Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., (1867) L. R., 2 Ch. 201, Cairns, L.J., at pp. 214-5 and 216-7.

Mar. 19, 1913. working the railway. We have attempted to get a working agreement out of the North British. We cannot. We cannot get one out of the Highland. It is not to be supposed that any other Scottish railway will want to work this railway branch, the line from Fort Augustus to Spean Bridge, and we have no money and no possibility of raising any money to do it ourselves. The result is that the whole of our railway plant is being subjected to rapid deterioration. The rails are very much more attacked by oxidation when they are not used than when they are used, and the only result of leaving things as they are is that the plant, in a very little time, will perish entirely. It is better policy for us therefore—the market at present being a good one for steel rails—to turn our plant into money, and having got the money, to await the course of events. If times change and for some reason or other we can raise money, we can always put the plant back again, and we will be in a better position to do so if we have the money in our pocket than we should be if we were now to allow the whole line to go to wreck and ruin.”

Ellice v.
Invergarry
and Fort
Augustus
Railway Co.
—
Ld. President.

Now, as I have said, the truth of that statement and the bona fides of it are really not controverted by the complainers, but what they maintain is that the proposal to dismantle the railway is a proceeding which is entirely ultra vires and which must be restrained. As I have already indicated, your Lordships had considerable doubts as to the title of the two County Council Committees to raise any such question. The only way in which they could say that they had a title was this: they pointed out that in connection with their undertaking the Company were empowered to alter roads, to construct bridges, and to divert certain highways, and that, in the interests of the public, they, the County Council Committees, were bound to see that these bridges, level-crossings, and road diversions were properly maintained. Well, that, I think, is a slender matter on which to support a title for raising this question, because it was explained that there was no intention of selling any bridge where the bridge is an overline bridge. Those bridges were to be left. Where, on the other hand, it is an underline bridge the only effect of its removal would be to leave the road open to the heavens instead of being under a bridge. Then, so far as the maintenance of the road diversions is concerned, probably the Committees would have very much better security for the performance of that obligation if the Company were allowed to have a sum of money in the bank than they would have if the Company were left there with a set of rusty rails. I do not think, however, that we need particularly trouble ourselves about the question of title, because it is perfectly clear that Captain Ellice as a shareholder and debenture-holder has a good title to interfere with anything that is ultra vires. So far as it is an act of management he has no title to interfere, because the directors are the proper persons to manage the railway, but if the directors propose to do something that is ultra vires then his title to interfere is undoubted.

The Company's argument on the merits was chiefly rested on this: they said that it had been decided again and again, and that it was now trite law that the clause in the special Act, “may make and maintain,” was not obligatory, but permissive, and that although you get the power to make a railway and maintain it, you are not bound to make it or, having made it, to maintain it. I think that is perfectly true. I need not go into the authorities which were quoted to us, because it has been so held in the Courts of both countries. A railway undertaking is in a very curious position. It is, as your Lordships know, exempt from ordinary diligence. The ground of a railway may not be adjudged. The rolling stock is protected by special Act, and the undertaking as a whole cannot in any way be broken up by the action of creditors using the ordinary forms of diligence. All that was settled in the well-known case of Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company,¹ and was subsequently given effect to in our own Courts in the case of Haldane v. The Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway Company.² That being so, and the idea of the railway being that it should be kept as an undertaking for the public—originally, no doubt, with the intention that the public themselves might use it as a highway with their own carriages, though that form of use, which is to be found in all the older railway statutes, has practically long ago gone into desuetude—I am of opinion that it is ultra vires for the directors by their own act to put an end to the railway as a railway, and that that is a different thing from saying that they are bound to run it. That they cannot be compelled to run the railway has been settled, as I have said, quite clearly, and one can easily see the reason. If they were bound to continue the railway, I suppose there would be a decree against them ordering them to do so, and if they did not obtemper it they would be put in prison. It would be a hard case indeed for the directors of a railway company if they were to be put in prison, where there was no possibility of their working the railway, for want of money to run it. But that is a totally different thing from saying that they are entitled at their own hand to put an end to the railway as a railway. If this sale is carried through there will no longer be such a thing as the Fort Augustus Railway. No doubt there will still be the Fort Augustus Railway Company, and there will still be a strip of ground on which the Fort Augustus Railway used to run, but the Fort Augustus Railway there will not be. Now, I cannot bring myself to think that that is within their power. It may be that this railway has no future at all, but then I think the only answer to that is that the Company must go to Parliament to get fresh powers. That the Legislature looks upon it in that light is also, I think, to be inferred from the preamble of the Abandonment of Railways Act, 1850.³ You do not require an Act of Parliament to allow you to abandon other undertakings. You do require it in order to abandon a railway. And that again just makes clear the point that once a railway has been established it is to a certain extent an asset of the public as well as an asset of the particular company.

I need scarcely say that if there was any question that what was being done here was a question of ordinary management, my view would be perfectly different, and accordingly my opinion now must not be held to cover such a case, for instance, as a large railway choosing to give up the working of an unremunerative branch, and then proceeding, perhaps, to sell the rails

¹ L. R., 2 Ch. 201.

² (1881) 8 R. 669.

³ 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 83.

Mar. 19, 1913.
Ellice v.
Invergarry
and Fort
Augustus
Railway Co.
 Ld. President.

Mar. 19, 1913. and bolts. That would not be putting their undertaking out of existence; it would be merely an act of management. But here we are not hampered with any such question, because it is frankly admitted that this is a sale of the whole railway, and that if it is carried out no railway will be left at all.

Ellice v.
Invergarry
and Fort
Augustus
Railway Co.

Ld. President.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that we should affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. Technically speaking, as we are in the Bill Chamber, we cannot make the interdict perpetual. The next stage, therefore, would be that the case should go back to the Lord Ordinary in order that a record may be made up, and then on that record perpetual interdict might be granted; but our interlocutor affirming the judgment of the Lord Ordinary and remitting the case to him in order that the record may be made up, will give an opportunity to the Railway Company of taking our judgment to the House of Lords, if they wish to, and of getting judgment upon what is really the merits of the case at once.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The Invergarry and Fort Augustus Railway Company propose to sell the rails and other material forming the permanent way of their line between Spean Bridge and Fort Augustus, together with the steel bridge work, &c., as advertised. Regarded solely as a business proposition there is much to be said for what the board desire to do. We were informed that no train has run on the line since October 1911, and that there is no prospect of trains being run; the rails are rusting and deteriorating in value; the time is said to be opportune for realisation; and the Company's counsel stated that a better price could be got at the present time for the materials than was offered by the North British Railway for the undertaking as a whole. If, therefore, the question were one of the prudent administration by an individual of his property, it would probably be said that the best thing to do in the circumstances would be to turn assets which are at present unproductive and depreciating in value into cash, and hold the land to await developments in the future.

The Company is, however, not in the same position as an individual. The railway is a public undertaking and the sole question before us is whether the proposed sale is ultra vires. The Company is quite frank about the matter. The total length of their line is 24 miles, and it is the rails on these 24 miles that they propose to sell, with their adjuncts. They are not selling them because they are worn out and need to be renewed. It is a case of realisation pure and simple. What they mean to do is to dismantle the whole line. The 24 miles in question do not form part of a larger system worked by the same company. It is not a case of a going concern ceasing to use a dead branch. The 24 miles of rails constitute the whole undertaking; the permanent way is the substratum of this Company. If they were lifted and carried away the Railway Company would be relegated to the position of landowners merely; the sale by the directors of the rails would not be an act of administration by them as railway managers, but would be a transaction into which any metal broker might enter. The position of the board is thus quite different from what it would be if the question raised was as to their duty to make, or work and maintain, the line authorised by their special Act. There is abundant authority to the effect that they could resist any attempt to force them to do either the one or the other. The powers conferred by the statute are permissive only.

Mar. 19, 1913.

Ellice v.
Invergarry
and Fort
Augustus
Railway Co.

The question raised here is whether the Company can by its own act, and at its own hand, put it out of its power to fulfil those duties for the discharge of which it was incorporated by Act of Parliament. It may be that the directors are doing no more than their duty by the shareholders, and even the debenture-holders, for the price might, under orders of the Court, be treated as a surrogatum for the materials. It may be that matters are in such a position that no prejudice would be suffered by any members of the public, for, if no train is to be run, it would not matter whether the Company had metal or money. These considerations, however, are not relevant when the Company has made a contract with the public under public sanction. The undertaking owes its existence to statute, and by statute only can its existence be terminated. There is careful provision made by statute for the steps which must be taken before a railway undertaking can be abandoned. What the Company seeks to do here is really equivalent to abandoning the undertaking as a railway. Once that conclusion is reached it follows that it must comply with the statutory enactments before it can effect its purpose. If it does not the powers of the directors remain merely powers of administration, which may be defined as the transaction of the Company's legitimate business in the way in which business is usually carried on by other people. They have not power to alienate. The reason why the undertaking of the Company is protected against the diligence of the creditors is because Parliament has given effect by enactment to its intention that a railway shall be permanent. The Company cannot itself sell, and this is the reason why it cannot create such a security in favour of a creditor as would enable him to destroy the undertaking. The remedy provided in the interest of debenture-holders of the appointment of a receiver indicates the policy of the Legislature. I am of opinion that there is sufficient to warrant the Court in sustaining the title of the complainers, and in holding that the note should be passed, and the interim interdict continued.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

It is therefore not necessary to go into other points which were argued, but I may add that the Company failed, in my opinion, to answer the pertinent question put by the other side in regard to their power to dispose of the proceeds of the sale without going to Parliament.

THE COURT of new granted interim interdict and remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and, on the motion of counsel for the reclaimers, granted leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

No. 114. COOPER CORBRIDGE (Samuel Wallace May Somerville's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Lennan, K.C.—J. B. Young.
 Mar. 19, 1913. MRS CAROLINE STUART MAY SOMERVILLE, Defender (Reclaimer).—
Fleming, K.C.—Macmillan, K.C.—Howden.
 Corbridge v. Somerville.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Reduction of decree—Competency—Reduction on ground of no jurisdiction at instance of creditors of divorced spouse.

The trustee on the bankrupt estate of a husband divorced in the Court of Session, desiring to recover certain marriage-contract funds which, as a result of the divorce, had become payable to the wife, brought an action for reduction of the decree of divorce on the ground that, the husband being a domiciled Englishman, the Court which pronounced the decree had no jurisdiction. The action of divorce had been undefended, and, although brought after the date of the husband's bankruptcy, had not been intimated to the trustee.

Held (dub. Lord Johnston) that the action of reduction was competent, in respect that the pursuer was not attacking the decree on its merits, but was merely maintaining that, having been pronounced by a Court having no jurisdiction, it was of no effect; but observed that his better course would have been to bring a petitory action against the marriage-contract trustees and challenge the decree of divorce ope exceptionis in that action.

Husband and Wife—Consistorial causes—Rules of Commissary Court.

Observed that the rules laid down with regard to consistorial causes by the Commissaries are not binding on the Court of Session.

1st DIVISION. ON 27th November 1911 Cooper Corbridge, chartered accountant in Lord Cullen. London, as trustee in the bankruptcy of Samuel Wallace May Somerville, residing in Cornwall, brought an action against the bankrupt's former wife, Mrs Caroline Stuart May Somerville, and the bankrupt, for reduction of a decree of divorce pronounced against the bankrupt by Lord Dewar on 18th June 1910.

The pursuer's averments were thus summarised by the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) in his opinion:—

"The pursuer of this action is the trustee on the bankrupt estate of Samuel Wallace May Somerville under an adjudication of bankruptcy in England. He was appointed in January 1910. Mr Somerville was then married to the present compearing defender, Mrs Caroline Stuart Smith or May Somerville, the marriage having taken place in 1899. By a postnuptial settlement executed by Mr Somerville in 1900 certain funds belonging to him were put in trust for the purpose, inter alia, that in the event of his dying survived by Mrs Somerville the income thereof should be paid to her during her survivorship, restrictible to one-half in the event of her entering into a second marriage. The trust funds in question are held by trustees in Scotland.

"In May 1910 Mrs Somerville raised, in this Court, an action of divorce on the ground of adultery against her husband. He did not defend. The action depended before Lord Dewar, who, after hearing the proof tendered by the pursuer, granted, on 18th June 1910, decree of divorce. The proof led in the action was directed, inter alia, to establishing that the domicile of the spouses was in Scotland. It is common ground in the present case that the patrimonial consequence of the decree of divorce is to divert the income of the foresaid trust funds from Mr Somerville, the bankrupt, to the defender.

"The action of divorce was not intimated to the present pursuer, who states that he was ignorant of it until after the decree in absence had been pronounced. In this action he seeks to reduce that decree. The ground of reduction is that this Court had no jurisdiction to pronounce it in respect that the domicile of the spouses at the time was in England. The pursuer makes detailed averments on this head, which are relevant to be remitted to probation." *

Mar. 19, 1913.
Corbridge v.
Somerville.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—1. The pursuer, as trustee in the bankruptcy of the said Samuel Wallace May Somerville, is entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for in respect that (1) the said Samuel Wallace May Somerville not having been a domiciled Scotsman at the date of the divorce proceedings, the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to grant the pretended decree of divorce, and said decree of divorce is null and void. (2) Said decree was obtained in absence, without the pursuer being informed of the divorce proceedings or having any opportunity of opposing the same, and without the whole facts and circumstances being fully disclosed to the Court. 3. The said decree of divorce being to the gross prejudice of the pursuer, as trustee for the creditors in said bankruptcy, he has a title and interest to reduce the same.

The defender, Mrs Caroline Stuart May Somerville, alone appeared to defend the action, and pleaded;—1. No title to sue. 2. The action is incompetent in respect that (1) the said decree of divorce having become final on the expiry of a year and a day from the date thereof, is not liable to be reduced. (2) Esto that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to pronounce said decree of divorce, there having been no subsequent change of domicile by the said S. W. May Somerville, the Court has no jurisdiction to reduce said decree. 3. The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. 4. The said S. W. May Somerville having been a domiciled Scotsman at the date of the said decree of divorce, the Court of Session had jurisdiction to pronounce said decree, and said decree is valid and ought not to be reduced.

On 19th June 1912 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor repelling the first three pleas in law for the compearing defender, and allowing a proof.†

* The pursuer also averred that, had the action of divorce been intimated to him, he would have appeared to oppose it on the ground of no jurisdiction; that in the action of divorce it was not disclosed that the husband was a bankrupt; and that the husband's object in not defending the action was to deprive his creditors of the income from the trust funds, in the expectation that his wife would, after divorce, make him an allowance out of these funds, which in fact she was doing.

† "OPINION.—[After the narrative quoted supra].—The question, however, is raised whether the pursuer has a title to insist in the action. While the action of divorce related to the status of the spouses, the present pursuer, had he known of its dependence, might, in respect of the patrimonial interests involved in it, have appeared and obtained himself sisted as a defender. There is, on the authorities, no room for doubt that, while the jurisdiction in consistorial causes lay with the Commissaries, the right of creditors of a defender in an action of divorce to appear and defend was fully admitted. The latest of the reported cases is that of Greenhill v. Ford, 1 Shaw, 296 (275), 2 Shaw's App. 435. So far as I am aware, there is no example of such procedure to be found in any reported case since the

Mar. 19, 1912.

Corbidge v.
Somerville.

The compearing defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 16th and 17th October 1912.

Argued for the claimer;—(1) On title to sue.—The creditors of a married man were to be regarded as having accepted all risks incidental to the married state, including that of a loss of patrimonial rights in the event of decree of divorce being pronounced against their creditor.¹ The case of *Greenhill v. Ford*² did not warrant the Lord Ordinary's conclusion, because in the present case the decree which the pursuer sought to reduce was not qualified by any reservation as to patrimonial rights.³ The pursuer would not have had a title to sue before the Commissaries, because it was only on grounds of collusion or condonation, neither of which were pleaded here, that creditors of a divorced spouse could sue for reduction of the decree⁴ during a period of a year and a day—the period during which status remained unaltered as in the case of a decree nisi in the English transfer of the jurisdiction to this Court. But neither in the Act of 1830 nor in any subsequent statutes do I find anything to abrogate this right on the part of creditors. There is, it is true, no requirement of intimation to them, but there seems equally to have been no such requirement in the time of the Commissary Court. The right of creditors to defend is stated both by Lord Fraser (Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. ii. 1225) and by Mr Mackay (Manual of Practice, 478).

"If I am right in thinking that the pursuer could competently have asked to be sisted as a defender in the action of divorce, the next question which arises is whether it is not competent to him to bring this action of reduction of the decree in absence with the object of urging the plea of no jurisdiction as one which he might have proposed by way of defence to the action.

"The ground of discussion has been so far limited by the position taken up in argument by the defender's counsel, who expressly conceded that the pursuer had a title to challenge the decree of divorce, provided he did so on certain grounds. These grounds were stated to be collusion between the spouses or fraud of any kind attending the proceedings for divorce. Now, this being a reduction of a decree in absence, the grounds of reduction competent to the pursuer must, I take it, be commensurate with the grounds of defence which he might have urged had he compeared to defend the divorce action. And thus the question is whether the pursuer, had he compeared in the divorce action, could not competently have proposed the defence of no jurisdiction. I have been unable to find any authority for the distinction advanced by the defender. Such authority as there is on the subject goes to negative it. The rule which obtained in the Commissary Court is stated in Lothian's Consistorial Law (p. 168), in these terms:—'It is competent not merely to the party accused of adultery, but to creditors interested to prevent a decree of divorce going out against their debtor, to sist themselves as defenders, and to propound all defences competent to their debtor.' The italics of the word all are the author's. Shand (Practice, i. 435), in dealing with the defence of remissio injuriæ, remarks that it is available to creditors. Lord Fraser (Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. ii. 1225) says: 'Should the husband be bankrupt, his creditors cannot prevent

¹ Fraser, Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. ii. pp. 1146, 1196, 1225-6; Johnstone-Beattie v. Dalzell and Others, (1868) 6 Macph. 333; Lothian's Consistorial Law, p. 169; Mackay's Manual of Practice, p. 478.

² (1822) 1 S. 296, N. E. 275.

³ Greenhill v. Aitken, (1824) 2 Sh. App. 435, at p. 444.

⁴ Creditors of Watson v. Cruikshank, (1681) M. 330; Bell's Prin. sec. 1534; Bell's Com. (7th ed.) i. p. 680; Ersk. i. 6, 45.

Courts. If the pursuer sought to set up a title to sue upon principles which prevailed before the Commissaries, then these principles would have to be applied in all respects, and, being so applied, the present action fell to be dismissed as it had not been brought within a year and a day of the decree of divorce.¹ That such a decree affected the pecuniary interests of the guilty spouse was not a ground upon which a trustee for creditors could intervene, because creditors had no right to appear such as children had, or next of kin called to represent a spouse who could not be found.² Even in the case of such parties a mere patrimonial interest did not give a title to sue in an action such as the present,³ there being no plea of fraud upon the Court. Since the transfer of consistorial causes from the Commissaries to the Court of Session⁴ there was no instance in an action of divorce of intimation to the trustee in bankruptcy of a spouse. Interests which might have called for such intimation as being decree of divorce going out in the usual terms, except by stating some of the defences competent to the husband himself.' Mr Mackay (Manual, p. 478) says: 'Creditors of the principal defender may also state defences,' without adverting to any distinction as to the grounds of defence competent to them. In the latest of the reported cases, Greenhill v. Ford (supra cit.), I find that the grounds of defence put forward by the trustee in bankruptcy of the husband and defender were (1) no evidence of the alleged adultery; (2) collusion; (3) remissio injuriæ. It would therefore appear that the distinction advanced by the defender—that is to say, between collusion or fraud, and other grounds of defence, does not hold good as regards a defence by creditors to a divorce suit. And if this be so, I do not see why it should obtain in reductive proceedings for opening up a decree of divorce in absence.

Mar. 19, 1913.
Corbridge v.
Somerville.

"In the ordinary case where someone who has not been called as a defender to an action, but who has a sufficient interest to be sisted so that he may defend it, does not become aware of the dependence of the action, and does not therefore come forward, he may plead against the decree that it is res inter alios acta and not a judgment binding on him. But it would appear that if creditors of a defender in an action of divorce wish to avert the patrimonial consequences of a decree against him they must oppose the divorce itself—(Greenhill v. Ford, supra cit.; Fraser, Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. ii. 1225). Standing the decree of divorce, the patrimonial consequences follow ex lege in a question both with the defender and with his or her creditors. Accordingly, if I am right in thinking that the present pursuer could competently have asked to be sisted in the divorce action, and have proponed therein his plea of no jurisdiction, it seems to follow that he is in titulo to open up the decree in absence by this reduction, so that he may have an opportunity of making his plea good. If he cannot do so, it would appear that he has no remedy at all. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the defender's plea of no title to sue fails.

"In her second plea in law the defender pleads, inter alia, that the action is incompetent in respect that the decree of divorce became final on the lapse of year and day from its date. This plea refers to the 'Instructions' to the Commissaries, and renews the controversy as to whether the finality after year and day thereby attached to decrees of the Commissary Court attaches to decrees of this Court. I had occasion to consider a similar plea in the recent case of Walker v. Walker, 1911 S. C. 163, when I was of

¹ Donald v. Thom, (1823) 2 S. 312, N. E. 275; Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c., (1876) 3 R. 882.

² Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 86), sec. 10.

³ Menzies v. Menzies, (1835) 14 S. 47, Lord Medwyn, at p. 51.

⁴ Jury Trial Act, 1830 (11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. cap. 69), sec. 33.

Mar. 19, 1913. exposed to the risk of fraud were safeguarded, because the Lord Advocate could enter appearance in actions of divorce, and the Court could direct the papers in such actions to be laid before him.¹ Though a party, against whom there had been obtained a decree in absence upon which a charge could not follow, might sue for reduction within twenty years from its date,² a third party had no title to sue for reduction of such a decree. (2) On the competency of the action.—The present pursuer lost his opportunity when the action of divorce was made public by intimation on the Walls and in the Minute-book. For the purpose of his ground of action the decree was not to be regarded as a decree in absence, because it was pronounced causa cognita after the Lord Ordinary had investigated the question of jurisdiction, and was truly a decree in foro though not in foro contentioso. In the absence of averments of fraud upon the Court it was not competent to reinvestigate the question of jurisdiction on the merits³; but that was what the pursuer sought to do here, having failed in a previous action⁴ to attain his object otherwise. The decree was to be regarded as res judicata by a competent Court, and it could not be set aside unless on the ground of fraud. If the defender were not found entitled to succeed on her first plea, the first branch of her second plea should be sustained.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) On title to sue.—It could not be said on the authority of the case of *Johnstone-Beattie v. Dalzell and Others*⁵ that the creditors of a married man took the risk of decree of divorce being pronounced against him, because it was the duty of the pursuer in an action of divorce against a bankrupt husband to intimate the action to the trustee in bankruptcy. The present pursuer was not made aware of the action in which the decree was pronounced which he now sought to reduce. Had he received intimation he could have appeared, and, if he had done so, then it was admitted that fraud upon the Court would have been the only ground upon which he could now have obtained reduction of the decree. But as the decree was obtained without intimation to the pursuer, it was ineffectual in a question with him.⁶ All the pleas which he could have stated if he had appeared were still open to him. Accordingly he had a title to sue in the present action, in which he accepted the onus of showing that the decree should be set aside.⁷ (2) On the com- opinion that it was not well founded. The case went to the Inner House, but the plea in question was not resumed there, so that the case does not contain any authoritative judgment on the point. As, however, I do not see any reason to change the view which I there expressed, I shall repel the plea.

“The second branch of the second plea for the defender is intended to be founded on the case of Longworth v. Yelverton, 7 Macph. 70. As, however, the defender is maintaining the existence of a Scottish domicile, and therefore has no plea of no jurisdiction, and as the decree now sought to be opened up is a decree in absence, I do not see the application of that decision. Following the views which I have expressed, I shall repel the first three pleas for the defender and allow a proof.”

¹ Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 1861, sec. 8.

² Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 24.

³ Walker v. Walker, 1911 S. C. 163, Lord President, at p. 170.

⁴ Corbridge v. Somerville's Trustees, 1911 S. C. 1326.

⁵ 6 Macph. 333.

⁶ Blake v. Blake, (1826) 4 S. 495, N. E. 803.

⁷ Stewart v. Stewart, (1863) 1 Macph. 449.

petency of the action.—If the pursuer had had an opportunity of appearing in the action of divorce he could have defended, not only upon all grounds competent to the bankrupt,¹ or on the ground of fraud upon the Court, but also on the ground of condonation or collusion,² in order to avoid a decree which would carry off the whole of the bankrupt's estate. For that purpose a trustee for creditors might have pleaded condonation or collusion with reference to a decree of the Commissaries, and a plea of no jurisdiction could not be in a less favourable position with reference to the decree of the Court of Session which the pursuer now sought to reduce than pleas of condonation or collusion with reference to decrees of the Commissaries.³ The Instruction to Commissaries of 1563 as to finality of decrees after the expiry of a year and day did not obtain with respect to decrees of the Court of Session in causes where the jurisdiction had been transferred from the Commissaries to that Court.⁴ Next of kin could sist themselves for the purpose of upholding a judgment obtained without intimation to them, or even for the purpose of getting such a judgment reversed,⁵ and creditors had the same right. The decree in question was a nullity, and the pursuer relevantly averred facts which were not before the Lord Ordinary in the action in which it was pronounced, and having been pronounced in absence it was open to reduction within twenty years. That decree would under no circumstances be accepted by the English Courts as deciding the question of divorce,⁶ because permanent domicile of the spouses within the territory was necessary to give to its Courts jurisdiction to pronounce a decree that would be so accepted.⁷ If the pursuer were sued in England by creditors of the bankrupt claiming payment from the income to which the bankrupt was entitled under his marriage-settlement, the Scotch decree of divorce, if pleaded in defence, might be successfully met by a plea that the Court which pronounced it had no jurisdiction.⁸ It was accordingly out of the question that such a decree should be allowed still to formally stand, and as it was only in Scotland that formal reduction could be granted, the present action was the appropriate procedure.

At advising on 19th March 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer in this case is the trustee on the bankrupt estate of a Mr Somerville, under an adjudication of bankruptcy in England. Mr Somerville was married to the present compearing defender, Mrs Somerville; and, by a postnuptial settlement executed by him, certain funds belonging to him were put in trust for the purpose, inter alia, that in the event of his dying survived by his wife the income thereof should be

¹ Lothian's Consistorial Law, 168.

² Greenhill v. Ford, (1822) 1 S. 296, N. E. 275; Greenhill v. Aitken, 2 Sh. App. 435.

³ Creditors of Watson v. Cruikshank, M. 330; Fraser, Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) 1184, 1225. The Lord President referred to Pemberton v. Hughes, [1899] 1 Ch. 781.

⁴ Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c., (1876) 3 R. 882; Walker v. Walker, 1911 S. C. 163.

⁵ Fraser, Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. ii. 1146.

⁶ Bonaparte v. Bonaparte, [1892] P. 402, Gorell Barnes, J., at pp. 409-10.

⁷ Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier, [1895] A. C. 517.

⁸ Pemberton v. Hughes, [1899] 1 Ch. 781, Lindley, M.R., at p. 791.

Mar. 19, 1913. paid to her during her survivance. These trust funds are held by trustees in Scotland, and naturally, during the subsistence of the marriage, the interest of them was payable to him, and consequently became payable on his bankruptcy to the present pursuer. In 1910 Mrs Somerville raised an action in the Court of Session for divorce on the ground of adultery against her husband. The action was undefended, and decree was granted. In the proof which was led in the action certain facts were inquired into with a view of showing the Lord Ordinary that he was entitled to pronounce the decree in respect that the domicile of the husband was Scotch. That decree having been pronounced, the trustees under the marriage-contract intimated to the pursuer that they could no longer pay to him the interest of these funds, because, the effect of divorce being the same as that of death, the income was now payable to the wife and not to the gentleman who had been her husband.

Corbidge v.
Somerville.
Ld. President.

The present action is raised by the pursuer as trustee in bankruptcy, and takes the form of an action of reduction of the decree of divorce, the ground being that there was truly no jurisdiction, the domicile of Mr Somerville being not Scotch but English. The pursuer sets forth that the action of divorce was undefended, and that, if he is allowed to go into the matter, he will bring before the Court certain circumstances, which were not before the Court on the former occasion, tending to show that the decision was wrong in so far as it was found that the domicile of the husband was Scotch. The Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof, and he has repelled the first three pleas in law for the comparing defender, who is the wife. Those pleas are—No title to sue, irrelevancy and incompetency in respect that a year and a day have passed from the date of the divorce, and another plea which is put in the form of a dilemma: "Eeto that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to pronounce said decree of divorce, there having been no subsequent change of domicile by the said S. W. May Somerville, the Court has no jurisdiction to reduce said decree."

The Lord Ordinary has gone upon a consideration of what used to be the law in the time of the Commissaries, and he has found that the title of creditors to intervene in actions of divorce was sustained by that Court. He has also gone upon this, that it has already been decided that the year and day rule, which the Commissaries laid down for themselves, was not binding upon the Court of Session, and has not been in existence since the jurisdiction of the Commissaries was transferred to the Court of Session. He has not gone at length into what I have called the dilemma plea, but has merely said that it does not fall to be sustained.

I confess that I do not think that this matter can be dealt with upon any view of the rules of the Commissaries. The rules of the Commissaries were not in any way binding upon the Court of Session; and since the jurisdiction was transferred to the Court of Session I think no instance is to be found of the application of those rules in this Court. Of course, that naturally justifies the conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary has come as to the inappropriateness of the plea of a year and a day; but it has an equal bearing upon the ground of his Lordship's judgment as a whole; and if the action rested upon that ancient practice alone—I mean if it were an application by a creditor to reduce a decree of divorce—I think the plea that is founded upon the dilemma would give rise to some difficulty. But in this case I do not think the plea does give rise to difficulty. I think the pursuer has really taken an unfortunate course of action. I do not think this action ought to have been brought in this form at all. The pursuer was a person to whom money was being paid by the Scottish trustees in virtue of the assignation of bankruptcy. Now, when the trustees came to say that they proposed no longer to pay that money, I think the proper retort would have been an ordinary petitory action. To that the only answer which the trustees could have made would have been to put forward the decree of divorce; and to that, I think, the pursuer could have made this triumphant reply: "That decree, so far as I am concerned, is worth nothing, because it is a decree pronounced by a Court which had no jurisdiction, in an undefended case." I come to that conclusion because of the law which is laid down by Lord Watson in the case of Le Mesurier.¹ I think it is now perfectly certain that the domicile of the spouses is that of the husband, and that unless the husband is domiciled within the jurisdiction, the Court has no right to pronounce a decree of divorce. Obviously, a decree pronounced by a Court which had no jurisdiction is a decree which no other Court can acknowledge. It is quite clear also on the averments that this was an undefended case—it is so said—and an undefended consistorial case, even although there is a certain duty on the Court which is not put upon it in an ordinary petitory action, still remains an undefended case.

If the action had taken the form I have suggested, and if the pursuer had met the defence in the manner I have indicated, it is quite evident that this so-called dilemma would never have arisen. The pursuer would necessarily have had to resort to the Scotch Courts, because the trustees, who upon his view ought to pay the money, are resident in Scotland and can only be reached through the Scotch Courts; and when the decree was tabled in defence which, according to the defender, had the effect of transferring the money, notwithstanding the assignation in bankruptcy, from the husband to the wife, the pursuer would have been quite entitled to answer: "That decree is not worth the paper it is written on, because it was pronounced by a Court which had no jurisdiction over the man against whom it was pronounced." That, I think, would have been the proper procedure, and if that procedure had been followed this dilemma would have been avoided.

If that is so, the matter resolves itself into this: Would it be a proper proceeding for us to dismiss this action in order that practically the same action should be brought at once in another form? The Court nowadays is always anxious to avoid unnecessary procedure, and accordingly I am of opinion that the action must be allowed to go on.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I cannot accept the reasoning on which the Lord Ordinary has based his interlocutor. I think that it would be extremely dangerous and contrary to all principle if we were to sustain the right of a creditor, who was not required to be cited as a defender in an action of divorce, to come in after decree of divorce had been pronounced and challenge a decree, which has determined the status of the two spouses,

¹ [1895] A. C. 517.

Mar. 19, 1913. upon any question affecting its merits; and that, I think, is the necessary result of the Lord Ordinary's view. I am not very much moved by the consideration which his Lordship thinks of so great effect, that by the practice of the Commissaries creditors were entitled to appear in actions of divorce. I think all the information we have as to that practice is extremely meagre and unsatisfactory; and although there is some evidence tending to show that creditors might state a defence to divorce upon any ground, I think it is meagre evidence, and that it would be rash to express anything like a fixed and definite opinion as to what place they were allowed to take in the Commissary Court. But that is not material, because I agree with your Lordship that, whatever the rule of the Commissaries was, no such rule has been introduced into the practice of the Court of Session.

Corbridge v.
Somerville.
Lord Kinnear.

The Lord Ordinary says, quite rightly, that the rule of the Commissaries was recognised in actions of appeal in the Court of Session, and he refers to the case of Greenhill v. Ford,¹ which he says is the latest case, for the purpose of showing that the practice is recognised. I cannot say that I think any really valuable inference upon the point can be drawn from that decision. A creditor who had appeared before the Commissaries appealed against the judgment. His appeal was heard, but dismissed; and the significant point of the case, I think, for the present purpose is that his appeal upon its merits was rested upon an allegation of collusion, and that he expressly stated that he did not desire to interfere with the sentence of divorce, but only to obtain a judgment as to the pecuniary effects of that sentence. The appeal was rejected, as I have said, but the Court of Session held that the allegation of collusion came too late after the wife, who was the pursuer in the action, had taken the oath of calumny and been examined by the creditor himself, and that his right to object to the decree without disturbing the merits was not tenable. The decision was affirmed in the House of Lords without any reported expression of opinion; and on the whole I am unable to draw from it any certain conclusion as to the extent of a creditor's right to interpose in actions of divorce. It was decided in this Court that a creditor who had no interest in the question of status must submit to the legal consequences of a divorce, so far as it affects the property of the spouses. But the case is certainly no authority for saying that a creditor can be allowed to reduce a decree of divorce upon its merits, for he expressly disclaimed any intention to do so.

Before leaving the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary I ought to make one further observation. His Lordship says that if the pursuer could competently have asked to be sisted as a defender, the next question is what pleas he could competently urge in an action of reduction. And his Lordship says: "It would . . . appear that the distinction advanced by the defender, that is to say, between collusion or fraud, and other grounds of defence, does not hold good as regards a defence by creditors to a divorce suit." I am not prepared to agree that that has been found; but suppose that it has, his Lordship goes on to say: "And if this be so, I do not see why it should obtain in reductive proceedings for opening up a decree of divorce in absence." Now, I agree with your Lordship that a proof should be allowed just because there is all the difference in the world between an action of reduction of what purports to be a decree of a Court of Justice founded upon an allegation of fraud upon the Court, or upon an allegation of no jurisdiction, and an attempt to reduce the decree of a competent Court upon grounds which might have been pleaded before the Judge who pronounced it and which affect the merits of the question that he decided. I think this action is maintainable just because the pursuer has made a relevant averment that the Court had no jurisdiction. I agree that he has made an unnecessary difficulty for himself by his form of action, because it may seem to encourage the notion that a creditor can come in to reduce a decree determining status. I do not think he can. But he can come in for the purpose of maintaining that there is no decree at all, which is all that would be a necessary consequence of the pursuer's action. I think his natural course would have been to sue the trustees for payment of this money, and upon the decree of divorce being tabled as being equivalent to a transfer of the money from his debtor—the husband—to somebody else, to maintain that there is no such decree, because what purports to be a decree was pronounced by a Court having no jurisdiction. His ground of action is, not that the judgment is wrong, but that what purports to be a judgment was not pronounced by a Judge who had jurisdiction to deal with the matter, but by a Court which was going beyond its jurisdiction and pronouncing a judgment which could be of no effect.

¹ 1 Shaw, 296.

Mar. 19, 1913.
Corbridge v.
Somerville.
Lord Kinnear.

It is quite clear, I think, in law that if the judgment in question were really a judgment pronounced for the divorce of an English husband not domiciled in Scotland, it could have no effect either here or elsewhere; it certainly would not be recognised as a good divorce by the Courts of any other country. I think the creditor is entitled to have that matter inquired into, because anybody who disputes that an alleged judgment can affect his pecuniary interests must have a right to challenge it upon the ground that it is not a real judgment pronounced by a Court having jurisdiction.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I entirely agree with your Lordships in the view that the old rule of the Commissaries does not apply to consistorial actions before this Court, and I have nothing further to say on that subject.

I also agree with your Lordships that the pursuer here has taken a wrong course in matter of procedure; but I regret to say that I feel much greater doubt as to whether we are justified, in a case of this sort, in allowing it to proceed instead of dismissing it and leaving the pursuer to take the proper course. This is an action for reduction of a decree of divorce. It is quite true that the pursuer says that, though he was not a party to the action of divorce, he has a patrimonial interest in getting rid of the decree of divorce, because that will open to him a claim to funds which otherwise he cannot touch. But, supposing him to be successful, there is nothing to oblige him to proceed after he has got his decree of reduction—there is nothing to compel him to go on and make good his pecuniary claim. Yet the reduction will stand as a reduction of the decree of divorce as regards all concerned and in all time unless the reduction again be set aside.

Now, I have difficulty there; and I have difficulty also in this, that I cannot dispossess my mind of the feeling that this Court is being asked to

Mar. 19, 1913. commit the same offence against international law that it is alleged to have already committed in the original divorce. It seems to me that, taking the action as it is laid, we have no more jurisdiction in an action at the instance of a third party pursuer to deal with the status of this lady or of this gentleman than we had before. It might be that we could entertain an action to deal with the validity of the decree of divorce if raised at the instance of the husband, because I think that, by an extension of the principle of prorogation of jurisdiction, we should be entitled to deal with a lady as defender in a reduction who came here as pursuer to take advantage of the jurisdiction of this Court. But I cannot see that any such power goes beyond the actual parties to the previous action.

Corbidge v.
Somerville.
Ld. Johnston.

I think, therefore, that the pursuer has undoubtedly done wrong in raising the action in the way he has done, and that he ought to be sent back, if he wants to get these funds, to raise his ordinary petitory action against the trustees. When the trustees produce, in their defence, the decree of divorce, I think it will then be open to him in reply to object that it is a decree which is of no avail against him, because it was pronounced without jurisdiction—and I do not think that any decree of reduction will be found to be necessary. If that procedure were to be followed, I think that the decree of divorce obtained in absence of the husband would be examinable ope exceptionis, just in the same way as a decree of a foreign Court would be if produced in this Court, and that then the matter would be disposed of as one touching the pecuniary interests of the third party pursuer only, who has right to have the pecuniary question determined between him and the trustees who hold the money, leaving the validity of the decree as touching the status of the spouses to be determined between themselves. I say that the more readily because I feel that this Court by allowing this action to proceed may involve its successors in difficulty. For a decree of divorce, even in absence, may be followed by consequences, and by the creation of new interests, which would make it very difficult to follow the precedent now being created. Nor do I see how this precedent is to be limited in its application to a decree in absence. But as your Lordships are satisfied, I content myself with expressing my doubts, and do not push them to the point of dissent.

LORD MACKENZIE.—This is an action of reduction of a decree of divorce pronounced in Scotland, in an action brought in May 1910 at the instance of a wife against her husband. The husband had been made bankrupt in England in January 1910, and his estates had vested in his trustee in bankruptcy, the pursuer, before the decree of divorce. Prior to the divorce the husband was entitled to the income of certain settled money. In consequence of the divorce payment of this income was refused to the trustee in bankruptcy. Hence the present action, which was brought on 27th November 1911. The ground upon which reduction is sought is that the Scotch Court had no jurisdiction to grant the decree. There is this further averment in cond. 7: "The bankrupt concealed the fact of said divorce proceedings from pursuer, and abstained from opposing same with the object of depriving his creditors of the income of said trust funds, and in the hope and expectation that the defender, Mrs Somerville, would, after divorce, make him an allowance for his maintenance from said income." Mar. 19, 1913. The action of divorce was undefended. The pursuer says that neither he nor the trustees of the settlement got intimation of the divorce proceedings; that the wife failed to disclose in the summons or at the proof that her husband was bankrupt; and he avers that the husband was, at the date of the bankruptcy and of the divorce proceedings, a domiciled Englishman. He further details certain statements made by the bankrupt in his public examination in bankruptcy which, he says, were not disclosed to the Court when a preliminary proof on the question of jurisdiction was taken in the divorce action.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that there must be inquiry into the facts. The pursuer desires to vindicate a fund which vested in him for behoof of the creditors of the husband before divorce was granted. In answer to his claim the decree of divorce is tabled. If his reply is sound the decree is null, because the first essential for the validity of the decree is that it should have been pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction between parties who are bona fide subject to it. None of the authorities referred to by the Lord Ordinary really apply to a case of this kind. The decree was in absence. The pursuer, in my opinion, has a title to reduce a decree which he says is null, and which is pleaded as a bar to recovery by him of property which had vested in him prior to its date. Although reluctant to sanction a course which may have the result of affecting the status of the husband and wife in order to secure merely patrimonial interests of others, it is necessary to point out that, if the pursuer succeeds in establishing that the decree of divorce was not pronounced in accordance with the rules of public international law, the decree would have no extra-territorial effect whatever. This is stated by Lord Westbury in Shaw v. Gould,¹ Bonaparte v. Bonaparte,² Le Mesurier,³ Pemberton v. Hughes.⁴ Although, therefore, in one view the present proceedings may involve hardship, it is in the interests of both Mr and Mrs Somerville that the question now raised should be finally determined.

The reclaimers did not argue plea 2 (2) before us.

THE COURT adhered.

FORBES DALLAS & Co., W.S.—FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 3 E. & L. App. 55, at p. 81.

³ [1895] A. C. 517.

² [1892] P. 402.

⁴ [1899] 1 Ch. 781.

No. 115.

MRS ELIZABETH M'CLYMONT, Pursuer (Appellant).—Lippe.
 THE CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW, Defenders.
 (Respondents).—Russell.

Mar. 19, 1913.

M'Clymont v. Corporation of Glasgow. Expenses—Tender—Appeal for jury trial—Tender accepted immediately after order for issues—Expenses of preparing for proof while case in Sheriff Court—General Regulation No. 3 appended to Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876.

A Sheriff Court action, in which proof had been allowed, was remitted to the Court of Session for trial by jury. An order having been pronounced to lodge issues within eight days, the pursuer, within that time, accepted a tender by the defenders, and was found entitled to expenses.

Held (after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division) that the defenders were liable for the expenses, charged on the Sheriff Court scale, of precognitions and medical reports obtained by the pursuer in preparation for the proof while the case was pending in the Sheriff Court.

Church v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1883) 11 R. 398, overruled.

1st Division. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. MRS ELIZABETH M'CLYMONT brought an action of damages for personal injury against the Corporation of Glasgow in the Glasgow Sheriff Court.

On 31st October 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) allowed a proof, and the pursuer then required the cause to be remitted to the First Division of the Court of Session.

On 13th November 1912 issues were ordered to be lodged within eight days.

On 20th November 1912, in respect of a minute of tender for the defenders and a minute of acceptance by the pursuer, decree was pronounced against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £50 sterling, and the pursuer was found entitled to expenses, and the account thereof was remitted to the Auditor to tax and to report.

In his report on the pursuer's account of expenses the Auditor allowed charges, on the Sheriff Court scale, for precognitions taken and medical reports obtained while the case was still in the Sheriff Court.

A note of objections was lodged by the defenders objecting to these charges.

The case was heard in Single Bills of the First Division on 6th February 1913.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer's application to have the cause remitted to the Court of Session overruled the order for proof pronounced in the Sheriff Court, and, no such order having been pronounced in the Court of Session, the expenses of precognitions and of preliminary investigations had been improperly allowed by the Auditor.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—Though the case of *Church v. Caledonian Railway Company*² could not be distinguished from the present case, the decision in that case was irreconcilable with a recent decision of the Court which warranted the charges allowed by the Auditor.³

¹ Church v. Caledonian Railway Co., (1883) 11 R. 398; General Regulations appended to the Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876, No. 3, Parliament House Book, 1912-13, G. 34.

² 11 R. 398.

³ Boyle v. Olsen, supra, p. 112.

The Lord President intimated that the Court would consult with Mar. 19, 1913.
the Second Division.

At advising on 19th March 1913 the opinion of the Court was delivered by the M'Clymont v.
Corporation
of Glasgow.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case an action of damages was raised in the Sheriff Court, and a proof was allowed. The pursuer then required the cause to be remitted to the Court of Session for jury trial, and, there being no question of relevancy, issues were ordered. On the day that issues were to be adjusted a tender was put in, and, the pursuer having accepted it, the sum tendered was decerned for with expenses.

When the pursuer's account of expenses was presented it included charges for precognitions which were necessary for the case if it was to go on, and they were charged on the Sheriff Court scale. The Auditor having allowed the charges for these precognitions, they were objected to, the objection being based on the decision in the case of Church v. Caledonian Railway Company,¹ where such expenses were disallowed. There is a familiar rule that expenses of taking precognitions are only allowed where an action has reached the stage of an interlocutor allowing proof. The argument in that case, which was successful, was that when the case was appealed to this Court for jury trial it became a Court of Session case, and not a Sheriff Court case, and that as a compromise took place when a tender was accepted before adjustment of an issue, prior to which no proof was allowed in the Court of Session, therefore the expenses of precognitions could not be allowed. There is no doubt that was what was decided in the case of Church.¹

After hearing counsel in the present case we were of opinion that we could not deal with the matter without consulting the Second Division. Having done so, we are of opinion that, notwithstanding the case of Church,¹ the expenses here charged on the Sheriff Court scale were rightly allowed by the Auditor. The precognitions were taken while the case was still in the Sheriff Court, and if it had remained there, and the tender had been put in and accepted after proof had been allowed in that Court, undoubtedly the expenses would have been allowed. The case having come to this Court and followed the procedure necessary to attain the same stage as it had already attained in the Sheriff Court—because the order for issues was tantamount to an allowance of proof—we are of opinion that that ought not to prevent the expenses being recovered. We shall therefore disallow the objection and approve of the Auditor's report.

THE COURT repelled the objections and approved of the Auditor's report.

SCOTT & GLOVER, W.S.—ST CLAIR SWANSON & MANSON, W.S.—Agents.

¹ 11 R. 398.

No. 116.

ALEXANDER KNOX & ROBB, Pursuers (Respondents).—

Macmillan, K.C.—Aitchison.

Mar. 20, 1918.

THE SCOTTISH GARDEN SUBURB COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—*Clyde, K.C.—Hamilton.*Knox & Robb
v. Scottish
Garden
Suburb Co.,
Limited.Agent and Principal—Usage of trade—Implied authority of architect to employ measurer.

Held that there is no usage of trade by which the official architect of a building company, which has not commenced operations, or approved of plans, or instructed the architect to proceed with the building, has implied authority to employ the services of a measurer to the effect of rendering the building company liable for the measurer's charges.

Black v. Cornelius, (1879) 6 R. 581, distinguished.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN May 1911 Alexander Knox & Robb, measurers in Glasgow, brought an action in the Glasgow Sheriff Court against the Scottish Garden Suburb Company, Limited, for payment of an account of £121, 8s. 2d. alleged to be due to the pursuers by the defenders.

The defenders' company was incorporated on 6th June 1910, and was promoted with a view to acquiring a property in Greenock and of erecting thereon workmen's houses to be used in connection with a Government torpedo factory which it was proposed to establish there.

The pursuers averred that they were instructed by Mr Salmon, the official architect of the defenders' company, to carry out certain work in connection with which the account sued for was incurred. The account contained seven items, the first three of which were for small outlays in connection with the work subsequently charged for in the fourth and fifth items of the account, which latter items were dated 7th and 9th June 1910 respectively. The sixth and seventh items were incurred in August 1910. The work consisted in measuring plans, altering schedules, and preparing estimates for houses which it was proposed that the company should erect.

The grounds on which the pursuers sought to make the defenders liable were stated thus by Lord Mackenzie:—“(1) That Mr Salmon had the instructions and authority of the defenders to employ the pursuers to do the work; (2) that according to the custom in the building trade Mr Salmon, as the official architect of the defenders, had implied authority to employ the pursuers, and that the defenders became liable for the pursuers' fees although there was between them no direct relation of employer and employed; and (3) that the defenders made use of the information which was the result of the pursuers' work, and are therefore liable in payment.”

On 27th February 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe), after a proof, pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Finds (1) that by the custom and usage of the building trade an architect has implied authority to engage the services of a measurer; (2) that pursuers were employed by defenders' architect to do the work, the cost of which is sued for: Finds in law that pursuers having been employed by defenders' architect, defenders are liable in payment of the account sued on: Therefore decerns against the defenders for the sum of £121, 8s. 2d., with interest, as craved. . . .”*

* The Sheriff-substitute's note contained the following passage:—“In my opinion the pursuers have established their averment of custom of trade

The appeal was heard before the First Division (without Lord Mar. 20, 1913. Kinnear) on 21st and 25th February 1913.¹

At advising on 20th March 1913,—

Knox & Robb
v. Scottish
Garden
Suburb Co.,
Limited.

LORD MACKENZIE.—[After dealing with matters with which this report is not concerned]—It is also clear that the pursuers did the work they now ask payment for on the instructions of Mr Salmon. It is impossible, however, to find ground for holding as regards the June items that there was any contractual relation between the Company and the measurers.—[His Lordship discussed this matter and continued]—Nor is it possible to agree with the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute that the defenders are liable in consequence of a custom of trade. I find it impossible to formulate what the custom of trade is under which the defenders are supposed to be liable. It is intelligible that where a private individual or a company has employed an architect and definitely settled plans with him, and he is instructed to proceed with the work, the architect may then proceed to employ a measurer in accordance with the custom of trade. This is the view taken by Mr Barclay, the pursuers' expert witness. The present case, however, is different. At the time Mr Salmon instructed the measurer the position of matters was still inchoate, although certain plans had been apparently adjusted with the Admiralty.—[His Lordship then dealt with questions with which this report is not concerned, and expressed his opinion that as regarded the first five items of the account the defenders made use of the work charged for, and were bound accordingly to pay these items.]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the opinion that has just been delivered, and I would not find it necessary to say anything were it not for the fact that the learned Sheriff-substitute has gone upon a different ground. I wish to say most distinctly that the proposition which is laid down by the Sheriff-substitute in his note, that, by the custom of trade, the official architect of a company proposing to build has implied authority to engage the assistance of a measurer is not, in my opinion, good law, and is certainly not borne out by the case which he quotes—the case of Black v. Cornelius.¹ I have no doubt whatever that when an architect is employed, plans have been approved of, and he is instructed to go on with the building, that he has the right, with no further order, to employ a measurer, without whom the whole matter cannot be gone on with or proper schedules for contracto the effect that the official architect of a person or company proposing to build has implied authority to engage the assistance of a measurer, and that the architect's constituent then becomes liable for the measurer's fees, although the constituent and the measurer have had no direct communication. This doctrine of the law of agency has been recognised in a Scottish judgment—(Black v. Cornelius, 6 R. 581, and in several English cases collected in Hudson on Building Contracts, 3rd ed., p. 128 et seq.)”

¹ The following authorities were referred to at the hearing.—Brown v. McConnell, (1876) 3 R. 788; Black v. Cornelius, (1879) 6 R. 581; Ireland v. Livingston, (1872) L. R., 5 E. & I. App. 395, per Lord Chelmsford, at p. 417; In re Rotherham Alum and Chemical Co., (1883) 25 Ch. D. 103; Moon v. Witney Union, (1837) 3 Bing. (N. S.) 814.

² 6 R. 581.

Mar. 20, 1913. tors given out. That was all that was decided in Black v. Cornelius.¹

Knox & Robb v. Scottish Garden Suburb Co., Limited. But the idea that, because a man has the position of official architect, he has a free hand to employ measurers when he likes is perfectly out of the question.

Ld. President. In the actual circumstances of this case I think it is quite clear that the parties did get the good of these measurements, and never could have gone on to consider what the houses would really cost, and what propositions they could put before the public, without seeing the measurements. Therefore, without going into the details which Lord Mackenzie has already discussed, I entirely concur in the interlocutor proposed by him.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have had the advantage of perusing the opinion prepared by Lord Mackenzie, and I entirely concur in the results at which he has arrived and the method of arriving at them. I respectfully concur also in what your Lordship has added.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Find that the pursuers did the work charged for in the first five items of the account sued for on the instructions of Mr Salmon, architect: Find that Mr Salmon had no authority, express or implied, so to employ the pursuers on behalf of the defenders, but find that the directors of the Company, subsequent to incorporation, made use of the information which was the result of the pursuers' work as detailed in said five items: Therefore find in law that the defenders are liable to make payment to the pursuers of the sums charged under the first five heads: Further find as regards the sixth and seventh items of the account, that the defenders, through Mr Salmon or his firm, instructed the pursuers to do the work charged for, and are therefore liable to make payment of the sums sued for under these heads: Therefore decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £121, 8s. 2d., with interest, as craved. . . ."

W. R. RAMSAY & NIGHTINGALE, Solicitors—CADELL & MORTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 117. LIEUTENANT-COLONEL RODERICK WILLIAM COLQUHOUN AND OTHERS (Sir Alan John Colquhoun's Trustees), First Parties.—Johnston, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

Mar. 20, 1913.

Colquhoun's Trustees v. Abercromby.

DAVID JAMES ABERCROMBY, Second Party.—Blackburn, K.C.—J. H. Millar.

MRS IVIE MURIEL ELLEN HARRINGTON, Third Party.—Blackburn, K.C.—J. H. Millar.

Revenue—Estate-duty—Deductions allowable as incumbrances—"Incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased"—"Disposition taking effect out of the interest of the deceased"—Provisions for widow and children—Relief—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 30), secs. 7 (1) (a), and 22 (2) (b).

The Finance Act, 1894, in providing for the ascertainment of the value of an estate for estate-duty, allows a deduction for incumbrances; but by sec. 7 (1) (a) excepts therefrom in certain circumstances "incumbranches created by a disposition made by the deceased"; and by sec. Mar. 20, 1913. 22 (2) (b) enacts that "a disposition taking effect out of the interest of the deceased person shall be deemed to have been made by him, whether the concurrence of any other person was or was not required." Colquhoun's Trustees v. Abercromby.

A executed a trust-disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees to pay an annuity out of his estate to B, and also, should B request them to do so, to burden the estate with provisions for B's wife and family. On the death of B the fee of the estate was directed to be conveyed to C.

After A's death his trustees paid the annuity to B during his life, and also, at B's request, burdened the estate with bonds of provision for his widow and children. On B's death the estate was conveyed to C, who, in adjusting estate-duty with the Inland Revenue, sought to make deductions in respect of the provisions to B's widow and children. The Inland Revenue refused to allow the deductions, and C paid duty on the whole estate.

A question having arisen as to C's right to recover from the widow and children the estate-duty paid in respect of their provisions—

Held that, as these incumbrances were not "created by a disposition made by" B in the sense of sec. 7 (1) (a), and did not take effect "out of the interest of" B in the sense of sec. 22 (2) (b), they were deductible; and, accordingly, that C could not recover from the beneficiaries this estate-duty which he ought not to have paid.

On 25th May 1912 a special case was presented for the opinion of 1st Division. the Court with reference to a question whether the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of Sir Alan Colquhoun of Colquhoun and Luss, who died on 14th March 1910, were entitled to be relieved by the widow and children of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) of estate-duties paid by Sir Alan on his succeeding to the Colquhoun estates in 1907 on the death of Sir James, so far as these duties were charged upon sums representing provisions for Sir James's widow and children. This question depended upon whether these provisions were incumbrances "created by a disposition made by the deceased" in the sense of sections 7 (1) (a), and 22 (2) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894.*

Sir Alan Colquhoun's trustees were the first parties to the case;

* The Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 30), enacts:—

Sec. 7 (1). "In determining the value of an estate for the purpose of estate-duty allowance shall be made for reasonable funeral expenses and for debts and incumbrances; but an allowance shall not be made—(a) for debts incurred by the deceased, or incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased, unless such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit and take effect out of his interest."

Sec. 14 (1). "In the case of property which does not pass to the executor as such, an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate-duty may be recovered by the person, who being authorised or required to pay the estate-duty in respect of any property has paid such duty, from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property (whether as capital or as an annuity or otherwise), under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary."

(3) "Any person from whom a rateable part of estate-duty can be recovered under this section shall be bound by the accounts and valuations as settled between the person entitled to recover the same and the Commissioners."

Sec. 22 (2) (b). "A disposition taking effect out of the interest of the deceased person shall be deemed to have been made by him, whether the concurrence of any other person was or was not required."

Mar. 20, 1913. David James Abercromby, sole surviving trustee under a bond of provision in favour of the younger children of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus), was the second party; and Mrs Ivie Muriel Ellen Urquhart or Colquhoun or Harington, the widow of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus), was the third party.

Colquhoun's
Trustees v.
Abercromby.

The case stated as follows:—

"1. Sir James Colquhoun of Colquhoun and Luss, in the county of Dumbarton, afterwards referred to as Sir James Colquhoun (primus), died on 18th December 1873. He was predeceased by his wife and survived by one son, James, who succeeded his father in the title, and is afterwards referred to as Sir James Colquhoun (secundus).

"2. Sir James Colquhoun (primus) left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 1st May 1871, and registered in the Books of Council and Session on 18th February 1874. The general purposes of his said trust-disposition and settlement were to provide for the payment of the debts on the estates of Luss, occasioned by the large purchases of land made by his father and himself, to pay to his son Sir James (secundus) an annuity, increasing in amount with the corresponding diminution of the heritable debts, from £4000 to £10,000 per annum, and to hold the fee of the unentailed portion of the estates for the behoof of the heir who should succeed to the said Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) in the entailed portion thereof—the testator declaring it to be his wish and intention that the whole lands and estates, whether entailed or not, should descend and be held and possessed by the same person as heir.

"3. By the sixth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement Sir James Colquhoun (primus) provided as follows:—'In the event of the said James Colquhoun, my son, being married and being desirous in contemplation of or after his marriage to make provision for his wife or intended wife and children born or to born of the marriage, I hereby direct and appoint my trustees, if asked by the said James Colquhoun to do so, to grant and deliver such deed or deeds as may be necessary for securing over my lands and estates hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, to and in favour of the wife or intended wife of the said James Colquhoun, in the event of her surviving him, a free annuity or jointure of such sum as he may desire, but not exceeding the sum of One thousand five hundred pounds sterling per annum . . . and also to grant such deed or deeds as may be necessary for securing over the lands and estates hereby conveyed to and in favour of any lawful child or children of him the said James Colquhoun, other than the heir who shall succeed to the said lands and estates, or to any person or persons for their behoof that may be named by the said James Colquhoun, suitable provisions after his death, the said provisions to be so secured over my said lands and estates not exceeding the sums after mentioned, videlicet: . . . Declaring that the said provisions to the children of the said James Colquhoun shall be payable on the death of the said James Colquhoun, and in such manner and in such proportions as he may appoint by any writing under his hand, and farther declaring that the sum or sums so to be settled on the wife and children of the said James Colquhoun shall be inclusive of and not over and above any sum or sums he may provide to them or any of them over the entailed estates of Luss and others under the powers possessed by him as heir of entail of the said lands and estates.'

"4. In the year 1875, on the marriage of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) to his first wife, Charlotte Mary Douglas Monro, the trustees of his father (at the request of Sir James (secundus), and in exercise of the powers hereinbefore narrated), granted in favour of his wife a bond of annuity for £1500 per annum, payable after the death of her husband. The lady, however, predeceased Sir James on 9th January 1902, and accordingly the annuity secured by the said bond never became exigible. Mar. 20, 1913.

Colquhoun's
Trustees v.
Abercromby.

"5. On the same occasion the trustees of Sir James Colquhoun (primus) (at the request of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus), and in exercise of the powers hereinbefore narrated), granted a bond of provision in favour of the trustees therein named for behoof of the younger children of the marriage of the said James Colquhoun (secundus) with the said Charlotte Mary Douglas Monro . . . for payment to the trustees for behoof of the younger children of said marriage other than the heir succeeding to the lands and estates of Luss, of a sum of . . . £20,000 in the event of there being two children other than the heir . . . These provisions were heritably secured on certain parts of the unentailed lands of Luss particularly described in the bond. There was no male issue of the marriage, and on the death of Sir James (secundus) on 13th March 1907, the estates of Luss (both entailed and unentailed) passed to his cousin the now deceased Sir Alan John Colquhoun, Bart., who died on 14th March 1910. Two daughters, the whole issue of the first marriage of Sir James (secundus), survived however, and accordingly a sum of £20,000 became payable under the bond of provision to the trustee acting under the said bond of provision for their behoof; and this sum, with interest from 13th March 1907 was paid to him at Whitsunday 1908. The sole remaining trustee acting under the said bond of provision, to whom the £20,000 was paid, is the second party to this case.

"6. In November 1904 Sir James (secundus) entered into a second marriage with Ivie Muriel Ellen Urquhart (now Mrs Harington), and on that occasion the trustees of Sir James (primus) (at the request of Sir James (secundus) and in exercise of the powers conferred on them as aforesaid) granted a bond of annuity in favour of Lady Ivie Muriel Ellen Urquhart or Colquhoun, for payment to her of a free annuity or jointure of £1500 a year after the death of her husband, and in security thereof disposed certain parts of the unentailed lands of Luss particularly therein described. . . . Since the death of Sir James (secundus) his widow has regularly received payment of her annuity in terms of the bond. There were no children of this second marriage.

"7. On the death of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) on 13th March 1907 the whole entailed and unentailed lands and barony of Luss passed, as already mentioned, to the now deceased Sir Alan John Colquhoun, and so far as unentailed were conveyed to him by the trustees of Sir James Colquhoun (primus), conform to disposition in his favour, dated 18th March 1908, under burden of settlement by him of the Government duties, exigible in respect of his succession. The aggregate value of the estates (including certain moveable funds in the hands of the trustees of Sir James Colquhoun (primus)) amounted to £524,223, 4s. 2d., and estate-duty was payable on that amount at the rate of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This duty, so far as chargeable on the unentailed heritable estate is being settled by eight annual instalments, the first of which fell due upon 13th March 1908, and five of these instalments have now been paid. Altogether there has

Mar. 20, 1913. Colquhoun's Trustees v. Abercromby. been paid in respect of estate-duty on the unentailed portion of the lands of Luss, £16,402, 7s. 10d., exclusive of interest, and a sum of £9841, 8s. 11d. representing the remaining three instalments has still to be paid. The first three instalments of said estate-duty were paid by the late Sir Alan John Colquhoun during his lifetime, and the remaining five instalments have been and are being paid by the first parties as Sir Alan's testamentary trustees.

"8. When the accounts for estate-duty were passed in 1908 on the succession of Sir Alan John Colquhoun, the Inland Revenue authorities, although requested by Sir Alan so to do, declined to allow as deductions from the capital value of the estate passing on the death of Sir James (secundus) the amount of the provisions of £20,000 to to his younger children, and the capital value of Mrs Harington's annuity of £1500 a year."

The contentions of parties were stated as follows :—

"The first parties maintain (1) that the said provisions and annuity were property which passed on the death of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) in the sense of section 2 of the Finance Act, 1894 and that the late Sir Alan John Colquhoun was, and they as his testamentary trustees are now, primarily liable for estate-duty thereon ; and (2) that there being no express provision to the contrary in either the bond of provision or the bond of annuity, the first parties, as the testamentary trustees of the late Sir Alan John Colquhoun, have, under section 14 of the said statute, the right to recover from the second party the proper rateable part of the estate-duty which then became applicable to the provisions of £20,000 before referred to, and that they also have a similar right of recovery against the third party of the proper rateable part of the estate-duty applicable to the capital value of her annuity of £1500 a year.

"10. The second party contends (1) that in determining the value of the estate on which duty was payable on the death of the said deceased Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) for the purpose of estate-duty, an allowance fell to be made, in terms of subsection (1) of section 7 of the Finance Act, 1894, for the said provision of £20,000, in respect that the said provision was not an incumbrance created by the deceased ; (2) that the first parties are accordingly not entitled, under subsection (1) of section 14 of the said Act, to recover from the second party an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate-duty paid by the first parties as aforesaid ; and (3) that, in respect that the second party is not a person from whom a rateable part of estate-duty can be so recovered, he is not bound under subsection (3) of section 14 of the said Act by the accounts and valuations as settled between the first parties or their author and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

"11. The third party adopts the contentions of the second party mutatis mutandis as applicable to the said annuity of £1500. She further contends et separatim, that, in any event, upon a sound construction of the terms of the trust-disposition and settlement of Sir James Colquhoun (primus) and of the bond of annuity, the first parties are not entitled to recover from her in respect of the same an amount equal to the rateable part of the estate-duty paid by them as aforesaid."

The questions of law were :—" (1) Did an allowance fall to be made, in terms of section 7, subsection (1), of the Finance Act, 1894, for (a) the said provision of £20,000, and (b) the said annuity of £1500, or either of them, in determining the value for the purpose of Mar. 20, 1913. estate-duty of the estate passing on the death of Sir James Colquhoun Colquhoun's (secundus)? (2) Are the first parties now entitled to recover from the Trustees v. second party the proper rateable part of estate-duty applicable to the Abercromby. value of the said provision paid to him? and (3) Are the first parties now entitled to recover from the third party the proper rateable part of the estate-duty applicable to the capital value of her said annuity of £1500?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Kin-ear) on 6th February 1913.

Argued for the second and third parties;—The provisions in question—assuming them to be incumbrances—were not incumbrances created by Sir James Colquhoun (secundus), for he was not the fiar of the estate in question, but only an annuitant, with no power to create incumbrances upon it. The incumbrances in question were in fact created by Sir James (primus), who conferred powers on his trustees for their creation, and defined the time at which, and conditions upon which, the powers conferred might be exercised.¹ In any event these provisions fall to be regarded as separate estates, and so were not liable for estate-duty at the rate chargeable on the aggregate estate passing on the death of Sir James (secundus). With regard to the annuity provided for the third party, no repayment could, in any circumstances, be claimed from her, for, by the terms of the deed creating it, it was declared to be a "free annuity," i.e., liable to no deductions, and was therefore excluded from the apportionment provided for by section 14 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect that the disposition creating it contained an "express provision to the contrary."²

Argued for the first parties;—Power had been conferred upon Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) to burden the fee-simple estate with provisions for his wife and children through the hands of his father's trustees; therefore the incumbrances created on his demand by these trustees were truly created by him, and, in virtue of the exception in subhead (a) of section 7 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, could not be the subject of allowance in determining the value of the estate taken on his death by Sir Alan Colquhoun. If, however, the provisions for which the incumbrances were created were to be regarded as having been made not by Sir James (secundus) himself, but by him acting jointly with his father's trustees, they were still chargeable, in virtue of section 2 (1) (d) of that Act, with estate-duty as property passing on his death.³ The provision of a "free annuity" in favour of the third party could not be construed, on the authority of the case of In re Parker-Jervis,⁴ as meaning an annuity without any deduction whatever.⁵

¹ The following authorities were referred to:—Alexander's Trustees v. Alexander's Trustees, 1910 S. C. 637; Lord Advocate v. Warrender's Trustees, (1906) 8 F. 371; Inland Revenue v. Alexander's Trustees, (1905) 7 F. 367.

² In re Parker-Jervis, [1898] 2 Ch. 643; Bulloch v. Beaton, (1853) 15 D. 373; In re Maryon Wilson, [1900] 1 Ch. 565; Dundas' Trustees v. Dundas' Trustees, 1912 S. C. 375; Hanson, Death Duties, (6th ed.) p. 514.

³ Attorney-General v. Montefiore, (1888) 21 Q. B. D. 461.

⁴ [1898] 2 Ch. 643.

⁵ The Lord President referred to In re Maryon Wilson, [1900] 1 Ch. 565; In re Gray, [1896] 1 Ch. 620; In re Turnbull, [1905] 1 Ch. 726; Lord Advocate v. MacLachlan, (1899) 1 F. 917.

Mar. 20, 1913. At advising on 20th March 1913,—

Colquhoun's
Trustees v.
Abercromby.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case between the trustees of Sir Alan Colquhoun, first parties, the trustee under a trust for behoof of the children of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus), second party, and the widow of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus), third party, and the question that we are asked to decide is whether the first parties, the trustees of Sir Alan, who settled the Government duties payable on the death of Sir James (secundus), are entitled to be relieved of those Government duties so far as they represent the sums to which the second and third parties are entitled.

The circumstances out of which the case arises are these :—Sir James Colquhoun (primus) left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he made over his whole estate, except his entailed estate, in trust to pay an annuity to his son, Sir James (secundus), and with the rest of the money to wipe off the debt upon the entailed estates. The annuity was upon what may be called a sliding scale, that is to say, as the debts were paid off the annuity was to be increased. But Sir James (secundus) was never to get the fee of the estate. Upon the death of Sir James (secundus) the fee of the estate was then to descend to the person who was entitled to the entailed estate, in other words, to the person who was entitled to the baronetcy. In order, however, to provide for the case that might arise, namely, that Sir James (secundus) might marry and wish to make provision for his wife and children, the trustees were empowered to grant a provision for his wife, to become effectual in the case of her becoming a widow, and also to grant a provision of a certain sum to his children, varying according to the number of children that there might be. That event did happen. Sir James (primus) died, and his trustees administered the estate and paid off part of the debt and paid the annuity to Sir James (secundus). Sir James (secundus) did marry, and he called upon the trustees to make provision for his wife and children. They did so, and the children are practically the second parties to the case, not directly but through the trustee who holds the provision for them. The first wife died, and consequently her provision did not become exigible ; but Sir James (secundus) married a second time, and again asked the trustees to make the same provision, which they did, for his second wife. That lady survived, and is the third party to the case.

Upon Sir James (secundus) dying at a date after the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, estate-duty became exigible upon the whole of the estate that passed at his death. In other words, in terms of the Finance Act, it was property which passed on the death of the deceased, not property in which the deceased himself had an interest. Sir James (secundus) never had any interest in the fee of the estates ; he was a mere annuitant paid by the trustees. The estate was therefore not property in which he had an interest, but property which passed on his death ; and accordingly Sir Alan had to settle with the Revenue authorities for the estate-duties. In determining the value of the estate he claimed to make a deduction for the sums that were charged upon the estate in respect of the children and widow of Sir James (secundus). That deduction was not allowed. But the other parties to this case are not in any way bound by the arrangements that were made between the Crown and Sir Alan.

The matter is settled by the seventh section of the Finance Act of 1894, Mar. 20, 1913. which enacts:—(1) "In determining the value of an estate for the purpose of estate-duty allowance shall be made for reasonable funeral expenses and for debts and incumbrances." Now these sums were incumbrances, and if the section had stopped there, there could be no doubt. But then it goes on, "but an allowance shall not be made (a) for debts incurred by the deceased"—now this was not a debt incurred by the deceased, because Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) never incurred a debt—"or incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased, unless such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit and take effect out of his interest." It is quite clear that this was not for his own use and benefit. It has already been decided, if decision was necessary, in the case of Lord Advocate v. Warrender's Trustees,¹ that if a father charges an estate with a view to making a provision in his son's marriage-contract for his son's wife or his son's children, that is not for his own use and benefit. So the whole point comes to turn upon whether this incumbrance was created by a disposition made by the deceased. I am of opinion that it was not created by a disposition made by the deceased. He never had anything to do with a disposition. The person who created the power was Sir James Colquhoun (primus), and all that Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) had to do was to ask the trustees to do something which Sir James (primus) had said they might do. I am helped in that opinion by the terms of subsection (2) (b) of section 22, which says: "A disposition taking effect out of the interest of the deceased person shall be deemed to have been made by him, whether the concurrence of any other person was or was not required." This never took effect out of the interest which Sir James (secundus) had, because Sir James (secundus) never had an interest in the estate. He was an annuitant from the trustees, but he never had an interest in the estate, and it made no difference to him, one way or the other, whether this provision was charged in favour of his wife and children or not.

The result is that Sir Alan was wrong in allowing the Crown to insist that no deduction was to be made; and if that is so, it is quite clear that his trustees cannot now claim a proportional abatement from the other parties, because he never ought to have paid upon their interests. That does not decide the question whether these parties may not, in a question directly with the Crown, have to pay duty at the same rate; and although I have an opinion upon that, it is probably inexpedient that I should express it, because I should be doing so behind the back of the Crown, which is not here. But so far as this case is concerned, it seems to me clear that we must answer the first question in the affirmative; and, that being so, it follows as a corollary that the second question and the third are answered in the negative.

LORD JOHNSTON.—[After narrating the facts stated in the case]—The Inland Revenue were not parties to the case, but we were given to understand at the bar that they were prepared to give effect to our decision on the case between the parties.

¹ 8 F. 371.

Mar. 20, 1913. The Finance Act, 1894, provides (section 1) that on the death of every person dying after the date of the Act there should be levied and paid on the value of all property, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called "estate-duty," at the graduated rates thereafter mentioned. Sir Colquhoun's Trustees v. Abercromby. Ld. Johnston. James Colquhoun's (secundus) children's provisions and his widow's annuity were certainly property passing at his death, and liable, either separately or as part of other property, to estate-duty, and the real interest that these beneficiaries have is in the rate—to avoid their provisions being massed with other property so as to render them liable in a higher rate.

The Act, section 2 (1), provides that property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say—(a) Property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose. (b) Property in which he or any other person had an interest ceasing on his death, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest. First, then, Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) had presumably property of his own or under his control which passed at his decease. But his daughters' and his widow's provisions were not included in such estate by reason merely of his right to require the trustees of his father to give effect to the power which they had to create such provisions, notwithstanding that Sir James (secundus) had conferred upon him, within limits, the right to define the amount, to appoint the manner of payment, and apportion the amount. It is by section 22 (2) (a) only where a general power is vested in the deceased, that he is treated as competent to dispose of the subject of the power. Second, to the extent of the value of his annuity Sir James (secundus) had an interest ceasing with his death in the settlement property. Quoad ultra the trustees of Sir James (primus) had an interest in trust in the settlement property ceasing with the death of Sir James (secundus). Discrimination between these two interests is, however, of no practical importance in relation to this case, inasmuch as although the deceased had a limited interest in the estate which passed at his death, that interest passed under a disposition not made by the deceased, and under one in favour of someone other than the wife and children of the deceased (section 4).

The provisions of section 4 for the aggregation of property fall next to be considered. The section provides that, for determining the rate of duty on property passing on the death, all property so passing shall be aggregated so as to form one estate, but provided that any property so passing in which the deceased never had an interest, or which under a disposition not made by him passes on his death to some person who is neither his wife or husband, nor his lineal ancestor or lineal descendant, shall form an estate by itself, but that any benefit under a disposition not made by the deceased reserved or given to the wife or husband or to a lineal ascendant or descendant of the deceased shall be aggregated with other estate, except as above excepted, passing on his death. Accordingly, as in the main settlement property generally Sir James (secundus) was succeeded by his cousin, that estate does not fall to be massed with other estate passing on his death, but forms an estate by itself. It is, however, a question upon which, though it is not directly raised in the case, I find myself obliged to form some, though I should not be justified in saying a concluded, opinion, viz., whether the provision to the children and widow of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) Mar. 20, 1913.

 though not derived from Sir James (secundus) but from Sir James (primus) Colquhoun's and carved out of the settlement estate, is nevertheless to be massed with Trustees v.
 the property of Sir James (secundus) for determining the rate of duty. That Abercromby.
 question, as at present advised, I should answer in the affirmative. Ld. Johnston.

The mode of collection and recovery of estate-duty is this: The executor of the deceased (section 6 (2) and (4)) shall pay the duty on all personalty passing, of which the deceased was competent to dispose; may pay the duty on any other property passing, which by virtue of any testamentary disposition of the deceased is under the executor's control, and may, at the request of the person accountable, pay the duty on any property passing, which is not under his, the executor's, control. So far as not paid by the executor, the duty is to be collected upon an account delivered by the person accountable for the duty. And it is also expressly provided (section 8 (4)) that where property passes on the death and the executor is not accountable for the duty, "every person to whom any property so passes for any beneficial interest in possession" shall be accountable for the estate-duty on the property, and shall deliver and verify an account. A rateable part of the duty, in proportion to the value of property not passing to the executor as such, may be recovered by the executor under section 9. And similarly a rateable part of the duty paid by any person authorised or required to pay duty, in respect of any property, may be recovered from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary under section 14.

Sir Alan Colquhoun was required to pay the duty on the settlement estate derived from Sir James (primus) as if it was not encumbered by the provisions for the children and widow of his predecessor, Sir James, leaving him to recover a rateable proportion from them. The Inland Revenue by so insisting, do two things which affect the rate of duty—they increase the main settlement estate by the inclusion of the capital value of these provisions, whereby they may affect the rate payable by Sir Alan, and they certainly fix those taking these provisions with a higher rate than they would probably otherwise pay, for they debar them from the opportunity of delivering an account for themselves, and maintaining their right to be charged either (a) at the rate applicable to their provisions taken as separate estates, or (b) at the rate at which they would be charged if these provisions were massed with the estate of Sir James Colquhoun (secundus), their father and husband, under section 4.

Now, it is provided (section 7 (1)) that in determining the value of an estate for the purposes of estate-duty, allowance shall be made for debts and incumbrances, and that any debt or incumbrance for which an allowance is made shall be deducted from the value of the land or other property liable to the duty. I think that the combined effect of section 4 and section 7 (1) is that Sir James's (secundus) children's provision of £20,000 and his wife's provision of £1500 a year are incumbrances to be deducted from the value of the main settlement estate, and are estates by themselves, though it may be aggregated with other estate passing on the death of Sir James (secundus), their father, in order to ascertain the rate of duty. I admit there is some difficulty in reconciling the provisions of sections 4 and 7 with that of sec-

Mar. 20, 1913. Colquhoun's Trustees v. Abercromby. Ld. Johnston. tion 14 (1). I think this is done by regarding the fact that the provisions in question were already an incumbrance secured by infestment on the settlement property, when that property passed on the death of Sir James (secundus), and therefore that each is a separate heritable subject standing on its own title, though they only came into beneficial possession at his death. But even if that is not sufficient explanation of the apparent conflict, I do not think that the incidental provision in section 14 (1) can be held to override the direct provisions of sections 4 and 7 (1).

I think, therefore, that the first query falls to be answered in the affirmative, and the second and third in the negative.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative. Section 23 (10) of the Finance Act, 1894, defines incumbrance to be any heritable security or other debt or payment secured upon heritage. Section 7 (1) provides that in determining the value of an estate allowance shall be made for incumbrances. It further provides (a) that an allowance shall not be made for incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased. (Then follows a sub-exception with which we have no concern in the present case.) The only question we have to consider is whether the provisions of £20,000 and £1500 a year were incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased. It is clear that the word "disposition" is not used in the technical sense of Scots conveyancing. In section 22 (2) (b) the same expression is used, the enactment being: "A disposition taking effect out of the interest of the deceased person shall be deemed to have been made by him, whether the concurrence of any other person was or was not required."

What was the interest which Sir James Colquhoun (secundus) had in the estates upon which the provision of £20,000 and the annuity of £1500 was charged? He had no right of fee, his sole right being derived from the settlement of his father, Sir James (primus). Under it he was entitled to payment from the trustees of an annuity, increasing in amount with the corresponding diminution of heritable debts, from £4000 to £10,000 per annum. These were debts occasioned by the large purchases of land by the truster and the truster's father. The condition attached to Sir James (secundus) being entitled to this annuity was that he should allow the trustees to collect the rents of the entailed estates of Luss, to which he succeeded on his father's death. The annuity of £4000, it was declared by the settlement, was not to be in addition to, or over and above, the rents of the entailed estates, but in lieu and place thereof. The direction to the trustees was to hold the fee of the unentailed portion of the estates for behoof of the heir who should succeed to Sir James (secundus) in the entailed portion thereof.

The question with which we are concerned in the present case arises upon the terms of the sixth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement of Sir James (primus). It directs the trustees, if asked by the testator's son, "to grant and deliver such deed or deeds as may be necessary for securing over my lands and estates hereby conveyed or any part thereof," i.e., the unentailed lands, an annuity not exceeding £1500 in favour of his son's widow, and a provision not exceeding, in the event of there being two children other than the heir succeeding to the said lands and estate, of a sum of £20,000. Sir James (primus) died in 1873. His son, Sir James Colquhoun's (secundus), succeeded him. He requested his father's trustees to grant the deeds necessary to secure the provisions to his children and an annuity to his wife. They did so.

Trustees v.
Abercromby.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

Upon this narrative I think the conclusion follows that these encumbrances were not created by a disposition made by the deceased, nor were they created out of the interest of the deceased in the estate. His interest in the estate was that of an annuitant. The fact that he asked his father's trustees to grant the deeds in question is not, in my opinion, sufficient to bring them within the exception in section 7 (1) (a).

Queries 2 and 3 should, in my opinion, be answered in the negative for the reasons stated in the contentions of the second party to the case. The first parties are not entitled under section 14 (1) to recover from the second party an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate-duty paid by the first parties; the second party is not a person from whom a rateable part of the estate-duty can be so recovered, and is therefore not bound under section 14 (3) by the accounts and valuations as settled between Sir Alan or his trustees and the Inland Revenue. The result of my opinion is that Sir Alan, when he fixed with the Inland Revenue, under section 1, the principal value of the property which passed on the death of his predecessor, Sir James (secundus), should have insisted on his right to deduct from the value of the property the amount of the provisions and annuity in terms of section 7 (1). He would, in my opinion, have successfully contested that they did not fall within the exception in section 7 (1) (a). Taking this view, it is unnecessary to consider the separate point that was made in argument as to the effect of its being a "free" annuity that is provided to the widow. This is all we have to decide in the present case, and in order to arrive at a conclusion it is not necessary to anticipate any questions that may arise between the Inland Revenue and the second and third parties.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative and the second and third questions in the negative.

MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—J. S. & J. W. FRASER-TYTTLER, W.S.—Agents.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Complainers (Reclaimers).— No. 118.
Clyde, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

HUGH SYMINGTON, Respondent.—Murray, K.C.—Macmillan, K.C.— May 13, 1913.
D. Jamieson.

Process—Proof—Diligence for recovery of writs—Confidentiality—Letters by party's law-agents to arbiters and employees of party—Similar business-book entries.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Symington.

In an action of suspension and interdict by a railway company against a quarrymaster, the question at issue being whether the freestone on a certain estate was a mineral, the respondent averred that more than sixty years before the present dispute had arisen the freestone was regarded and treated as a mineral by the complainers in claims and arbitration proceedings between them and the proprietors from whom they acquired the lands. A proof having been allowed, the respon-

May 13, 1913.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Symington.

dent applied for a diligence to recover (1) letters from the complainers' law-agents to arbiters, engineers, contractors, and officials employed by, or acting on behalf of, the complainers in such claims and arbitrations, and tending to show whether the complainers regarded the freestone as a mineral or otherwise, and (2) entries in the business-books of the complainers' law-agents referring to the same transactions.

Circumstances in which the Court (altering judgment of Lord Cullen) granted the diligence, expressly reserving all questions of confidentiality.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Cullen.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, owners of part of the estate of Woodhouse, which they had acquired in 1852, under the Caledonian Railway Act, 1845, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, under a conveyance which excluded minerals, brought an action of suspension and interdict against Hugh Symington, lessee of the right of "quarrying for and removing freestone rock" upon the estate of Woodhouse, to restrain him from working the freestone upon that estate.

In defence it was averred that the freestone on the estate was a mineral, in respect that it was of exceptional quality, that at the time when the land was purchased by the complainers freestone was universally regarded as a mineral, and that "in selling and purchasing respectively the land in question both the sellers and the complainers treated with each other, in respect of the said freestone rock, on the footing that it was admittedly a mineral within the meaning and for the purposes of the said Railways Clauses Act."

The respondent further averred that where railway companies, including the complainers, desired to take rock, they treated expressly with the proprietors therefor, and paid a special price for the rock in addition to the price paid for the land. Specific instances were given where, in claims and arbitration proceedings, this practice had been followed by the complainers from 1845 onwards in connection with freestone taken by them on the estate of Woodhouse and on the adjacent estates of Cove and Mount Annan.

After sundry procedure a proof was allowed.¹ Thereafter the respondent made several applications to the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) for diligences for the recovery of documents. The fourth specification of documents (with which alone this report is concerned) called for the letter-books and business ledgers kept by Messrs Hope, Todd, & Kirk, the complainers' law-agents, and their predecessors, that excerpts might be taken (I.) of all letters passing between the law-agents, and (a) arbiters, oversmen, or clerks acting in arbitrations between the complainers and the proprietors after mentioned, (b) engineers employed by the complainers, (c) contractors employed by the complainers, (d) officials in the complainers' employment, and containing references to freestone as a mineral or otherwise, and tending to show whether the complainers regarded freestone as a mineral or otherwise in dealing with such proprietors and their claims, or containing instructions and reports regarding claims made by such proprietors in respect of freestone or sandstone used by the complainers or their contractors in connection with the construction of their railways, or in any way relating to such claims, or the arbitration proceedings following thereon, viz. :—(a) the proprietors of Woodhouse estate between the years 1845 and 1868; (b) the proprietors of (1) Burnfoot, (2) Kirkpatrick, (3)

¹ 1911 S. C. 552, revd. 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 9. See also 1912 S. C. 1033.

Cove, (4) Barncleugh, (5) Longbedholm, and (6) Mossknowe, between May 18, 1913. said years; and (c) the proprietors of Mount Annan estate between the years 1845 and 1875; (II.) of all entries in the business ledgers kept by the complainers' law-agents relating to instructions, communications, and reports passing between the complainers' law-agents and the persons above mentioned relative to such claims and arbitration proceedings, or to meetings with reference to such claims. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Symington.

On 19th December 1912 the Lord Ordinary granted a diligence for recovery of the letters passing between the complainers' law-agents and the arbiters, oversmen, and clerks relating to the matters specified, and quoad ultra refused the specification.

The complainers, having obtained leave, reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 18th January 1913.

Argued for the complainers;—The specification should have been disallowed in toto. It was now settled law both in England and in Scotland that all communications passing between a client and his solicitor in his professional capacity were protected from disclosure, even though made before any dispute had arisen with regard to the matters therein referred to.¹ This rule applied to all the documents called for. Arbiters nominated by the complainers were in reality their representatives and confidential advisers, and their letters were privileged. Engineers, contractors, and officials of the railway company were in the same position, and the complainers could not be called on to disclose private reports which they had made in the course of their business. Finally, the ledgers of the complainers' law-agents fell in terms within the rule as being a record of professional work done on behalf of their clients.

Argued for the respondent;—The whole-specification should be allowed. The rule of law formulated by the complainers was indisputable, but it did not apply to the present case. It was a rule "confined entirely to communications which take place for the purpose of obtaining legal advice from professional persons,"² and therefore did not protect letters and reports from arbiters, engineers, or reporters. Such letters and reports would be privileged only if made for the purpose of a litigation, and if called for in the course of that litigation. But the purpose for which they were now being sought was quite distinct from the purpose for which they were made. Then, the question was, how much should be paid for the freestone as a mineral? Now, the question was whether freestone was a mineral at all, which partly depended on how it was regarded at the time when the lands were acquired.³ This was a historical fact of which the best evidence, at this interval of time, was to be found in the letters called for. In any event, the letters from the arbiters should be allowed, since it could not be maintained that an arbiter, ¹ Bower v. Russell, May 26, 1810 F. C.; Lady Bath's Executors v. Johnston, Nov. 10, 1811 F. C.; Lumsdaine v. Balfour, (1828) 7 S. 7; McCowan v. Wright, (1852) 15 D. 229, per Lord Wood, at p. 237; Munro v. Fraser, (1858) 21 D. 103; Greenough v. Gaskell, (1833) 1 Mylne & Keen, 98, per Lord Chancellor Brougham, at p. 103; Begg on Law-Agents, 2nd ed.) p. 317.

² Wheeler v. Le Marchant, (1881) 17 Ch. D. 675, per Brett, L.J., at p. 683; Taylor on Evidence, (10th ed.) sec. 911.

³ North British Railway Co. v. Budhill Coal and Sandstone Co., 1910 S. C. (H. L.) 1, per Lord Chancellor Loreburn, at p. 4.

May 18, 1913. even though nominated by a party, was in the position of that party's agent.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Symington. At advising on 29th January 1913 the opinion of the Court was delivered by the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary in dealing with the fourth specification of documents called for by the respondent has allowed the specification in so far as it calls for letters between the law-agents and arbiters, but quoad ultra has disallowed it. On leave granted, the complainers have reclaimed and the respondent has also taken advantage of the reclaiming note.

In the argument before us, both the complainers and the respondent founded on the opinion of Lord President M'Neill in the case of Munro v. Fraser.¹ His Lordship said: "The general rule is, that communications passing between client and agent are confidential. A party is entitled to have advice and to communicate with his law adviser confidentially, and such communication is not to be laid open except in particular circumstances and questions," and he added, "each case of course rests on its particular circumstances."

It is plain that the litigant who is desirous to have a specification sanctioned, cannot have it sanctioned in such form as will lay open to him confidential advice given to his opponent or his opponent's predecessors. But on the other hand, I think it equally plain that in endeavouring to recover what may be called historical facts, a litigant cannot be debarred from obtaining those parts of any document which are not of a confidential character. A letter which conveys information as to facts only might be admissible. Also a letter which in part states facts, and which in part is confidential, can, if the statements of fact are separable in the language from that which is confidential, be excerpted and made available to the party seeking to ascertain facts. For example, suppose that in a case relating to minerals there should be a letter—or its press copy in a letter-book—containing a quotation from a report of an expert regarding the character in fact of a particular bore made to ascertain the nature of the ground below the surface, it would appear to me that the recovery of such a statement of fact, occurring in a letter written in the far past, could be fairly granted, means being taken by sealing up, or by copying, of giving that information, while excluding all, which was not fact, but comment or suggestion. Accordingly, it appears to the Court that the Lord Ordinary, in dealing with the specification which is now before the Court, has gone too far in disallowing altogether the portions which he has refused.

There are here special circumstances which make it necessary that the letter-books and business ledgers called for in the specification, should be exhibited, reserving the question of confidentiality of any excerpt made by the Commissioner for the consideration of the Lord Ordinary.

In the first place, the purpose of the proof which has been allowed must be kept in view. The respondent, Hugh Symington, avers in answer 11, "In selling and purchasing respectively the land in question, both the sellers and the complainers treated with each other, in respect of the said May 13, 1913. freestone rock, on the footing that it was admittedly a mineral within the meaning and for the purposes of the said Railways Clauses Act." Thus the inquiry, in connection with which the diligence is asked, relates to transactions alleged to have taken place at a time when, it is said, no dispute existed, or, owing to the views then held by all parties, could have existed; and when, therefore, no occasion arose for confidential communications or consultations between agent and client, or between employer and employed, in regard to that matter.

¹ 21 D. 103, at p. 107.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Symington.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

The next special circumstance is the period, in some cases extending over more than sixty years, to which the investigation relates. Obviously no oral evidence is now obtainable from any of the parties to the earlier of these transactions. This fact might, however, have been negligible had the documents forming the primary evidence of the transactions been in existence. But it is admitted that these, so far as consisting, for example, of the proceedings in arbitrations, have been destroyed in ordinary course. If the respondent is to prove the averments remitted to probation, it must be, to some extent at least, by secondary evidence.

But it does not follow that the respondent is entitled to unrestricted access to the whole documents called for by him. There may be documents falling under the diligence to which, in whole or in part, the objection of confidentiality will apply. We think the proper course is to grant the diligence as craved, expressly reserving all questions of confidentiality to be determined by the Lord Ordinary. The letter-books and business ledgers will be examined by the Commissioner, who will make excerpts of such letters and entries as fall under the call, and these excerpted letters and entries (so far as objection is taken to their being produced) will be admitted or excluded in whole or in part by the Lord Ordinary according to his view of whether they are or are not confidential.

This is the opinion of the Court.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against and granted a diligence for recovery of the documents called for in the specification as originally lodged, "expressly reserving all questions of confidentiality," and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

The diligence was thereafter executed, and the following documents, relating to transactions and arbitrations in regard to the various estates mentioned in the specification, were, inter alia, produced to the Commissioner (Crabb Watt, K.C.) :—

I. Copies taken from the letter-books of the complainers' law-agents of letters addressed by them to (a) arbiters and oversmen, (b) engineers, (c) contractors, (d) the directors, manager, treasurer, secretary, assistant secretary, local law-agents, parliamentary agents, valuers, counsel, and witnesses, of or employed by the complainers.

II. Excerpts from the business ledgers of the complainers' law-agents containing the accounts incurred to them in connection with the transactions and arbitrations in regard to the estates in question.*

* In his report to the Lord Ordinary the Commissioner stated :—"The Commissioner desires to explain that the letters to the parliamentary agents

May 13, 1913. The complainers objected to all the foregoing documents on the ground that they were wholly confidential, and they also objected that no discrimination was made between letters which specifically referred to sandstone and those which did not, or between letters parts of which might, in the opinion of the Court, be confidential, and those which did not fall into such a category.

Caledonian
Railway Co.
v. Symington.

On 13th May 1913 the Lord Ordinary repelled the complainers' objections in toto, and allowed all the documents to be recovered. His decision was acquiesced in by the parties.

HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—DOVE, LOCKHART, & SMART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 119. ROBERT M'ALLEY AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Dunbar.
JAMES ROBERTSON AND OTHERS (John Charles Robson Marshall's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—J. H. Millar.

May 13, 1913.

M'Alley v.
Marshall's
Trustees.

Process—Reclaiming note—Competency—Timeous lodging of reclaiming note—Final interlocutor—Court of Session (Scotland) Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 11—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 53.

An action reclaimed to the Inner House was settled by a joint minute in terms of which the Division pronounced an interlocutor decerning against the defenders for payment of a certain sum, finding the pursuers entitled to expenses up to and including the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, remitting the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary, and remitting the cause to his Lordship with power to decern for the taxed amount of the account.

The Lord Ordinary thereafter pronounced an interlocutor in which he repelled objections by the pursuers to the Auditor's report, decerned against the defenders for the taxed amount of the account, and found the pursuers liable in the expenses of discussing the note of objections.

A reclaiming note against this interlocutor held not to have been timeously lodged in respect that it had not been lodged within ten days, and refused.

Cowper v. Callender, (1872) 10 Macph. 353, followed.

and the local law-agents have been admitted because it is possible the Court may regard them as officials pro hac vice of the complainers. He further explains that the letters to the local law-agents, counsel, witnesses, engineers, and directors, have been admitted—(1) because they 'in any way relate to instructions and reports of officials of the complainers, or to communications or meetings (including trials or arbitrations) with reference to the claims made and the arbitration proceedings following thereon'; (2) because they tend to show the footing on which the parties were transacting and arbitrating with regard to freestone; and (3) because, fulfilling the conditions in (1) and (2), they reconstruct to some extent the arbitrations of which the primary evidence has been destroyed or lost. The witnesses particularised in the lists seem to have been called with reference, inter alia, to freestone. In some of the letters what is historical is mixed up with what may be called 'instruction.' Others refer to documents such as reports of bores that were intended to figure in the proceedings. . . . David Rankine, the treasurer of the complainers, and John Collister, C.E., may be taken as the types of another class of officials whose letters seem to detail the working out of the awards given in the arbitrations. Further, the great mass of letters are merely historical, as, for example, the instructions to counsel."

ON 31st January 1913, in an action brought by Robert M'Alley and May 18, 1913.
 another against James Robertson and others, the trustees and executors of John Charles Robson Marshall, the First Division, proceeding ^{M'Alley v.} on a joint minute of the parties, refused a reclaiming note for the ^{Marshall's} defenders against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) of ^{Trustees.}
 24th July 1912, and in terms of the joint minute pronounced the ^{1st Division.} following interlocutor:—" . . . Decern against the defenders for ^{Lord Cullen.} payment to the pursuers of the sum of £688, 9s. 10d., with interest thereon at 5 per cent from 3rd August 1910 till paid: Find the pursuers entitled to their expenses up to and including 24th July 1912, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary, to whom remit the cause to proceed as accords, with power to his Lordship to decern for the taxed amount of said account."

The pursuers thereafter lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report on their account of expenses, and on 19th March 1913 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—
 "The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties on the note of objections . . . Repels said objections: Approves of the said report and decerns against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £539, 3s. 10d., the taxed amount thereof."

On 24th April 1913, being the second box-day in the spring vacation, the pursuers lodged a reclaiming note against this interlocutor.

On the calling of the case in Single Bills of the First Division on 13th May 1913, objection was taken by the defenders to the competency of the reclaiming note.*

Argued for the defenders;—It was doubtful whether any reclaiming note was competent against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, as it was purely executorial,¹ but, even if competent, the present reclaiming note was not timeously lodged, as it should have been lodged within ten days, or, as vacation began within that period, on the first box-day of the vacation.²

Argued for the pursuers;—The interlocutor reclaimed against was

* The Court of Session Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36), enacts:—
 Sec. 11. "It shall not be competent to reclaim against any interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, at any time after the expiration of ten days from the date of signing such interlocutor, with the exception only of reclaiming notes against interlocutors disposing in whole or in part of the merits of the cause, and against decrees in absence, which reclaiming notes shall continue to be competent in like manner as at the passing of this Act."

The Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), enacts:—
 Sec. 53. "It shall be held that the whole cause has been decided in the Outer House when an interlocutor has been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, which, either by itself, or taken along with a previous interlocutor or interlocutors, disposes of the whole subject-matter of the cause, or of the competition between the parties in a process of competition, although judgment shall not have been pronounced upon all the questions of law or fact raised in the cause; but it shall not prevent a cause from being held as so decided that expenses, if found due, have not been taxed, modified, or decerned for. . . ."

¹ Inglis v. National Bank of Scotland, 1911 S. C. 6, Lord President, at
 p. 8; Stirling-Maxwell's Trustees v. Kirkintilloch Police Commissioners, (1883) 11 R. 1.

² Court of Session Act, 1850, sec. 11; Court of Session Act, 1868, sec.
 53; Cowper v. Callender, (1872) 10 Macph. 353.

May 13, 1913. a final interlocutor against which a reclaiming note might be presented within twenty-one days.¹ That being so, it was timeously lodged on the second box-day. It was not a purely executorial interlocutor, because it dealt with objections to the Auditor's report, and for this purpose the Lord Ordinary had to apply his mind to a question not previously considered.² The case of *Cowper v. Callender*³ had been overruled.¹

M'Alley v.
Marshall's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I do not find it necessary to say anything upon the question whether the interlocutor reclaimed against is of the nature of a final interlocutor. That question is discussed in the opinion which I delivered in Inglis v. National Bank of Scotland.⁴ The question whether this reclaiming note should have been presented within ten days or within twenty-one is decided by the case of Cowper v. Callender,⁵ which we must follow.

LORD KINNEAR, LORD JOHNSTON, and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—

"Having heard counsel for the parties on defenders' objection to the competency of pursuers' reclaiming note, sustain the objection: Hold that the said reclaiming note has not been timeously lodged: Refuse the same," &c.

HENDERSON & MUNRO, W.S.—MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 120.

JOHN KING, Pursuer (Respondent).—J. Macdonald.

May 16, 1913.

ARNISTON COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Appellants).—

Horne, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

King v.
Arniston Coal
Co., Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (3), Second Schedule (9)—Act of Sederunt, 26th June 1907, secs. 11 (1) and 12—Arbitration to obtain award of compensation—Simultaneous application for warrant to record memorandum of agreement—Conjunction—Competency—Process.

A workman presented an application in the Sheriff Court for warrant to record a memorandum of agreement for payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of an accident. The genuineness of the memorandum was disputed by his employers. While the application was pending he initiated arbitration proceedings to obtain an award of compensation under the Act in respect of the same accident.

Held that the two proceedings could not competently be conjoined, and that the arbitration should be sisted until the application for the warrant had been determined.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and
Peebles.

IN an application for warrant to record a memorandum of agreement for payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, presented in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh by John King, brusher, Gorebridge (the genuineness of the agreement being

¹ Crellin's Trustee v. Muirhead's Judicial Factor, (1893) 21 R. 21.

² Stirling-Maxwell's Trustees v. Kirkintilloch Police Commissioners, 11 R. 1, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 2; Taylor's Trustees v. M'Gairgan, (1896) 23 R. 738.

³ 10 Macph. 353.

⁴ 1911 S. C. 6.

disputed by his employers, the Arniston Coal Company, Limited), May 16, 1913. the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) pronounced an interlocutor conjoining the application with a pending arbitration between the same parties at the instance of the workman, in which the workman sought to obtain an award of compensation under the Act in respect of the same accident. At the request of the employers the Sheriff-substitute stated a case for appeal.

King v.
Arniston Coal
Co., Limited.

The case set forth that on 16th October 1912 the respondent lodged a memorandum of agreement with the Sheriff-clerk at Edinburgh to be recorded in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The memorandum bore that the appellants had agreed to pay, and the respondent had agreed to accept, 14s. weekly as the compensation to which he was entitled under the Act, commencing on 9th May 1912, in respect of an accidental injury sustained by the respondent while in the employment of the appellants. The appellants lodged a minute of objections in which they stated that the memorandum was "not genuine, in respect that no agreement was entered into between the parties such as stated in the memorandum. It is explained and averred that on 28th May 1912 the respondents admitted liability to pay compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and agreed to pay, and the claimant agreed to accept, compensation at the rate of 14s. per week in respect of such accident, it being a material term of said agreement that at the first or any subsequent payment of weekly compensation to the claimant by the respondents liability was admitted only for the compensation to date of payment, and that further liability, if any, would be determined week by week when application for payment was made, and that this was the only agreement entered into between the parties."

On 13th December 1912 the Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof.

On 12th December 1912 the respondent instituted arbitration proceedings in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh by an initial writ, in which he craved the Court to award compensation in respect of the same accident in terms of the Act. He lodged a condescendence, inter alia, setting forth the circumstances of the accident, averring that he continued totally incapacitated for work, and admitting payment by the appellants of all compensation to which he was entitled up to 16th December. The 3rd, 6th, and 9th articles of his condescendence were in the following terms:—

"3. The said accident was duly reported to the defenders, and on or about 28th May 1912 the parties agreed that the pursuer's average weekly earnings were 28s., and the defenders agreed to pay him 14s. a week as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, being 50 per cent thereof.

"6. The pursuer's wife received the first payment of compensation on 28th May 1912. When the pursuer began to call himself at the defenders' office he was not informed that there was any special condition attached to the payment of compensation. When, however, he caused his agent to have the agreement, as he understood it, presented for recording, the defenders objected to the recording thereof, on the ground that it was a material term of said agreement, that, at the first or any subsequent payment of weekly compensation to the claimant by the respondents, liability was admitted only for the compensation to date of payment, and that further liability, if any, would be determined week by week when application for payment was made. The pursuer was unaware of any such condition being printed on any

May 16, 1913. sheet he signed on getting his weekly payments, and he never assented thereto. Reference is made to the pleadings in the application to record a memorandum.

King v.
Arniston Coal
Co., Limited.

"9. As the defenders refuse to continue payment of the agreed-on compensation, and as the parties have never concluded an agreement, this action is necessary."

To this condescendence the appellants, on 31st December, lodged answers, in which they admitted the accident to the respondent, denied that the respondent continued totally unfit for work, and admitted the payment of all compensation to which he was entitled up to 16th December. The appellants' answers to the 3rd, 6th, and 9th articles of the respondent's condescendence were in the following terms:—

"3. Admitted that the accident was reported to defenders. Quoad ultra denied.

"6. The proceedings in the application to record are referred to, beyond which no admission is made.

"9. Admitted that defenders refused to continue payment of compensation at 14s. per week beyond 16th December 1912. Quoad ultra denied."

The appellants did not plead or maintain that it was incompetent to proceed with the arbitration until the application to record the memorandum of agreement had been disposed of.

On 10th January 1913 a motion was made for the respondent to conjoin the arbitration and the application to record the memorandum, and this motion was opposed by the appellants as incompetent. A motion was made for the appellants to have proof fixed in the arbitration on the same day as that fixed in the application to record the memorandum.

The case proceeded:—"Having made avizandum, I thereafter conjoined the said arbitrations, and pronounced the following interlocutor in the application to record:—" Edinburgh, 16th January 1913.—The Sheriff-substitute conjoins with this application to record a memorandum of agreement the application presently depending in this Court at the instance of the claimant to fix compensation, and the following interlocutor in the application for an award of compensation:—" Edinburgh, 16th January 1913.—The Sheriff-substitute, having heard parties' procurators, and seen the condescendence and answers lodged, allows a proof and appoints the cause to be heard, tried, and determined on Thursday, 6th February 1913, at 10.30 A.M. within the Sheriff Court House, Edinburgh; conjoins this application with the application presently depending in this Court at the instance of the claimant for warrant to record a memorandum of agreement."

"In so acting I held that I was competently exercising a discretionary power. I was of opinion that if the appellants succeeded in establishing their defence to the recording of the pursuer's memorandum then the way would be clear for the respondent to have his claim for compensation determined. I was also of opinion that conjunction of the arbitrations would save expense to both parties, one proof between the same parties as to the same accident serving to determine the rights of parties, instead of two proofs with many of the same facts requiring to be deponed to twice."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"In the circumstances was it competent for me to conjoin the foresaid applications?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 16th May 1913. May 16, 1913.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think there is no doubt that the course taken by the Sheriff in conjoining these two sets of proceedings—I do not call them actions—is incompetent. There are two modes under the Workmen's Compensation Act by which a man may obtain compensation. If there is an agreement between him and his employers he may get that agreement recorded. By the other mode, where there is no agreement, there is a process by which the facts are ascertained, and the Sheriff then gives his judgment upon them and awards compensation if he thinks it is due. These two modes seem to me to be absolutely inconsistent with one another, and if either party is to maintain that there is an agreement, his opponent is entitled to be free from any other process until that is decided; because the question of an agreement is a question which must be decided before you can proceed logically to discuss the question whether there is liability or not.

King v.
Arncliffe Coal
Co., Limited.

Now in this case the position is that the claimant began by tabling a memorandum of agreement, to which his employers objected in respect that it did not correctly represent the terms of the agreement between the parties; nevertheless he tabled that memorandum in Court, and proposed to have an inquiry upon it. Then he proceeded by an ordinary initial writ to originate an arbitration for the purpose of establishing that he was entitled to compensation, and of determining what that compensation should be. Now that was the only arbitration in question; the other was not an arbitration, but merely a process to ascertain the fact whether there was an agreement and, if so, what it was.

In the arbitration proceedings the claimant makes the clear averment that he brings the case because there is no agreement. He says that "as the parties have never concluded an agreement this action is necessary." Then we find ourselves in this position, that according to the view of the Sheriff-substitute both these cases, one of which is departed from upon the face of the claimant's own pleading in the arbitration, are still to stand, and that the two are to be conjoined on the sole ground of saving expense. I do not see how that would save expense. It is quite certain that it will add to the expense if it be the case that there is an agreement; because, if the whole proof is taken in both matters, and if the evidence in regard to liability, and the nature of the accident and how it was caused, and whether the pursuer is entitled to recover having regard to his own conduct, is gone into, it will involve a considerable amount of expense which will be absolutely wasted if there is an agreement.

Accordingly I understand it has been the practice in all these cases where it is averred that there is an agreement, that if the injured party chooses to raise an arbitration, the question whether there is a binding agreement must be settled first, and the proceedings in the arbitration must be sisted until that question has been determined. It seems to me that is the simple mode of dealing with the matter, and it has always been followed in proceedings in such circumstances. Therefore I am of opinion that the question put to us should be answered in the negative.

LORD DUNDAS.—I entirely agree.

May 16, 1913. LORD SALVESSEN.—I also am of the same opinion. The Sheriff-substitute has conjoined a proceeding which is not an arbitration with an arbitration and appointed proof in both proceedings as if they were capable of being embodied in one. Now I think that is a fundamental mistake. The second proceeding is not competent at all if the first proceeding is well founded. It may be competent for the workman (I express no opinion on that point) to present an application for arbitration in the event of his failing in his initial proceeding; but, if so, the proper way to deal with it, after he has presented it, is to sist it until it has been determined whether the memorandum of agreement, which he has already presented for registration, is or is not a genuine memorandum within the meaning of the Act.

King v.
Arniston Coal
Co., Limited.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff seems to have had in view, in coming to the result he did, the desirability of saving expense to both parties; but it would appear that any order, which results in the whole of the questions raised in the two proceedings being taken together, would, at least in the event of the memorandum being held good, involve very great additional expense, because in that case the whole expense incurred in the second action would be thrown away. However, the question immediately before us is whether conjunction is competent, and I agree that it is not competent to conjoin the two proceedings, because by statute the one can only be brought on the footing that the statement in the other is not correct.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

T. J. CONNOLLY, Solicitor—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 121.

ROBERT MICKEL, Pursuer (Respondent).—Horne, K.C.—D. P. Fleming.

May 16, 1913.

MRS SARAH M'COARD, Defender (Appellant).—M'Lennan, K.C.—MacRobert.

Mickel v.
M'Coard.

Lease—Occupation—Tenant's duty to preserve subject let from injury—Duty to turn off water when leaving house empty.

Held that the tenant of a villa, who left it unoccupied for a month in winter without having either turned off the water and emptied the cisterns or informed the landlord of her intended absence, was liable to the landlord for damage caused by the bursting of the water-pipes owing to frost.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN June 1911 Robert Mickel, timber merchant and property owner, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Mrs Sarah M'Coard, concluding for payment of £350.

The facts of the case (so far as bearing on the question of liability, with which alone this report is concerned), as ultimately held to be proved, were as follows:—The defender became tenant of a self-contained villa at 22 Larch Road, Dumbreck, Glasgow, belonging to the pursuer, as at Whitsunday 1909, and continued to be tenant thereof until Whitsunday 1911. On 25th December 1909 the defender vacated the villa, leaving no one in it, and went to Dunblane, taking with her the keys. Before leaving, the defender's son, James M'Coard, looked for an inside stop-cock in the house in order to turn off the water. There was no inside stop-cock, the only means of turning off the water being a "toby" or stop-cock in the street, outside the garden gate. When James M'Coard failed to find a stop-cock, no steps were taken to have the water turned off from the main, nor was the pursuer informed that the house was being left empty. The house was left empty, and without firing or airing, until 26th January 1910. On that date the constable on the beat discovered that water was flowing from the house, and on the house being entered, it was found that the water came from three separate bursts that had taken place in the pipes, owing to the water in them having been frozen during the defender's absence. Considerable damage was caused to the house by the flow of water, for the recovery of which the action was brought.

May 16, 1913.
Mickel v.
M'Coard.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender being the tenant of the said dwelling-house under the pursuer was bound to occupy and to keep the same fired and aired, and to take all reasonable precautions against damage to the premises. (2) The defender having failed continuously to occupy the said premises and to keep the same fired and aired, and having deserted the occupancy of the said house during winter weather without making adequate preparation for the prevention of burst pipes therein, whereby damage was caused to the pursuer's property let to the defender, he is entitled to reparation from the defender therefor.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) No damage having been done to the pursuer's property through the fault or negligence of the defender, or anyone for whom she is responsible, decree of absolvitor should be granted with expenses.

On 15th February 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Craigie), after a proof, found that the damage was caused through the negligence of the defender, and assessed the amount at £100, for which sum he granted decree.*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 13th and 14th March and 13th, 14th, and 16th May 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—There was no general rule to the effect that a tenant, on leaving a house for a short period, was bound to leave anyone in it to keep it fired and aired.¹ He was only bound to act reasonably for the purpose of preserving it from harm. In this case the defender had acted reasonably. Her son had looked for a stop-cock for the purpose of turning off the water, and when he found there was no means of turning off the water in the house the defender was entitled to infer that the landlord did not intend her to have anything to do in the matter. The defender was not bound to search for a stop-cock outside the house, and if the pursuer omitted to supply the usual device of an inside stop-cock, he could not hold the defender to blame for not turning off the water. The risk of pipes bursting through frost, like the risk of fire, was a risk incidental to ownership, and lay upon the landlord.

Argued for the respondent;—As a general rule a tenant was bound "to use a reasonable degree of diligence" in preserving a house from

* The Sheriff-substitute indicated in his findings in fact and in his note that one of the main points in which the defender had been negligent was her failure to fire and air the house during her absence.

¹ Whitelaw v. Fulton, (1871) 10 Macph. 27.

May 16, 1913. harm,¹ which included the duty of keeping it fired and aired.² A tenant was not acting reasonably who left a house empty at a time of year when frost might be expected, without turning off the water and emptying the cisterns, or without at least informing the landlord of his absence, so that the landlord might take the necessary precautions.

Mickel v.
M'Coard.

LORD DUNDAS.—This case arises out of an unfortunate dispute between a landlord and a tenant at Dumbreck. I say unfortunate, because the possible amount of money involved seems altogether disproportionate to the expenses which must have been incurred in carrying on the case. One cannot help regretting that the parties did not see their way to settle their dispute out of Court upon some reasonable footing, by the exercise of some good sense and mutual concession. But the case is here, and we must dispose of it. We have had a very full and excellent argument from all the four counsel who addressed us; and as we are all of one mind as to the result at which we ought to arrive, I think it is better to give judgment now and save the parties further delay, anxiety, and expense, even if the remarks which are made now may not be so full as might have been the case if we had taken the matter to avizandum and written detailed judgments. The first question is whether there is liability in damages on the part of the defender here at all. On that matter one must look at the facts, which on that point are quite clear. It appears that the defender and the household left this house on or about 25th December 1909 for a holiday. I think they only intended to be away some ten days, but in point of fact the holiday extended into at least a month. The house was left absolutely empty at a frosty period of the year. The keys were taken away to Dunblane. Before leaving, no effectual steps were taken by the defender to turn off the water, and the risk was therefore incurred of bursting pipes at that season of the year; nor did the defender or any of the household think it worth while to inform the landlord that they were going away. I do not think it is necessary to lay down any absolute general rule of liability in such cases. Mr Erskine puts it broadly that the tenant of a house is bound to use a reasonable degree of diligence in preserving it from harm; and, as an illustration of that undoubted law, it may well be that a tenant while in the legal occupation of a house runs a risk of liability if he fails to do what is reasonably necessary to fire and air it and keep it as it should be kept. Here, Mr M'Coard did proceed to look for the toby to turn the water off, which shows that he recognised that this would be a sensible thing to do. But he did not find it, and not finding it I think the risk was taken of what might happen by leaving the water on. The defender might at least have sent a postcard to the landlord to say that she was going away; but she did not do so, and several bursts were discovered in full operation on 26th January 1910, with the result that damage was done. I think on that state of the facts it would be idle to dispute that primarily liability was on the defender, as was argued for the pursuer, and as the Sheriff-substitute has held.

¹ Ersk. Inst., ii. 6, 43.

² Smith v. Henderson, (1897) 24 R. 1102; Whitelaw v. Fulton, 10 Macph. 27; Rankine on Leases, (2nd ed.) p. 223.

But I think the difficulties in the case arise when one comes to try to May 16, 1913. estimate the amount of the damage, and to deal with the considerations on Mickal v. the one side and on the other which ought to weigh with us in arriving at M'Coard. the true measure and amount of the damage.—[His Lordship then dealt with the assessment of damages, with which this report is not concerned.]

LORD SALVESEN.—I entirely agree in the result at which your Lordship has arrived. I think the Sheriff-substitute has not appreciated the true ground of liability, although he has properly found that the defender was to blame for part of the damage which arose through the bursting of these pipes. The only finding that he has on the subject is as follows :—“That on 25th December 1909 the defender vacated said house and left no person therein to fire or air the house, and that she continued thus to vacate it until 26th January 1910”; and that he holds to constitute negligence in law. I do not think the premises warrant the conclusion.

The duty of a tenant with regard to firing and airing is to do such firing and airing as is necessary to preserve the house from damp. It is not per se a breach of his duty to leave the house empty for a month or two months without firing or airing. If the house does not suffer from the want of firing or airing there is no liability on the part of the tenant towards the landlord; nor can he be compelled to put on fires or air the house. Something may depend on the nature of the subject let, which may require more firing and airing than other subjects; but I do not think it can be affirmed as a general proposition in law that it is negligence on the part of a tenant to leave a house for a period of a month without doing anything in the way of firing and airing.

But then I think, according to the rule laid down by Erskine, that a tenant must use a reasonable degree of diligence in preserving the house from injury. The tenant here failed in her duty. She left the house, taking the keys with her, in the depth of winter, when the pipes were most likely to be exposed to freezing, and she took no precautions to prevent the injury that might arise from the water in the pipes freezing and bursting the pipes and causing a leakage. She was quite alive to the risks, because before she left the house her son went to ascertain whether there was a stop-cock by means of which he could shut off the water. If he had found such a stop-cock he would, according to his own account, have prevented the water from the main from getting into the house, and he would also have run the water out of the cistern. The house would then have been left in a safe condition, even if there were severe frost. But finding no stop-cock, and thinking, apparently, that there was a legal obligation on the landlord to provide such a stop-cock if he wished to avoid the risk of his pipes freezing and the water escaping from the burst pipes, he did nothing further. In the particular circumstances of this case I do not think it was the defender's duty to have searched for the toby outside or to have turned off the water there. In the first place she had not been furnished by the landlord with any means of turning the water off at the toby; she had not even been told that such a toby existed. Accordingly I think she would have fulfilled her duty to her landlord, and used reasonable care in the protection of her landlord's property, if she had notified the landlord that she was going away leaving nobody

May 16, 1913. in charge, and that, if anything required to be done in the way of shutting off the water supply and emptying the pipes, the landlord must see to it that it was done. The landlord did not know that she was leaving, and he was entitled, in the absence of such a notification, to assume that the tenant was remaining in occupation, and that if anything occurred, such as the bursting of the water-pipes, he would be immediately notified by the persons who were occupying the house.

Mickel v.
M'Coard.

Lord Salvesen.

Accordingly, the duty which I think the tenant failed to perform towards her landlord was the duty of intimating to him that she was going to leave the house unoccupied and uncared for, and with the cistern and pipes still connected with the water supply. Had she made this intimation, the landlord could have taken means to guard against the risk of bursting pipes, a duty he could not reasonably expect the tenant to perform in the circumstances already narrated.—[His Lordship then dealt with the assessment of damages.]

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree with your Lordships, both on the points on which your Lordships agree with the Sheriff-substitute and on the points on which you find him wrong. I think that the pursuer is entitled to damages, but that he himself was in fault as well as the defender, and that his fault must be taken into account in estimating the amount of the damages.

In regard to the defender's fault the Sheriff holds that the initial blame was on her, and I think he rightly so holds. But then, as your Lordships have pointed out, he mistakes the nature of the blame. The second finding is: "That on 25th December 1909 the defender vacated said house and left no person therein to fire and air the house, and that she continued thus to vacate it until 26th January 1910." In my view, the failure was of another kind, namely, that, leaving this house for a month in winter, the weather at the time being frosty, she failed either to turn off the water or to intimate the closing of the house to the landlord. The question is a jury one—whether she took or did not take reasonable precautions for the safety of the property let to her. It seems to me that the injury which occurred was not only a possible one, as in the case of gas being left not turned off, but it was ordinary, familiar, and probable. She answers that there were no means inside the house of cutting off the water, and that no key had been given for the outside toby and no information tendered to her about it. That is no answer to the pursuer's alternative suggestion, that, assuming it to be so, she ought to have given intimation to the landlord. Mr M'Coard's view was that the felting should have been sufficient to prevent any possible burst from frost. But the pipes are felted on the assumption that, if the water is allowed to remain on, the house will be occupied and firing and airing will take place. It appears to me, therefore, that the defender has no answer to the liability the Sheriff has found, although I think on the wrong ground, for the initial injury which took place.—[His Lordship then dealt with the assessment of damages.]

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and after findings in fact which are summarised in the preceding narrative, found in law that "the defender, having left the villa May 16, 1913. empty between 25th December 1909 and 26th January 1910, without having turned off the water, or informed the landlord of her intended absence, is responsible for the damage caused thereby," assessed the damage due by the defender at £50, and decerned against her for that sum. Mickel v. M'Coard.

WM. B. RANKIN, W.S.—CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—Agents.

SIR COLIN GEORGE MACRAE, Petitioner.—Hon. W. Watson.

No. 122.

DAVID LEITH, Respondent.—W. T. Watson.

May 21, 1913.

Right in Security—Heritable Security—Bondholder in possession under decree of maills and duties—Right to delivery of leases and other estate documents—Retention—Factor's right to retain estate documents in security of debt due by estate—Agent and Principal—Law-agent. Macrae v. Leith.

Held that a bondholder in possession of a landed estate under a decree of maills and duties was entitled to obtain delivery of the leases and other estate documents showing the contractual relations between the landlord and his tenants, for the purpose of enabling the bondholder to appear as a party to proceedings in the Land Court; and that the factor on the estate had no right to retain the leases or documents in security of a debt due to him by the estate.

Observed by the Lord President that the only person who has such a right of retention available against everyone is a law-agent.

On 11th December 1912 Sir Colin George Macrae, W.S., presented a 1st Division. petition to the Court in which he prayed that David Leith, Wick, should be ordained to deliver to the petitioner "the whole leases, writs, books, accounts, vouchers, and all other documents whatever, of or in connection with the estate of Thrumster, to which the petitioner, as heritable creditor in possession, has right, and in the possession or under the control of the said David Leith."

The petition narrated that the petitioner was in right of a bond and disposition in security granted by the now deceased Robert Innes of Thrumster over the said estate, and that "The principal sum and interest due under the said bond and disposition in security having fallen into arrear, the petitioner, on 1st June 1911, obtained decree in an action of maills and duties at his instance in the Court of Session, whereby it was found and declared that the petitioner had right to the rents, maills, and duties of the said estate of Thrumster, and the petitioner entered on possession under said decree, and proceeded to draw the rents in virtue thereof. The petitioner has, notwithstanding his foresaid right, been hindered, and to a considerable extent frustrated, in his endeavours to recover the said rents, maills, and duties through the want of the leases, accounts, and other documents belonging to the estate which are in the possession of Mr David Leith, of the Savings Bank, Wick, who refuses to deliver or even to exhibit them, alleging a right of lien over the same." It was then narrated that the estate of Thrumster was vested in certain trustees; that one of the latter had been formally appointed to be factor on the estate, but that this gentleman having recently left for Australia, "the whole leases, books, and papers connected with the estate fell into the hands of the said David Leith, who now claims that he is entitled to retain them in respect of a balance

May 21, 1913. which he alleges to be due to him as factor by the trustees, of whom he is one."

Macrae v.
Leith.

The petition further stated:—

"The petitioner submits that no lien exists in the circumstances on which the said David Leith can found a claim to retain the documents, seeing that he was not factor on the estate, and was disqualified from accepting the office or acting as factor in virtue of his being Assessor for the county of Caithness.

"Further, the petitioner believes and avers that no such balance is due as is alleged, but that, on the contrary, a very considerable balance is payable by Mr Leith to the trustees. Mr Leith refuses to exhibit his accounts, and the petitioner has never had any opportunity of knowing how the alleged balance is arrived at.

"The necessity of obtaining the said documents has recently become a matter of extreme urgency, owing to intimation having been received by the petitioner that the Land Court appointed under the Small Landholders Act of 1911 is to begin its sittings in Wick on the 13th September next, for the purpose of adjudicating on claims by the landholders and statutory small tenants on the estate of Thrumster for valuation or revaluation of holdings under the provisions of the said Act. No less than fifty-four claims have been lodged by small tenants on the estate of Thrumster, and the petitioner finds it essential to have immediate access to the said leases, books, and other documents of the estate for the purpose of answering these claims. The petitioner has applied to the said David Leith on more than one occasion for production of these documents, but the said David Leith declines to comply with his request unless and until a sum of £112 is paid to him as aforesaid, and the petitioner avers that the said David Leith is using the circumstances of the present Land Court inquiry as an occasion for causing the petitioner inconvenience and prejudice, and thereby obliging him to pay the said amount."

Answers were lodged by Mr Leith in which it was stated that he was factor on the estate, and had been recognised as such by the petitioner. It was also stated that the true sum in which the estate was indebted to him was £95, 16s. 3d., and that no sum was due by him to the estate. The answers contained this passage:—"The said books, documents, and others referred to in the petition are the property of the trustees on said estate, and the petitioner, as a mere encumbrancer thereon, has no right or title to delivery thereof. Moreover, the respondent, as factor on said estate, has a good and valid lien thereon, and cannot be compelled to part therewith until his just and lawful claims against the said estate are satisfied."

Counsel were heard upon the petition and answers before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Dundas, and Lord Johnston) on 21st January 1913.

Argued for the petitioner;—The respondent was not factor on the estate of Thrumster, and had therefore no title to possession of the estate documents. But assuming him to be the factor, he had, in that capacity, no lien upon the estate documents in his hands for debts due to him by the estate. The only lien of this class known to the law of Scotland was that of a law-agent in respect of his business account, and the Court should not extend the scope of this lien by making it available to factors. It was not on the assignation to writs or on the assignation to rents contained in the bond and disposition, as was assumed in the respondent's argument, that the petitioner based his claim, but on the conveyance of the lands contained in the bond and disposition. The petitioner was, as far as title went, the heritable proprietor of the lands. He was entitled also, by virtue of his decree, to uplift the rents stipulated for in the leases. The petitioner required the documents in question for his appearance as a party at proceedings in the Land Court, where he had an interest and a title to appear.¹

Argued for the respondent;—The petitioner's claim was founded on the assignation to writs contained in the bond and disposition in security. That assignation was only to the titles,² and was not to the documents called for in the petition. But, assuming that the petitioner was under the assignation to writs entitled to recover the leases, his right did not extend further to the books and other documents he claimed. In any case, he could only recover what was assigned to him at the date of the bond. He could not recover leases whose date was subsequent thereto. Further, the assignation to the rents did not justify the present claim. Were it otherwise, that assignation would put the bondholder in possession in the place of the proprietor, to the effect of enabling him to uplift the rents without the necessity of obtaining a decree of mails and duties. The petitioner could not make a greater demand upon the respondent than could his own constituents, the heritable proprietors of Thrumster, and these proprietors would not be in a position to recover from the respondent the documents called for, in respect that he had an agent's lien over them, and was entitled to retain them until his claim for indemnity against the estate was satisfied.³

At advising on 28th January 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition at the instance of Sir Colin Macrae, and it asks for an order upon the respondent, David Leith, to deliver to the petitioner the whole leases, writs, books, accounts, vouchers, and all other documents whatever, of or in connection with the estate of Thrumster, to which the petitioner, as heritable creditor in possession, has right, and which are in the possession or under the control of the said David Leith.

The petitioner is a trustee, who is the holder of a bond and disposition in security in ordinary form granted by a predecessor of the present possessors of the estate of Thrumster. The estate at this moment is in the hands of trustees so far as the title is concerned, but the interest on the bond not having been duly paid, the petitioner on 1st June 1911 entered into possession by means of a decree in an action of mails and duties, and is now in possession under the decree. The estate was managed by the trustees through a factor, and the respondent, Mr Leith, in his answers alleges that he is factor. The reason why the petitioner asks for these various documents is that a sitting of the Land Court has been arranged

¹ Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), sec. 7 (10).

² Titles to Lands Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 119; Juridical Styles, (5th ed.) vol. 1, p. 29; Gloag & Irvine on Rights in Security, p. 90; Schaw v. Blacks, (1888) 26 S. L. R. 545.

³ Glendinning v. Hope & Co., 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 73, per Lord Kinnear, at p. 78.

May 21, 1913. for this part of the country, and various tenants are in the course of making applications for reduction of rent. The petitioner wishes to appear at the Land Court in order to be heard. Now, the petitioner's interest in that matter is quite clear. He is in possession under his decree of mails and duties, and if a rent is reduced by the Land Court he will, of course, get less at the next term when he uplifts. I think his title and interest to appear would have been sufficiently evident even if nothing had been said in the Small Landholders Act; but the matter is made perfectly clear by the Act itself, because it provides—section 7 (10)—with reference to the orders which the Land Court can make for settling a fair rent that, before making such an order, the Land Court shall give all parties having a right or interest in the land an opportunity of being heard. Now that clearly gives a title to the bondholder. He is in possession under his decree in the action of mails and duties, and his reason for wishing the documents is obviously legitimate.

Macrae v.
Leith.

Ld. President.

The petition is resisted by the respondent upon two grounds. In the first place he says that the petitioner has no right as heritable creditor to the various estate documents. I shall have a word or two to say afterwards as to the nature of the documents, but for the moment I am going to take the simplest documents, namely, the leases, and the respondent contends that the petitioner has no right to the leases. I think that is an entire mistake, and the only way in which the argument became possible was that at first it rather seemed from some words used in the petition as if the demand were based upon the clause of assignation of writs. I do not think the clause of assignation of writs has anything to do with it. The bondholder under a bond and disposition in security has got a conveyance of the estate. It is a conveyance which is redeemable, although irredeemable in a certain set of circumstances—the old well-known form of words, “heritably and redeemably, but irredeemably in the case after mentioned,” shows that. There is also a clause of assignation of rents, but although the assignation of rents is a clause in common form, I do not think it would have made any difference if there had not been any such clause. That is clearly indicated by Erakine (iv. 1, 49), who says that the action of mails and duties “is competent, not only to a proprietor who has a feudal right perfected by seisin, but to a simple disponee or assignee; because a right to the rents is included virtually under a disposition of the lands.”

Now there is here a disposition of the lands. It is only a redeemable disposition and may be got rid of. I think it follows that anything that the petitioner may get here does not go to him as his property. He merely gets the right to use it for legitimate purposes. Take the ordinary and most simple case, where a man is in possession of a decree of mails and duties, and goes to the tenant and says, “There is my decree, pay me your rent of £50” or whatever it is, and the tenant says, “No, my rent is not £50, it is £25.” How is that question to be determined unless the demand for the lease is granted? The learned counsel for the respondent tried to say that the ordinary custom was to go to the Valuation-roll. No doubt for convenience it is; but, after all, the Valuation-roll has got no more to do with the question than a directory has, and the action of mails and duties has been part of the law of Scotland for hundreds of years, whereas the Valuation-roll came into being only in 1854. That part of the argument May 21, 1913. therefore was quite inept.

But then the respondent went on to contend that, notwithstanding, he had a right of retention as factor. Now it seems very doubtful from the documents produced before us whether this gentleman is factor or not. That he has been acting as factor is pretty clear, but that he holds the position of factor is more than doubtful. I do not think it necessary to go into that question. I assume that he is factor. What right has he to resist the production of the leases which he holds? The only person, according to the law of Scotland, who has got such a right against all and every other person is a law-agent, and he doubtless has that right even against the heritable creditor, although the heritable creditor's infestment was dated long before the law-agent's account was incurred. That was settled a very long time ago by the case of the Creditors of Hamilton of Provenhall,¹ and that case has been followed and regretted ever since, and in the various judgments—I do not need to quote them, there is a whole series of them which deal with that case—the learned Judges have always said that they cannot go back on the Creditors of Provenhall,¹ because it was settled so long ago, but that the doctrine is never to go one whit further, and certainly it has never been extended to anyone other than a law-agent. It was pled that the effect of the case of Glendinning v. Hope & Company,² which was decided in the House of Lords about two years ago, was to extend that rule. I do not think that case has anything to do with it. That decision was based on the old doctrine that where there are contracts between A and B, A cannot call upon B to fulfil his part of either one or several contracts, while he, A, is refusing to fulfil his part of one or more of the contracts. In that case a stockbroker who refused to deliver a transfer which he had got was held to be entitled to refuse, because the client was himself refusing to pay under another stockbroking transaction. There is no contract whatever between this bondholder and the gentleman who calls himself factor. There is no question of mutual prestations between them, and therefore the case of *Glendinning*² has no application.

I now come to the question of what the petitioner is entitled to get. I do not think that the petitioner here can be blamed for having put his prayer in a general form, and for having used words which probably, indeed I might say certainly, go beyond the measure of his right, because, as he was refused all access to the documents, he really does not know what the respondent has got. I think the way out of that is very clear. It is to pronounce a summary order on the respondent to lodge an inventory of what he has got, and then the petitioner will be able to say what he conceives he is entitled to. But, in order to assist the parties, I may say generally that, while I think that the petitioner is entitled to have the leases, and every thing that shows the relation of contract between the estate and the tenant, I do not think he has any right to ask for estate documents which have been created simply for the proprietor's own uses, and which have nothing to do with the contract between him and his tenants, and therefore the crave for books and so on may go far beyond what the petitioner is entitled to Macrae v.

Leith.

Ld. President.

¹ (1781) M. 6253.

² 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 73.

May 21, 1913. get. I do not think books are necessarily outside the crave, because it might be that a contract between the landlord and his tenant was made by an entry in the books; but ordinary books which are for the proprietor's own use, and for his own purposes, seem to me not to fall within the class of documents which the bondholder ought to get.

Macrae v.
Leith.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree with your Lordship. I do not think that this gentleman is factor, although it is not necessary to decide that question, because there is a passage in his own answers which, I think, practically prevents him saying that he is so. But assuming that he is factor, it seems to me that the use of the term "factor's lien" is misleading. There is a common enough use of the expression "factor's lien," but the use is, I think, confined to cases of mercantile agency, and has not been extended beyond that. It was because in mercantile agency goods are often bought and sold, shipped and received, advances made thereon, and responsibilities undertaken thereon that the lien was given to mercantile agents over what could be turned into money, such as goods, claims, bills, and so on, and I do not think it has ever in practice been held that this factor's lien could or should extend to an estate manager, who is called in Scotland a factor, but who in England would be called a land-agent.

Now this gentleman pleads, and must plead, his alleged lien as high as if he were a law-agent. No case has arisen in Scotland in which the demand has been put forward. But I have come across a case in England to which I think it is worth while to draw attention. The report is so very brief that I may read it. It is the case of Champernown v. Scott,³ in which the precise question we have here came up for consideration. The case came before the Vice-Chancellor, Sir John Leach. "A motion was made that the defendant might deliver up books and papers. The defendant was a solicitor, and insisted that he had a lien upon them, and his answer stated that he received them in his capacity of steward of a manor, and not as solicitor. The Vice-Chancellor held that though a solicitor had a lien upon all papers delivered to him in that character, not only for professional business in the matter of the papers, but for all professional business whilst they remained in his hands, yet that he had no lien, as solicitor, on papers which he received as steward."

That seems to be exactly in point. And in accordance with it I hold that this alleged lien cannot be sustained.

The Lord President intimated that LORD DUNDAS (who was absent at advising) concurred in his opinion.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE were present when the case was advised.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Order the respondent, David Leith, within eight days to deliver up to the petitioner the whole leases mentioned in the prayer of the petition; and further, to lodge in process within eight days an inventory of all other writs and documents in his possession ; May 21, 1913.

³ (1821) 6 Madd. 93, 22 R. R. 248.

and decern."

Macrae v.
Leith.

On 21st May 1913 the Court, in respect that the respondent had now delivered up to the petitioner all the writs and documents required by him, dismissed the petition as unnecessary.

MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—MELVILLE & LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

ANGUS S. CLYNE, Pursuer (Respondent).—Moncrieff, K.C.—T. G. Robertson.

No. 123.

THE REVEREND CHARLES CHALMERS COWIE AND OTHERS (Adam Sharp's Trustees), Defenders (Appellants).—Murray, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

May 23, 1913.

Lease—Small Holdings—Statutory small tenant—Right to renewal of lease on determination of tenancy—Application to Land Court to renew lease and fix rent—Objection that tenancy not determined owing to tacit relocation—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), sec. 32 (4).

Clyne v.
Sharp's
Trustees.

In August 1912 a tenant in occupation of a holding, whose lease had expired at Whitsunday without notice of removal either on his part or on that of the landlord, applied to the Land Court as a statutory small tenant under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (which came into operation in April 1912), for an order renewing his lease and fixing an equitable rent. The Land Court fixed the period of renewal as from Whitsunday 1912. In an appeal by special case the landlord contended that the Land Court could only renew the lease as from Whitsunday 1913, in respect that under sec. 32 (4) of the Act, renewal could only be granted "on any determination of the tenancy," and that in the present case the tenancy did not terminate until Whitsunday 1913, having been continued to that date by tacit relocation.

Held that the determination of the Land Court was right, in respect that the Act itself, at the date when it came into operation, gave the tenant a right to a renewal of his tenancy at the expiry of his lease at Whitsunday 1912.

On 16th August 1912 Angus S. Clyne, farmer, Torraviasch, Caithness, as a "statutory small tenant" in a holding there, presented an application to the Land Court, under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Acts, 1886 to 1911, for an order renewing his tenancy and fixing an equitable rent to be paid by him for his holding. The proprietors of the holding were the Reverend Charles Chalmers Cowie and others, the testamentary trustees of Adam Sharp, of Clyth. The Land Court pronounced an order to take effect from Whitsunday 1912, and, on the request of the proprietors, stated a special case for the opinion of the First Division.*

1ST DIVISION.
Land Court.

The case stated as follows:—

"(2) The respondent became tenant of the said holding at the term of Whitsunday 1907, at a rent of £25 per annum, under a missive of lease for five years. The said lease expired through the running out of the said stipulated term of endurance at Whitsunday 1912. No notice of removal had been given by either party to the other in terms of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908. The respondent continued after Whitsunday 1912, and continues in possession

* The case was stated in terms of sec. 25 (2) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911.

May 23, 1913. of the holding. Nothing was done by either party in reference to the terms and conditions of the tenancy beginning at Whitsunday 1912, until the application referred to in the next paragraph was presented.

Olyne v.
Sharp's
Trustees.

"(3) The respondent's application to the Land Court was presented on 16th August 1912.

"(4) The application was duly served on the said trustees and was heard by the Land Court at Wick on 30th September 1912. No objection was taken to the competency of this application. Proof was led, and the holding inspected by members of the Court. Applicant asked renewal for one year: the proprietors asked that the term should be fixed at seven years. By consent of parties the period was fixed at seven years, subject to a break at the end of three years.

"(5) On 13th December 1912 the appellants received intimation from the Sheriff-clerk at Wick that the following final Order had been pronounced in the application by the Land Court:—'Edinburgh, 4th December 1912.—The Land Court having resumed consideration of this application, find that the applicant is a statutory small tenant in and of the holding described in the application, and that no ground of objection to the applicant as tenant has been stated: Therefore find that he is entitled to a renewal of his tenancy of the said holding, and to have an equitable rent fixed: And having considered all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, fix and determine the period of renewal at seven years from the term of Whitsunday 1912, . . . and fix and determine the equitable annual rent payable by the applicant at Twenty pounds sterling, to run from the term of Whitsunday 1912.'

The contentions of parties were stated as follows:—

"6. The appellants object to the final Order of the Land Court (1) in so far as it fixes and determines the period of renewal of the respondent's tenancy of the holding as from the term of Whitsunday 1912, and (2) in so far as it reduces the rent of the holding as from the same term, and maintain that under the provisions of section 32 (4), (5), (6), and (7) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, it was ultra vires of the Land Court to fix an equitable rent for, or the period of the respondent's tenancy of, the holding for the current year to Whitsunday 1913, in respect (a) that the respondent's existing tenancy has not 'determined,' and (b) that the respondent failed to give notice requisite to terminate his tenancy at Whitsunday 1912 in terms of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908. The appellants do not maintain that the term of removal must have arrived before the application is dealt with by the Land Court.

"7. The respondent maintains (1) that in virtue of the definition of the expression 'termination of the lease' contained in section 31 of the Act of 1911 and of section 2 (1) (iii.) the tenancy under the said lease terminated at Whitsunday 1912, and the Act of 1911 then applied to the holding, and that his renewed tenancy is from Whitsunday 1912, a tenancy to which subsections (4), (5), (6), (7), and (9) of section 32 apply; and (2) that neither the notice of removal prescribed by section 18 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, nor any other notice, is required to bring the Act of 1911 into operation."*

* The Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), enacts:—

Sec. 2. "Who to be Landholders.—(1) In the Crofters Acts and this Act

The questions of law were:—(1) Whether, on the facts as stated, May 23, 1913. and having regard to the provisions of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, the Land Court were entitled to fix the renewal of the respondent's tenancy of said holding and the equitable rent to be paid by him therefor, as from Whitsunday 1912? (2) Whether it is competent for the Land Court to entertain any application by the respondent for fixing an equitable rent and determining the period of renewal of the tenancy until he has given the notice of removal required to terminate an existing tenancy under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, section 18?" Clyne v. Sharp's Trustees.

The case was heard before the First Division on 13th May 1913.

Argued for the appellants;—No notice of removal at the ish of the respondent's lease had been given as was required by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, and the Land Court had erred in holding that that Act did not apply. In the absence of such notice the (hereinafter referred to collectively as the Landholders Acts) the word 'holding' means and includes—

"(i.) As from the commencement of this Act, every holding which at the commencement of this Act is held by a crofter to whom in respect of such holding the Act of 1886 applies (hereinafter referred to as an existing crofter);

"(ii.) As from the commencement of this Act, and subject as hereinafter provided, every holding which at the commencement of this Act is held by a tenant from year to year who resides on or within two miles from the holding, and by himself or his family cultivates the holding with or without hired labour (hereinafter referred to as an existing yearly tenant);

"(iii.) As from the termination of the lease, and subject as hereinafter provided, every holding which at the commencement of this Act is held under a lease for a term longer than one year by a tenant who resides on or within two miles from the holding, and by himself or his family cultivates the holding with or without hired labour (such tenant, or his heir or successor, as the case may be, holding under the lease at the termination thereof being hereinafter referred to as a qualified leaseholder):

"Provided that such tenant from year to year or leaseholder—

"(a) shall (unless disqualified under section twenty-six of this Act) be held an existing yearly tenant or a qualified leaseholder within the meaning of this section in every case where it is agreed between the landlord and tenant or leaseholder, or in the event of dispute, proved to the satisfaction of the Land Court, that such tenant or leaseholder or his predecessor in the same family has provided or paid for the whole or the greater part of the buildings or other permanent improvements on the holding without receiving from the landlord or any predecessor in title payment or fair consideration therefor; and

"(b) in every other case shall not be held an existing yearly tenant or a qualified leaseholder within the meaning of this section, but shall (unless disqualified under section twenty-six of this Act) in respect of the holding be subject to the provisions of this Act regarding statutory small tenants;

"(iv.) As from the date of registration, every holding which is constituted by the registration of an applicant in respect thereof on his application under the provisions of this Act respecting

May 23, 1913. respondent's existing tenancy under that lease was renewed by tacit relocation for the year ending Whitsunday 1913.¹ At that term, but not until then, was the respondent entitled as a "statutory small tenant" under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, to a renewal of his lease at a fair rent, because under section 32 (4) it was only on the "determination of the tenancy" that the right emerged, and the tenancy did not terminate until Whitsunday 1913.

Clyne v.
Sharp's
Trustees.

Argued for the respondent;—Independently of any notice the respondent's tenancy was terminated at Whitsunday 1912 by force of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, the old status of tenancy being replaced by a new status with statutory rights. The respondent's status under the Act being that of a statutory small tenant, an order fixing the terms and conditions of renewal of his tenancy, on the statutory determination thereof as at Whitsunday 1912, had been the constitution of new holdings (hereinafter referred to as a new holder).

"(2) In the Landholders Acts the word 'landholder' means and includes, as from the respective dates above mentioned, every existing crofter, every existing yearly tenant, every qualified leaseholder, and every new holder, and the successors of every such person in the holding being his heirs or legatees."

Sec. 31 (1). ". . . The expression 'termination of the lease' means the expiration of the lease through the running out of the stipulated term of endurance or through the parties, or either of them, exercising their right to take advantage of a break stipulated for in the lease or through any agreement between the parties being made, or other circumstances arising whereby the lease is terminated. . . ."

Sec. 32. "Provisions as to statutory Small Tenants.—With respect to statutory small tenants, the following provisions shall have effect:—

"(1) A statutory small tenant means and includes a tenant from year to year, or leaseholder, not otherwise disqualified in terms of this Act, in regard to whom section two of this Act provides that he shall not be held an existing yearly tenant or a qualified leaseholder, and the successors of such tenant or leaseholder in the holding, being his heirs, legatees (if within the relationship specified in section sixteen of the Act of 1886), or assignees (if assignation be permitted by the lease):

"(2) Except so far as expressly applied by this Act, the Landholders Acts shall not apply to statutory small tenants:

"(4) Except in any case where the landlord satisfies the Land Court that there is reasonable ground of objection to a statutory small tenant (hereinafter in this section referred to as the tenant) and the Land Court find accordingly, the tenant for the time being shall, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, be entitled on any determination of the tenancy to a renewal thereof on the terms and conditions hereinafter specified:

"(5) Except so far as varied by this section, the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1908 and 1910, shall apply in the case of the tenancy of a statutory small tenant in the same manner as if the tenancy were a lease, and, for the purposes of those Acts and otherwise, the tenancy, as renewed from time to time, shall be deemed to be a lease current for the period of renewal:

"(6) Subject to the provisions of the last-mentioned Acts and of this competently pronounced by the Land Court, upon his application May 23, 1913. made in exercise of rights conferred by the Act.¹ It was only subject to the provisions of the Act that the doctrine of tacit relocation could be appealed to,² and under the Act the fact that no notice of removal had been given by tenant or landlord did not effect a continuation of the old lease. Clyne v. Sharp's Trustees.

¹ Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 64), sec. 18 (2); Ersk. ii. 6, 35 and 44.

At advising on 23rd May 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case stated by the Land Court requesting your Lordships' opinion upon a question of law. The facts upon which the matter arises are these. Angus Clyne was tenant of a holding upon the estate of Clyth, the proprietors of which are certain testamentary trustees. Clyne became tenant of the holding at a rent of £25 a year at Whitsunday 1907, under a missive of lease for five years. The ish of the lease was, accordingly, Whitsunday 1912. No notice of removal was given either by the landlord or the tenant before that term, but on 16th December 1911—that is to say, not quite six months before the ish of the lease, the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act was passed, which came into operation on the 1st April 1912. Nothing happened as between the parties at the time of the expiry of the tenancy, but on 16th August 1912 Clyne presented an application to the Land Court, asking the Land Court to fix the term of renewal of the tenancy and the equitable rent. The Land Court having considered the application, pronounced an order or judgment in which they found that the applicant was a statutory small tenant: "Therefore find that he is entitled to a renewal of his tenancy of the said holding, and to have an equitable rent fixed: And having considered all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, fix and determine the period of renewal at seven years from the term of Whitsunday 1912"—I leave out other matters which are not of moment—"and fix and determine the equitable annual rent payable by the applicant at £20 sterling, to run from the term of Whitsunday 1912."

The point of law upon which our judgment is asked is whether that order was intra vires of the Land Court in respect that it made a new tenancy, or renewal of tenancy, run from Whitsunday 1912. The contention of the proprietors before your Lordships was that that was impossible, because the moment that the term of Whitsunday 1912 arrived—no notice having been section, the landlord and the tenant may agree upon the terms and conditions of the renewed tenancy:

- "(7) Failing agreement, the landlord or the tenant may apply to the Land Court to fix an equitable rent, or to fix the period for which the tenancy is to be renewed, and the Land Court may thereafter determine the rent to be paid by the tenant, or the period of renewal, or both, as the case may be:
- "(9) Subject as aforesaid, the terms and conditions of the renewed tenancy shall (except so far as agreed to be varied) be those of the determining tenancy, in the same way and to the same effect, as nearly as may be, as if the tenancy had been continued for the full period of renewal under tacit relocation, and the tenant shall be entitled, if he so desires, to a renewal on those terms and conditions."

¹ Sec. 32 (4) and (7).

² Sec. 32 (6) (9).

May 23, 1913. given—a new tenancy was ipso facto constituted for one year by tacit relocation, and that, although the Land Court had a power to ordain a renewal of a tenancy where a person was a statutory small tenant—which they did not deny that this man was—yet they could only arrange for a renewal of the existing tenancy. Now the existing tenancy, according to the argument, was a tenancy that began at Whitsunday 1912 and only expired at Whitsunday 1913; and therefore the landlords argued that this judgment of the Land Court was ultra vires, inasmuch as, instead of dealing with the tenancy as from Whitsunday 1913, it dealt with it as from Whitsunday 1912.

Clyne v.
Sharp's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

The matter depends entirely upon the provisions of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, and this is the first time we have had an opportunity of considering its provisions. The scheme of the Act, or rather the way in which the provisions of the Act are arranged, is somewhat peculiar. The Act begins by reading in the expression "landholder" into the Crofters Acts, and then it goes on, in section 2, to define what a landholder is. It first of all says that the word "holding" means and includes every holding which is held by a crofter. That we have nothing to do with in this case. Then it goes on (subhead (ii.) of section 2 (1)) to include tenants from year to year—[His Lordship read the subhead]. I pause to note that, if the matter stopped there and we had nothing more, that would bring every yearly tenant in Scotland within the purview of the Act. Then subhead (iii.) deals with those who have leases—[His Lordship read the subhead]. There again, if nothing else was said, that would bring in every leaseholder in Scotland. But I may, without actually reading them, at once give the effect of subsequent sections of the Act by saying that many persons are excluded by what is called disqualification, and one of the disqualifications which prevent a person being an existing yearly tenant or a qualified leaseholder is where his holding is worth more than £50 a year. Accordingly, whereas, with the first breath, the whole existing leases in Scotland are brought in, by a subsequent part of the Act they are all cut out so far as they represent holdings worth over £50 a year. But the point which I think is to be noted is this—that the period at which the inquiry is to be made to find out whether people are within the statutory classes of existing yearly tenants or qualified leaseholders is at the commencement of the Act—in other words, it is the date of 1st April 1912 that once and for all fixes the character of existing yearly tenant and qualified leaseholder. But although the section has defined existing yearly tenants and qualified leaseholders in the way in which I have just read, yet it goes on, in words which I shall gloss instead of reading, to say that they shall only be so considered if they have made their own improvements; but that if the landlord has made the improvements instead of them, then, although they are existing yearly tenants and qualified leaseholders by force of definition, yet they shall not be held to be such, but instead they shall be subject to the provisions of the Act regarding statutory small tenants.

Now, I shall apply the definitions of the statute to the facts here, before I go further, for the sake of simplicity. That matter seems to me very clear. Mr Clyne was a person who, on 1st April 1912, held land under a lease for a term longer than one year, he resided upon the holding, and cultivated it himself and the holding was not worth more than £50 a year. May 23, 1913. Accordingly, he quite clearly fell within the definition of subhead (iii.) of section 2 (1)—that is to say, he was a qualified leaseholder. But then we are told that, as a matter of fact, Mr Clyne had not made his own improvements. Accordingly, under the provisions of clause (b) of section 2 (1) (iii.), although he is a qualified leaseholder, he cannot be held to be a qualified leaseholder, but he is a person to whom the provisions of the Act applying to statutory small tenants applied. The position of Mr Clyne being thus defined, we are at once sent to the portion of the Act which tells us what is the position of a statutory small tenant, namely, section 32. That section begins, "With respect to statutory small tenants, the following provisions shall have effect." The first subsection is practically a repetition of the definition which I have already extracted from the different provisions of section 2. Then, leaving out some subsections which I do not need to read, I come to subsection (4)—[His Lordship read the subsection]. Then there is a provision that the terms and conditions of the renewed tenancy may be fixed, if the parties so choose, by agreement; and then it is provided—[His Lordship read subsections 7 and 9].

Clyne v.
Sharp's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

Now I think that the effect of those provisions is not doubtful. We have, as I have already pointed out, to look at the date of 1st April 1912 to find out whether Mr Clyne was within the Act or not. On considering the circumstances of his case, we find that at 1st April 1912 he was a qualified leaseholder, who, in the somewhat curious terms of the Act, is not to be held to be a qualified leaseholder, and he was a person, therefore, to whom the provisions as to statutory small tenants applied. He could not get the benefit of his right of renewal until his lease expired, and accordingly he did not get what you may call a practical right under the Act until Whitsunday 1912; but as soon as the Whitsunday term arrived, it seems to me that he was, in terms of the Act, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, "entitled . . . to a renewal thereof on the terms and conditions hereinafter specified" (section 32 (4)). And the terms and conditions after specified were that, failing agreement between the parties—and no agreement here is alleged—all the conditions of the old lease were to remain as before, except only that the tenant had a right to ask the Land Court to fix for him the period of the renewed lease and the rent which he was to pay under it. Now he did both those things, and I think he went quite timeously to the Land Court, for he really went almost as soon as the Land Court was constituted. Accordingly, I think the Order of the Land Court was justified.

My view is that under the Act a person in this condition is entitled, as soon as his lease has expired, to this statutory right of renewal, and that this statutory right of renewal, so to speak, suspends the operation of what I may call common law tacit relocation, which, under these circumstances, would have taken place if the Act had not been passed. I say "suspends," because I can imagine that, if no application at all was made to the Land Court, and if nothing else was said, and if the man simply went on year after year, it might be that he would be sitting under tacit relocation, he not having taken advantage of the provisions of the Act. And I think that that consideration gets rid of the difficulties which were suggested in

May 28, 1913. argument as to what would have happened if the tenant had gone on for years and then come to the Land Court. I think that in that case it would have been found that he was too late. I think a person may disable himself from taking advantage of the provisions of the Act of Parliament by Clyne v.

Sharp's
Trustees.

Ld. President. not being timeous. But here there was nothing of that sort. The fallacy, I think, of the argument for the landlord—which, upon the first statement of it, seemed convincing—lies in this, that it really presupposes that the right which the man gets to the renewed tenancy is a right which he gets from the Land Court on application. I do not think he does. I think he gets the right ipso facto under the statute and that all that the Land Court does is to fix certain terms of the lease—very weighty ones certainly, namely, the ish and the rent; but, nevertheless, the lease itself—the renewed tenancy—depends upon the provisions of the statute and not upon the decision of the Land Court. That view really gets rid of the seeming difficulty which was put interrogatively in the argument, namely, on what title was this man sitting during, say, the month of June. “Tacit relocation,” said the landlord. But I think the answer is that he was not. He was sitting under a statutory renewal of which the terms had not yet been fixed.

That being my opinion, I think the Land Court decided rightly on this matter, and that we should answer the question put to us in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship for the reasons which you have stated, and I do not think it necessary to repeat them in other words.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I also agree with your Lordship, but, with some hesitation, I shall give my own view upon one part of the case. I have felt the difficulty, perhaps more strongly than your Lordship, which arises on a portion of the Act with which your Lordship has dealt, but I have been relieved by considerations which are somewhat different from those which your Lordship has stated.

The difficulty which I have experienced is in reconciling the common law idea of tacit relocation with the particular provisions of this 32nd section. Because it has seemed to me that if the judgment of the Land Court is correct, there is an opening for a tenant to sit on until the term arrives and then to say—“After all, I do not want this renewed and I am going away,” and so to leave the landlord at the term in the lurch without a tenant. Let me turn to the provisions of section 32 of the Act. In the first place, in subsection (4) there is the expression “on any determination of the tenancy,” and that at once raises the question, why should the interpretation clause in section 31 use the expression “termination of the lease,” when one does not find “termination of the lease” used in section 32 (4) but a different term—“determination of the tenancy.” I think that that difficulty may be got rid of by this consideration, that the determination of the tenancy includes not only the termination of the lease, but also the determination of a tenancy precedent to a statutory extension of the lease under the provisions of section 32. But then subsection (5) raises a much greater difficulty in respect that it declares the provisions of this section to be subject to all the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1908 and 1910. Amongst other things these Acts not only recognise tacit relocation but make special provision for statutory notices to take the place of the common law notices required to prevent tacit relocation, and it is somewhat difficult to see how these provisions can apply to a current lease or to a tenancy extended under the Act and yet that the tenant should be entitled to delay until after the determination of the lease, when, ex hypothesi, tacit relocation must have taken place, without giving notice that he wants reconsideration of the terms of his tenancy. But I think that the difficulty is obviated by this consideration: I think tacit relocation has in a case such as the present really taken place, and that the tenant who has allowed the proper time of notice to pass without giving notice has become tenant for at least another year in terms of subsection (5); but there is this expression in the beginning of subsection (5): "Except so far as varied by this section." And I think that tacit relocation, though it has occurred, is so far affected by this subsection that it is tacit relocation of the holding on the terms and conditions of the lease, all except those two items which the tenant or landlord, as the case may be, may call on the Land Court to determine for them under subsection (7), namely, the rent and the duration. And in that way the idea of tacit relocation may be reconciled with the provisions of this section of the statute.

*Clyne v.
Sharp's
Trustees.*

Ld. Johnston.

For these reasons I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the judgment of the Land Court is sound.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The only question which need be decided in this case is the first. The appellants contend that the Land Court had no power to fix a rent for the respondent's holding as from Whitsunday 1912, when the period fixed by the lease expired. Their argument is that from Whitsunday 1912 down to Whitsunday 1913 Clyne held by tacit relocation; and that there accordingly was for that year a legal tack the terms of which could not be altered. This contention appears to me not to be consistent with the provisions of the statute. The title of the respondent to the benefits of the Act (which came into operation on 1st April 1912) was that of a leaseholder, and under 2 (1) (iii.) (b) a statutory small tenant. His title could not be that of a tenant from year to year at the commencement of the Act, because the lease stipulated in the lease was subsequent to the date when the Act came into operation. If, however, he was a leaseholder, the date of the "termination of the lease" means (under section 31 (1)) the expiration of the lease through the running out of the stipulated term of endurance, that is to say, Whitsunday 1912. This under section 32 (4) was the "determination of the tenancy." That expression was, in my opinion, used in that subsection because different classes are being dealt with, and it was intended to cover termination of the lease in the case of the leaseholders, as well as the expiry of the year in the case of a tenant from year to year. The true construction of the Act is, in my opinion, this:—On the Act coming into operation a right vested in the parties entitled under section 2, postponed only, in the case of leaseholders, to the termination of the existing lease, and in the case of tenants from year to year, to the expiry of the year then current. The right which so vested could be made effectual by an application to the Land Court. To this May 23, 1913. extent the Act innovates upon the doctrine of tacit relocation. It is not necessary to decide what effect the doctrine of tacit relocation would have if the person in whom the right vested delayed, after the right had vested, in making his application.

Olyne v.
Sharp's
Trustees.

In the present case I think it was not incompetent for the Land Court to do what they did.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the second question.

GORDON, FALCONER, & FAIRWEATHER, W.S.—J. & A. F. ADAM, W.S.—Agents.

No. 124. HUGH CARMICHAEL AND JAMES CARMICHAEL, Pursuers (Respondents).
—Moncrieff, K.C.—Morton.

May 23, 1913. DUNCAN MACCOLL, Defender (Appellant).—Chree, K.C.—Macgregor.

Carmichaels
v. Maccoll.

Lease—Small holdings—Statutory small tenant—Joint tenants—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), secs. 2 (1) (iii.) (b) and 26 (8).

Held that the provisions of sec. 32 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, as to statutory small tenants applied to the case of a holding which at the commencement of the Act was held by joint tenants, and continued to be held by the same tenants at the date of their application to the Land Court.

1ST DIVISION. ON 18th June 1912 Hugh Carmichael and James Carmichael, joint tenants of a farm on the estate of Achindoun, in the county of Argyll, presented an application as "statutory small tenants" of their holding, to the Land Court under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, for an Order, inter alia, fixing a fair rent for the holding, of which the proprietor was Duncan Maccoll of Portcharren and Achindoun, Lismore, Argyllshire. The Land Court pronounced an Order. The proprietor asked for and obtained a special case for the opinion of the First Division.

The case stated, inter alia, as follows :—

"1. Hugh Carmichael senior and James Carmichael were joint tenants of the farm of Mid Achindoun and one-sixth share of the Island of Bernera, on the estate of Achindoun, Lismore, under a lease, which is printed in the appendix, and made a production in this case, granted by Duncan Maccoll, the proprietor of the said estate.* The stipulated period of endurance of the said lease was nine years from Whitsunday 1903, the yearly rent being £48. The stipulated period expired at Whitsunday 1912. Neither party gave notice of removal at the termination of the stipulated period of endurance. The tenants continued and continue in possession. . . .

"3. . . . After proof before answer and inspection, the Land

* The lease bore :—"It is contracted and agreed between Duncan M'Coll, Esquire of Portcharren and Achindoun, Lismore, on the one part, and Hugh Carmichael senior and James Carmichael, farmers, Achindoun, Lismore, on the other part, in manner following—That is to say, the said Duncan M'Coll hereby lets to the said Hugh Carmichael senior and James Carmichael, and their heirs . . ."

Court issued an interlocutor in the following terms :—' Wick, 1st May 23, 1913. October 1912.— . . . Find that the applicants are joint statutory small tenants in and of the holding described in the application, and became entitled to a renewal of their tenancy as at and from the term of Whitsunday 1912, under and in terms of section 32 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 . . . '

Carmichael
v. Maccoll.

"4. The said Duncan Maccoll disputes this decision on the ground that the application is incompetent (1) in respect that the provisions of the said Act with regard to statutory small tenants do not extend to joint tenants ; (2) in respect that tacit relocation having, by neither party having given notice of removal, taken place before the said Act came into operation, there was no determination, and therefore there could be no renewal of the tenancy at Whitsunday 1912 within the meaning of section 32 (4) (9) and (11) of the said Act.*

The questions of law included the following :—" (1) Whether the provisions of section 32 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, apply to the case of a holding which at the commencement of the Act was held, and continues to be held, by joint tenants ? "

The case was heard before the First Division on 13th May 1913.

Argued for the appellant :—The Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, specified certain classes of joint tenants to whom the provisions of the Act should extend,¹ and, as "statutory small tenants" were not included in that specification, the inference was clear that the Legislature did not intend the benefits provided for "statutory small tenants" to be available to joint tenants. This was in accordance with the policy of the Act which clearly did not favour the multiplication or continuation of joint tenancies.¹

Argued for the respondents ;—There was no reason to think that the Legislature intended to exclude joint tenants in the position of the present respondents from the privileges of statutory small tenants. There was nothing in the Act to lead to such a conclusion except perhaps section 26 (8), but if that proviso was carefully considered it became plain that its only object was to make it clear that no new holders were to be registered as joint tenants. Section 2 covered persons in the position of the respondents.

At advising on 23rd May 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case raises, to begin with, precisely the same point as the one that your Lordships have just decided in the case of

* The case is not reported upon the point raised by the second objection, which is the point decided by the case immediately preceding the present, viz., Clyne v. Sharp's Trustees, supra, p. 907.

Sec. 2 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), is quoted supra, p. 908.

Sec. 26 (8) enacts :—"The provisions of section two of this Act shall extend to and include joint tenants being existing crofters, existing yearly tenants, or qualified leaseholders ; but not more than one person shall be registered as a new holder in respect of any holding, and (without prejudice to the continuance of a joint tenancy through statutory successors) where at any time after the commencement of this Act a holding is held by a single landholder, or a holding which has been held in joint tenancy ceases to be so held, it shall not be competent for more than one person to be a landholder in respect of such holding."

¹ Sec. 26 (8).

May 23, 1913. Clyne.¹ The judgment, necessarily, will be the same. But there is the additional point in this case, that the applicants are joint tenants, and it was argued to your Lordships that the provisions of the Act which I have gone through do not apply to joint tenants.

Carmichael

v. Maccoll.

Ld. President.

I cannot disguise from myself that I think this question is one of some difficulty, but, upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that here again the judgment of the Land Court is right, and that joint tenants are admitted to the benefit of the provisions of the Act applicable to statutory small tenants. The whole difficulty arises from the terms of subsection (8) of section 26, which is a general section of supplementary provisions. If that section had not been there I do not think there can be much doubt that we should have construed the word tenant in the Act as including a joint tenant. But subsection (8) of section 26 provides:—[His Lordship read the subsection]. And it is argued that inasmuch as the section says specially that joint tenants shall be included where they are existing crofters, existing yearly tenants, or qualified leaseholders, and does not mention statutory small tenants, it is meant that statutory small tenants should be excluded.

I am not driven to that result, which I think would be an unfortunate one. I do not think that the subsection that I have just read was really put in for any purpose whatsoever except to make it clear that there were to be no new holders registered as joint tenants, and that if in any case an existing holding under joint tenancy ceased to be so held by one of the tenants going away and not wishing to renew, a new joint tenant should not be put into the holding. In other words, the Act did not want to foster joint tenancy. But I think that the answer to the strict legal argument is to be found in the curious phraseology of section 2, to which I referred in the case of *Clyne*¹ which we have just decided, where persons are first defined as crofters, existing yearly tenants, and qualified leaseholders, and then in a certain case it is said not that an existing yearly tenant and qualified leaseholder is not to be so but that he is not to be held so, and certain things are to apply to him. I think that, on a strict reading of the words, these persons are existing yearly tenants or qualified leaseholders in the sense of section 2, and that therefore the joint tenants in this case are included although they are not to be held so, and, accordingly, have not the benefit of the other sections which apply to existing small tenants and qualified leaseholders, but instead have only the benefit of the section applying to statutory small tenants.

The total result is, I think, that the judgment here is right, and that so long as these two people come forward to ask for renewal they are entitled to have it. If one of them, for any reason, disappears, then I do not think any other joint tenant can ever be put in his place.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have more difficulty in this case than in the last one, but I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship and do not find myself bound to put the strictest verbal interpretation upon the mere words of the 8th subsection of section 26 to the effect of depriving joint tenants of the right which the statute would otherwise clearly give. I agree with your Lordship's conclusion.

¹ Supra, p. 907.

Carmichaels
v. Maccoll.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur. There is no doubt that subsection (8) of section 26 of the Act does create considerable difficulty by reason of the use of the words "existing" and "qualified." Had those words not been there, there would have been no difficulty. But I think that the explanation which your Lordship has given is sufficient, and that if the word "such" in the proviso which precedes section 2, subsection (1) (iii.) (b) is considered in relation to what precedes and what follows, it really explains what the Legislature meant, namely, to include the statutory small tenant within the purview of section 26, subsection (8).

LORD MACKENZIE.—I have had great difficulty in this case, occasioned by the way in which this Act has been drafted, but I agree in the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the affirmative.

M. GRAHAM YOOL, S.S.C.—HUME M'GREGOR & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

CLAUDE J. PERCEVAL AND ANOTHER (Morison's Trustees), Appellants. No. 125.

—D. M. Wilson.

GEORGE GRANT, Respondent.—W. Mitchell.

May 24, 1913.

Lease—Small holdings—Tenant from year to year—Application by tenant who, before passing of Act, received notice to quit after Act came into operation—Competency—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), sec. 2 (1) (ii). Morison's Trustees v.
Grant.

A yearly tenant in possession of a holding at 1st April 1912, when the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, came into operation, had, before the passing of that Act, received notice to remove at Whitsunday 1912. In an application by him to the Land Court for an Order fixing the rent and the period of renewal of his tenancy—

Held that the service of the notice of removal did not exclude the application as incompetent.

THIS was a special case stated by the Scottish Land Court at the request of Claude J. Perceval and others, trustees of the late Lieutenant-Colonel Morison of Bognie and Mountblairy, the respondents in an application by George Grant, crofter, Waulkmill, Banff, to the Scottish Land Court. 1ST DIVISION.
Land Court.

The facts as set forth in the case were as follows:—Grant was tenant of Waulkmill, a croft extending to fifteen acres or thereby. His lease of the croft expired at Whitsunday 1911, and was renewed, or held as renewed by tacit relocation, for one year from that date in virtue of sec. 18 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908.* Grant resided on the holding and cultivated it during this year.

On 19th August 1911 the proprietors of the croft, the trustees of Lieutenant-Colonel Morison, served a notice of removal as at Whitsunday 1912 upon Grant in terms of the above-cited section of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908. On 16th December

May 24, 1913. 1911 the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, was passed, and on 1st April 1912 it came into operation.

Morison's
Trustees v.
Grant.

On 7th May 1912 Grant presented an application to the Scottish Land Court for an Order to determine whether he was a landholder or a statutory small tenant in the holding of Waulkmill, and for an Order fixing a first fair rent therefor, or alternatively, for an Order fixing a first equitable rent therefor, and the period of renewal of his tenancy thereof. When the application came before the Land Court for hearing the proprietors objected to the competency of the application, in respect that the applicant, having received notice prior to the passing of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, to remove from the holding at Whitsunday 1912, was not, as at 1st April 1912, a "tenant from year to year" within the meaning of the Act, and particularly of section 2, subsections (1) (ii.) and (2), and section 32, subsection (1) thereof,* and was therefore neither a landholder nor a statutory small tenant within the meaning of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911.

On 31st May 1912 the Land Court pronounced an interlocutor finding that the applicant (Grant) was, on 1st April 1912, in lawful possession as a resident tenant from year to year of the holding, and repelling the objection founded on the notice of removal.

The question of law in the case (with another not dealt with in this report) was:—“(2) Whether, and in respect that the applicant had been served, before the said Act passed, with notice to remove from his said holding at the term of Whitsunday 1912, the said application was competently made to the Land Court?”

The case was heard before the First Division on 24th May 1913.

At the hearing counsel for the appellants cited Lord Macdonald v. Finlayson.¹ Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

The opinion of the Court (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—[After referring to the decision in Clyne v. Sharp's Trustees, supra, p. 907]—It is argued here that the tenant does not come within the words of section 2 (1) (ii.) of the Act, because he received a notice of removal at Whitsunday 1912. Doubtless, if the law had not been altered, the effect of that notice of removal would have been that, when Whitsunday came, the tenant would not enter upon another year on tacit relocation but would have to go. But then the Act of Parliament was passed which puts the statutory right in front, so to speak, of the landlord's right to let the holding to whom he pleases; and it seems to me that, if it had been intended to exclude from the statutory right any tenant who was sitting under notice to quit, nothing would have been easier than for the Act of Parliament to say so. The Act, however, does not say so, and I think that that determines the matter.

THE COURT answered the second question in the affirmative.

DUNCAN & HARTLEY, W.S.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—Agents.

* The sections referred to are quoted supra, p. 908, in a footnote to Clyne v. Sharp's Trustees.

¹ (1884) 12 R. 228.

MAGNUS CHARLES MANSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Moncrieff, K.C.—Fenton. No. 126.

THE FORTH AND CLYDE STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—Carmont.

May 23, 1913.

Manson v.
Forth and Clyde Steamship Co.,
Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)— Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Ship's carpenter burned by shavings accidentally set on fire by shore labourer.

A ship's carpenter, working on the poop of a vessel lying in harbour, was severely burned owing to some shavings by which he was surrounded being ignited by a match carelessly thrown down by a shore labourer. The carpenter's trousers happened to be saturated with inflammable oil which had leaked from a barrel he had shifted in the course of his work, and thus readily caught fire from the shavings.

Held that he was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, between Magnus Charles Manson and the Forth and Clyde Steamship Company, the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) refused compensation, and, at the request of the applicant, stated a case for appeal.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire

The case stated, inter alia:—“(1) That appellant signed on as carpenter on board the s.s. ‘Crest,’ owned by respondents, the Forth and Clyde Steamship Company, Limited, on 21st December 1911; . . . (3) that on 15th January 1912, when appellant was working in the poop of the said s.s. ‘Crest’ in Leghorn Harbour, a shore labourer came down the ladder lighting a cigarette, and threw a match down, which fell, still alight, among some shavings on the floor of the poop, setting fire to said shavings; (4) that the fire thus caused lighted appellant's trousers, burning him severely; (5) that appellant had previous to said fire been shifting a barrel of kerosene oil, from which some oil had leaked on to his trousers; . . . (7) that he is still incapacitated as the result of the injuries sustained on 15th January 1912. . . .”

The Sheriff-substitute found that “. . . (2) the accident to the appellant did not arise out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents.” He therefore assoilzied the respondents, and found them entitled to expenses.

The questions of law included the following:—“(2) Was I entitled to hold that the injury to the appellant was not caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906?”

The case was heard before the First Division on 23rd May 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—Admittedly the accident arose “in the course of” the appellant's employment. It also arose “out of” his employment, because injury by fire was a risk incidental to all work on board ship, and in a special degree to the appellant's work on the occasion in question, when he had in the course of his duty to be in the neighbourhood of an accumulation of shavings, wearing clothes saturated with inflammable oil. The risk to which he was exposed from careless persons throwing lighted matches was very much greater

May 23, 1913. than that run by persons in ordinary circumstances, and was entirely due to the nature of his employment.¹

Manson v.
Forth and Clyde Steamship Co.,
Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—The accident did not arise out of the appellant's employment, but out of the tortious act of a third party, for which the respondents were not liable.² It was not because he was working among shavings or because his clothes were oily that the accident happened, but because the labourer carelessly threw down the lighted match. Accordingly the actual cause of the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the employment.³ The case of *Challis*⁴ and the other cases founded on by the appellant were distinguishable from the present case, because in them the risks encountered were risks reasonably incidental to the various employments concerned. The undernoted cases were favourable to the respondents.⁵

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After stating the facts]—Under those circumstances I think that only one result can be arrived at, namely, that the accident did arise out of and in the course of the employment of the pursuer. That it arose in the course of his employment is not doubtful. It has been argued to us that it did not arise out of the employment. Now I think it did, and for a very simple reason: the pursuer had got the oil upon his trousers owing to the work to which he was put; he was surrounded by shavings on the poop owing to the work to which he was put; and therefore it was a result of the work to which he was put that the pursuer, at that moment, was working in a position in which he was in more than ordinarily inflammable surroundings. An accident occurred by which the inflammable surroundings were set on fire and the pursuer was injured. That, in my view, is an accident arising out of the pursuer's employment.

I think that the fallacy of Mr Horne's argument was that he treated the throwing down of the match as the accident. It was not the throwing down of the match that was the accident—the fire was the accident; but the throwing down of the match was the cause of the accident. It was through the accident, namely, the fire, that the pursuer was injured. Well, I think that was a risk to which he was exposed to a greater extent than ¹ Challis v. London and South-Western Railway Co., [1905] 2 K. B. 154; Murray v. Denholm & Co., 1911 S. C. 1087, Lord Justice-Clerk, at pp. 1092-3, Lord Salvesen, at p. 1102; M'Intyre v. Rodger & Co., (1903) 6 F. 176; M'Lauchlan v. Anderson, 1911 S. C. 529; Wicks v. Dowell & Co., Limited, [1905] 2 K. B. 225. The following cases were also referred to:—Morgan v. Owners of s.s. "Zenaida", (1909) 25 T. L. R. 446; Andrew v. Failsworth Industrial Society, Limited, [1904] 2 K. B. 32; Kelly v. Kerry County Council, (1908) 1 Butterworth's W. C. C. 194; Warner v. Couchman, [1912] A. C. 35.

² Fitzgerald v. W. G. Clarke & Son, [1908] 2 K. B. 796.

³ Clifford v. Jay, (1909) 2 Butterworth, 32.

⁴ [1905] 2 K. B. 154.

⁵ Andrew v. Failsworth Industrial Society, Limited, [1904] 2 K. B. 32; Kelly v. Kerry County Council, 1 Butterworth's W. C. C. 194; Rodger v. Paisley School Board, 1912 S. C. 584; Burley v. Baird & Co., Limited, 1908 S. C. 545; Falconer v. London and Glasgow Engineering and Iron Shipbuilding Co., Limited, (1901) 3 F. 564; Craske v. Wigan, [1909] 2 K. B. 635; Mitchinson v. Day Brothers, [1913] 1 K. B. 603; Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., [1902] 2 K. B. 178.

other people because of his employment. Other people were not exposed to the risks of that fire, because they had not to work on the poop among these shavings and to work in oily trousers. He was bound to work under those conditions.

May 23, 1913.
Manson v.
Forth and Clyde Steamship Co.,
Limited.

I am therefore for sending back the case to the learned Sheriff-substitute with an instruction to him to find that the accident arose in the course of and out of the pursuer's employment, and to assess the proper compensation.

LORD KINNEAR.—I quite agree with your Lordship. I think it clear, upon the admitted facts, that the accident from which this man suffered occurred in the course of his employment, and I think it equally clear that it arose out of the employment, because the risk to which he was exposed was incidental to the particular work which he was required to do at the time, and was very much greater than the risks to which other people might be exposed from the same cause. I think that his duty compelled him to run a greater risk than people ordinarily run from being in the neighbourhood of careless persons who throw about lighted matches, because his duty was to work among very inflammable material with his clothes more or less saturated with inflammable oil, and a lighted match having been thrown among this material and having set it on fire, I think he met with an injury to the risk of which his employment specially exposed him and to which he would not have been exposed otherwise.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree. I think that this accident has occurred from a normal risk to which all are exposed, but to which this man was abnormally exposed, and that he was so exposed by reason of the nature of his employment; and I therefore think that the accident arose out of, as well as occurred in the course of, his employment, and that he is entitled to compensation.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT answered the second question of law in the negative.

T. M. POLE, Solicitor—J. & J. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

ORLANDO CHARNOCK BRADLEY, Pursuer.—George Watt, K.C.—J. R. Christie.

No. 127.

MENLEY & JAMES, LIMITED, Defenders.—Constable, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

May 29, 1913.

Bradley v.
Menley &
James,
Limited.

Expenses—Jury Trial—Slander—Tender—Verdict for nominal damages—Right of defender to recover expenses prior to date of tender.

In an action of damages for slander, in which the pursuer refused a tender of £5 made prior to the closing of the record, the jury found for the pursuer and awarded him 6d. of damages on each of the three issues submitted to them.

Held that the fact that the jury had returned a verdict for the pursuer and had awarded him damages, although merely nominal, excluded a motion made by the defenders for their expenses prior to the date of tender.

May 29, 1913. ON 7th December 1912 Professor Orlando Charnock Bradley, Principal of the Royal (Dick) Veterinary College, Edinburgh, brought an action of damages for slander against Menley & James, Limited, dealers in medical preparations for veterinary purposes in London.

Bradley v.
Menley &
James,
Limited.
1ST DIVISION.
Ld. President
and a Jury.

The pursuer complained that the defenders had caused to be published or put into circulation, through advertisement and otherwise, certain statements which falsely represented that he had given to the defenders, for the purpose of publication, written testimonials regarding a certain preparation of veterinary medicine. He averred that the giving of such testimonials by veterinary surgeons was forbidden, and was regarded as a breach of professional propriety and disgraceful to members of the veterinary profession, and that he had, in consequence, suffered injury and damage to his feelings and to his professional reputation.

Three issues were allowed for the trial of the case in each of which the question put to the jury was whether the defenders had, in circumstances specified, caused to be published or circulated the statements complained of, "and whether the defenders thereby falsely represented that they had received from the pursuer a written testimonial for publication in these terms, and thus falsely and calumniously represented of and concerning the pursuer that he had done an act contrary to professional etiquette, and professionally disgraceful, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" Damages were laid cumulatively on the three issues at £500.

Before the record was closed, the defenders made a tender of £5 in full of the pursuer's claims, but this tender was refused.

The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury on 23rd March 1913 and the following days.

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer and assessed the damages at 6d. on each issue.

On 29th May 1913 counsel for the defenders in the Single Bills of the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, Lord Johnston, and Lord Guthrie, who had met to hear Justiciary appeals), on a motion to apply the verdict, moved the Court to find them entitled to expenses, including expenses incurred prior to the date of the tender.

Argued for the defenders;—The correspondence produced showed that prior to the raising of the action the defenders had written offering an explanation and apology, and further, payment of any expenses to which the pursuer might have been put in the matter. The Lord President in his charge to the jury had examined this correspondence, and had said that if the jury were satisfied that the defenders' letters were sufficient for the occasion, they were entitled to say that no practical damage had been done, and to award nominal damages. The verdict of the jury was, in these circumstances, equivalent to a finding that the action should never have been brought.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was not disputed that the defenders might recover their expenses since the date of the tender, in respect that the amount of the tender exceeded the sum of damages recovered, but there should be no order with regard to expenses prior to that date. The verdict of the jury affirmed the pursuer's contention that he had suffered a wrong at the hands of the defenders, viz., damage in the eyes of the veterinary profession; he was therefore entitled to raise the action and to persist in it, at any rate until the date of May 29, 1913. the tender.

Bradley v.
Menley &
James,
Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The point that is raised here is one, I think, more of novelty than of difficulty. This was an action of damages at the instance of Professor Bradley, and the issue that was sent to the jury was whether the defenders caused certain things to be published, and whether these things were of and concerning the pursuer. It was then innuendoed that they represented him as being guilty of disgraceful professional conduct, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer.

Now, the jury really affirmed everything in the issue and innuendo except the averment as to loss, injury, and damage. They held that the defenders had published the statements, that the statements were of and concerning the pursuer, that they did contain a slur upon his professional conduct, but that the pursuer had no real damage done to him by them; and, accordingly, they assessed the damage at 6d. on each of the three issues. This they did following the view of the facts I had suggested to them in my charge.

Now, it is the fact that a tender was put in at some period immediately after the lodging of the defences, and the tender being for a larger sum than the 1s. 6d. recovered, the defenders are entitled to expenses after the date of the tender, in accordance with the well-known rule. But then, in asking us to apply the verdict, the defenders move also for expenses prior to the tender, and they do so upon the ground that the action, as they say, never ought to have been raised.

Now, the pursuer does not move for those expenses, and he does not move for them for this very good reason—that he comes within the words of the fortieth section of the Court of Session Act of 1868,¹ which provides that “Where the pursuer in any action of damages in the Court of Session recovers by the verdict of a jury less than £5, he shall not be entitled to recover or obtain from the defender any expenses in respect of such verdict, unless the Judge before whom such verdict is obtained shall certify on the interlocutor sheet that the action was brought to try a right besides the mere right to recover damages; or that the injury in respect of which the action was brought was malicious; or, in the case of actions for defamation or for libel, that the action was brought for the vindication of character and was, in his opinion, fit to be tried in the Court of Session.” Well, no such certificate was asked from me, and, accordingly, the pursuer is not in a position to ask for expenses. I may say at once, in order that counsel may not think I am putting any slur upon them, that I should never have granted a certificate in this case if I had been asked to do so, because I am clearly of opinion that this action should never have been raised, and that it was persisted in after it should have been given up. I think that the offers of apology in the letters of the defenders were very proper offers and ought to have been accepted. But then the defenders ask that they should have expenses up to the tender. I think, if we granted that, we should be, so to speak, going against the verdict of the jury. After all, the jury has

¹ 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100.

May 29, 1913. affirmed, as I say, certain propositions which put the defenders not only technically, but in one sense really, in the wrong. No doubt the publications did not cause any damage to the pursuer, and the pursuer ought not to have gone on with the action, but still the verdict of the jury shows that, in one sense, the pursuer was right in raising the action.

Bradley v.
Menley &
James,
Limited.

Ld. President.

Accordingly, I think that the motion of the defenders, so far as it asks expenses prior to the date of the tender, should be refused, that we should apply the verdict, and, in accordance with ordinary practice where there has been a tender of a sum exceeding the damages recovered, find the defenders entitled to all expenses since the date of the tender.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion. When a case such as this is brought, and the Court see fit to send it to a jury, it is a proper case of an action of damages, and the law implies, if the facts are made out, that there was damage. The jury cannot find a verdict for the pursuer—where the claim is for damages—without finding some damages due; but there are cases in which the facts present themselves so unsatisfactorily for the pursuer, that the jury, although the pursuer is entitled to a verdict, may give a very small sum of damages, as was done in this case. There are also cases in which the purpose of the action, although it may take the form of an action of damages, is to establish some particular fact of importance to the pursuer, and he may often not ask any substantial damages, and in such a case the jury being required to find damages due, will award but a nominal amount.

In the case where the verdict is given for a very small sum, it is, in the first place, for the Judge who tried the case to consider, as your Lordship did in this case, the question whether he would give a certificate that the action was properly raised for the vindication of character. I have heard from your Lordship that you would not have given such a certificate.

Further, there is the case where nominal damages are given because substantial damages are not sought. The purpose of the action is, by giving a sum of damages, however small, to mark the fact that there was a wrong done.

Now, I must concur with your Lordship in thinking that the fact that the verdict of the jury was for the pursuer, and that, fulfilling their duty, they had to assess damages, even although they assessed them at so small a sum, implies that the action was an action which might be raised and for which the pursuer could bring facts entitling him to a verdict in his favour.

In these circumstances I cannot see that there is any ground for holding that the defenders are entitled to get expenses up to the date when, by their practical act of putting in a tender of a certain sum of money, they placed the pursuer in a position of considering whether he would go on with the action and try to get more or would accept what was offered. If he had accepted the tender he would certainly have been entitled to expenses up to its date. I entirely agree with what your Lordship has said.

LORD DUNDAS, LORD JOHNSTON, and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT applied the verdict, and in respect thereof decerned against the defenders for the sum of 1s. 6d., being the cumulo amount of the damages assessed by the jury, found neither party entitled to expenses up to the date of the tender, and found the defenders entitled to expenses subsequent thereto.

May 29, 1913.
Bradley v.
Menley &
James,
Limited.

ROBERT ANDERSON, S.S.C.—FINLAY & WILSON, W.S.—Agents.

ALEXANDER COWAN (Andrew Cowan's Trustee), First Party.—
D. P. Fleming.

No. 128.

ALEXANDER COWAN, Second Party.—D. P. Fleming.

June 4, 1913.

MRS MARY COWAN OR JARDINE, Third Party.—Pitman.

MRS MARY DOBBIE COWAN OR SINCLAIR AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.
—A. M. Mackay.

Cowan's
